Secretary Acheson, Attention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. HART
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, recently the Department of State issued a book entitled "Strengthening the Forces of Freedom," the same consisting of selected speeches and statements of Secretary of State Acheson. I am in receipt of a letter, well phrased and to the point, from Mr. Hoyt S. Haddock, executive secretary, CIO Maritime Committee, wherein he makes critical reference to a part of a speech contained in this volume. The Department of State has for a good many years shown an utter indifference to the welfare of the American merchant marine. I heartily approve of the criticism of the secretary's remarks contained in Mr. Haddock's letter, which follows:

CIO MARITIME COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., July 27, 1950.

Hon. EDWARD J HART,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HART: We have read with great interest the State Department's Strengthening the Forces of Freedom. This book is a compilation of selected speeches and statements of Secretary of State Acheson. One chapter is titled "The United States as an Importer in World Economy." This was an address before the convention of the National Foreign Trade Council, New York, N. Y., on November 2, 1949.

The part of the speech that should be criticized is found on page 58 of Strengthening the Forces of Freedom. The Secretary said:

"We have laws and regulations which compel us in many cases to tell the citizens of friendly nations when they offer to carry our goods far across the seas that we must not employ them because we are obligated to use our own vessels regardless of the quality of service and rate of charge which they may offer."

We regret that the Secretary of State has taken upon himself to compare the quality of American service with that rendered by foreign vessels. I am sure that many of us would appreciate having pointed out any foreign service that is superior to our American service.

We also regret that the Secretary has mentioned shipping rates charged. He must be cognizant of the facts that foreign vessels employ seamen at deplorably low wages. They work them long hours and poorly feed and bunk them. The extremely low living standards of foreign countries also result in lower ship construction costs. Therefore, the rates charged in certain trade would be lower on foreign vessels.

Congress has considered all of the above factors when they enacted laws to protect the American merchant marine as well as other United States industries. We are sure that Congress has not passed these laws in the light of having the State Department or any Government agency apologize for them.

This negative approach is most unhealthy to the shipbuilding and merchant marine industries at a time when they are struggling in a losing fight for existence.

Sincerely yours,

HOYT S. HADDOCK,
Executive Secretary.

Hon. Francis J. Sinnott

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Brooklyn Eagle of July 30, and which refers to the election as Democratic leader of Brooklyn, Kings County, of the Honorable Francis J. Sinnott. It is encouraging that a newspaper of the high standards of the Brooklyn Eagle should in such manner editorially note the selection of one of our citizens as political leader of the largest voting unit in the State of New York.

With what the editorial says with reference to the choice of Mr. Sinnott, I am in complete agreement. That agreement is based upon the privilege of having served for many years with and under Mr. Sinnott in his many worth-while community activities. We who know him know of his high qualities of leadership and know that he will well and creditably discharge the duties as leader of Brooklyn's great Democratic Party. In addition, Mr. Sinnott received countless numbers of telegrams of congratulations, including those from President Truman, Senator LEHMAN, and Democratic State Chairman Paul Fitzpatrick, as well as many other citizens of all political beliefs. The editorial is as follows:

SINNOTT IS A FINE CHOICE AS DEMOCRATS SUSPEND FEUD

The change in the Democratic Party leadership in Brooklyn is one that can be accepted by the people of this community without any fear that settlement of a political feud has been to their disadvantage. It was the decision of leaders that in the interests of party harmony it was advisable for Borough President John Cashmore to relinquish the helm. The issue was forced by Mayor O'Dwyer and some of the leaders.

We watched the course of the fight with considerable concern because it would be more than a mere party row if there was any suggestion that the best interests of Brooklyn might be hurt as it developed. As it was Mr. Cashmore was punished for his tenacity by being bypassed on patronage rightfully his and some appointments were made which did not set well with the borough.

The settlement has produced a new leader, county clerk Francis J. Sinnott, a man of integrity and responsibility and a devoted servant of Brooklyn and all its people The choice was unanimous. It was not dictated by pressure from Manhattan nor by the anti-Cashmore forces in the borough.

Mr. Sinnott was the borough president's choice and he is assured of fine support since a majority of the district leaders were behind Mr. Cashmore. We know of no man we'd rather see as the successor than Mr. Sinnott. We have complete confidence in him.

It is regrettable that Mr. Cashmore who always does a fine job for Brooklyn remained silent for so long a time in the face of city hall's puzzling antagonism. His final statement when he handed over the crown left unanswered the question—what was the basis of the mayor's displeasure? Why did he want him removed when it was he who made his leadership possible in 1946? Mr. O'Dwyer never raised the question of the inadvisability of holding dual roles until just recently. We had hoped Mr. Cashmore would speak plainly and perhaps put to rest the suggestion that the rackets investigation was a factor in the fight.

It must be restated that we have always been against the idea of Brooklyn's borough president holding two jobs and yet we felt that Mr. Cashmore's departure from the party leadership must be delayed until a fine replacement appeared on the scene. He is here in the person of Mr. Sinnott and we offer him our very best wishes. The same goes for Mr. Cashmore. He acquitted himself with honor in both roles and we believe he will be an even better chief executive now that he has been relieved of the burdens of the county leadership.

A political boss should not be the borough president.

Blame Put on Johnson for Debacle in Korea Obscures Realities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. STERLING COLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newspaper article by David Lawrence appearing in the Washington Evening Star August 3, 1950:

BLAME PUT ON JOHNSON FOR DEBACLE IN KOREA OBSCURES REALITIES—CONGRESS LEADERS HELD PRIMARILY RESPONSIBLE FOR UNPREPAREDNESS

(By David Lawrence)

There is a palpable effort to make Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson the scapegoat for America's unpreparedness today.

That's the easy, superficial, careless way. It tends to obscure realities. For the truth is the Congress of the United States is primarily responsible for the debacle in Korea.

The Constitution imposes on Congress these duties:

"To raise and support armies.

"To provide and maintain a Navy.

"To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces."

If America is unprepared today, the blame cannot be placed merely on just one or two individuals in the executive branch of the Government—either the President or the Secretary of Defense. They have a responsibility, of course, but if either or both of these officials was wrong in taking the advice of those who drew up a military concept of strategy based only on a strategic bombing war in Europe, then it was the duty of the legislative branch of the Government to check those policies and make final judgment.

WHAT DID CONGRESS DO?

What did Congress do during the controversy last year concerning reductions in the Navy, or the withholding of funds for the Air Force, or the need of the Army for tanks and tactical aviation? The House Armed Services Committee, led by Representative CARL VINSON, of Georgia, Democrat, did a faithful job of checking on what the executive agencies were doing. The House committee did more—it conducted public hearings and listened to witnesses who cried out against a concept of strategy which took into account only one kind of warfare.

What did the Senate do? Here was the biggest fall down. Here is where the real checking should have been done, because the Senate is recognized as the more powerful and influential body of the two. The Senate, however, depended on its Armed Services Committee. This is headed by Senator MILLARD TYDINGS, of Maryland, Democrat, who studiously avoided any serious check up or investigation. With his colleagues, he repeatedly steered away from the controversy over preparedness which raged in the House committee last autumn. He intervened only to coerce the House Armed Services Committee and military men generally by threatening, in effect, to hold up the legislation providing for military pay increase unless the Navy and the Army officers knuckled under and accepted the Tydings unification plan. Thus far this plan has served only to weaken the defense structure.

All during the time that expert witnesses were telling the House Armed Services Committee that the United States lacked tactical aviation units for the Army, lacked tanks and lacked naval aviation, the Senate Armed Services Committee was looking the other way—trying to avoid what it called a controversial subject. At one time Chairman TYDINGS said he didn't think the Senate should inquire into the controversy raised over the matter of naval aviation and Marine Corps strength and B-36's, because this was being done by the House—as if the Senate could thus abdicate its responsibility to investigate vital matters of national defense policy.

SYSTEM NEEDS CHANGE

Before the "unification" propaganda sold the country the idea that the next war could be won in a few days by air power alone, the Congress had a separate committee for the Army and a separate committee for the Navy in each House. Now each has only one Armed Services Committee. Hence it was more important than ever that during 1949 and 1950 the Senate Armed Services Committee should not have shirked its task.

This same committee has just appointed several subcommittees to watch the defense effort. Nothing apparently is being done to investigate the past failures of the committee itself. Nothing is being done by the Congress to find out why its system of checking on defense matters broke down. Nor is anything being done to establish a method of censuring those committee members who neglected their duty to the people of the United States in 1949 when the die was cast to forget tanks and tactical aviation and to cut naval aviation.

The system in Congress needs to be changed. There should be a joint committee of both Houses and equal representation of both political parties, so that such things as Senator TYDINGS' clever whitewash of Secretary of Navy Matthews when he punished Admiral Denfeld for telling the American people the truth about their defenses will not be ignored by the Senate itself.

The present system is such that unless Senator TYDINGS brings to the attention of the Senate itself problems related to military affairs, they do not get much consideration by that body. There is no partnership of interest under the present system and a committee chairman can squelch any inquiry he wishes to squelch. That's why it is unfair to single out Secretary Johnson as the only one to blame in the present mess.

Happenings in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 4 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address entitled "Happenings in Washington," being program No. 30, delivered by me on July 31, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAPPENINGS IN WASHINGTON, PROGRAM NO. 30

This is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital, and bringing you another discussion of happenings in Washington.

Two weeks ago I discussed with you some important phases of the Korean situation.

In that talk I reviewed the humiliating chain of events growing out of our disastrous foreign policy in China, Formosa and Korea which paved the way for armed aggression by Communist forces.

President Truman might have prevented the Communist conquest of China and the invasion of Korea if he had heeded the warnings that poured into the White House from many sources.

One of the most forceful of these warnings came from Maj. Gen. Patrick J. Hurley, former Secretary of War. He served as special representative of the President and as Ambassador to China from August 1944 until November 1945 when he resigned in protest against Communist influence in shaping State Department policies.

In his letter of resignation General Hurley wrote, and I quote:

"It is no secret that the American policy in China did not have the support of all the career men in the State Department. The professional foreign service men sided with the Chinese Communist-armed party and the imperialistic bloc of nations whose policy it was to keep China divided against herself.

"Our professional diplomats continuously advised the Communists that my efforts to prevent the collapse of the national government did not represent the policy of the United States. * * *

"Throughout this period the chief opposition to the accomplishment of our mission came from the American career diplomats in the Embassy and in the Chinese and Far-Eastern Division of the State Department."

General Hurley continued, and I further quote:

"I requested the relief of the career men who were opposing the American policy in the Chinese theater of war.

"These professional diplomats were returned to Washington and placed in the Chinese and Far Eastern Division of the State Department as my supervisors. Some of these same career men whom I relieved have been assigned as advisers to the supreme commander in Asia.

"In such positions most of them have continued to side with the Communist-armed party and * * * against American policy.

"This, Mr. President, is an outline of one of the reasons why American foreign policy, announced by the highest authority, is rendered ineffective by another section of diplomatic officials."

Then General Hurley gave this significant warning, and I quote:

"There is a third world war in the making."

General Hurley's letter of resignation was not made public until the State Department issued its China white paper on July 30 of last year, more than 4 years after it was submitted to President Truman.

After its publication General Hurley made this comment, and again I quote:

"President Roosevelt was a sick man at Yalta. The State Department officials took over.

"The secret agreement at Yalta surrendered every principle of the Atlantic Charter and the Iran declaration. * * * The surrender of all these rights to Russia in China was legally and morally unjustified; and no white paper will ever be able to change the history of America's diplomatic failure in China.

"Nearly all the officials relieved by me in China because they were pro-Communist are now in the State Department, presumably writing alibi white papers."

I don't think I need remind you that one of the State Department officials referred to was Alger Hiss, who was among President Roosevelt's principal advisers at the Yalta Conference.

I will take time to give you one more example. I will read a brief extract from the report made to President Truman by Lt. Gen. Albert C. Wedemeyer on September 19, 1947.

General Wedemeyer, who is an expert on conditions in the Far East, was selected by the President to head up a fact-finding mission in China.

In his report he stated, and I quote:

"Indirectly the United States facilitated the Soviet program in the Far East by agreeing at Yalta to Russian reentry into Manchuria, and later by withholding aid from the Nationalist Government."

General Wedemeyer advised, and again I quote:

"A policy of 'no assistance' to China * * * would be equivalent to cutting the ground from under the feet of the Chinese Government * * * and would certainly lay the country open to eventual Communist domination.

"It would have repercussions in other parts of Asia, would lower American prestige in the Far East, and would make easier the spread of Soviet influence and Soviet political expansion not only in Asia but in other areas of the world."

Was it the influence of Alger Hiss and others like him that caused the State Department to ignore General Hurley and General Wedemeyer? Was it on the advice of Communist sympathizers that we refused further assistance to China even though Congress appropriated funds for that purpose?

I made a reference to that dangerous situation in a speech at Oklahoma City in February of 1949, from which I now quote:

"We must call forcefully to the attention of the people the shameful outcome of a foreign policy which has placed millions of people in Europe and Asia under the tyranny of Soviet Russia.

"We must place where it properly belongs full responsibility for the secret agreements which betrayed free nations into Communist enslavement.

"We must point out, so all may understand, the fallacy of spending billions of dollars to prop up western Europe while we leave the back door wide open for Communist domination over 450,000,000 helpless people in China."

Since my last broadcast, President Truman has placed before Congress and the American people his estimates of our immediate needs in manpower, money, and home front sacrifice to meet the situation in Korea.

In his message he carefully avoided the use of the word "war."

But even though our resistance to Communist aggression is called police action in support of the United Nations, the boys who are fighting against terrible odds with true American heroism know they are at war.

We have served notice upon the masters of Soviet Russia and upon their puppet governments that we will defend freedom in the world against every form of armed aggression which seeks to destroy human liberty.

In support of that stand we are committed as a people and as a nation, no matter how high the cost may be in blood, treasure, and tragedy.

I have said many times that strength is the only language that tyrants and aggressors understand.

No one can predict whether or not the conflict in Korea will explode into a war of global proportions. Nevertheless, it should be clear to all of us, that we must be prepared for any emergency.

Therefore, to my mind this calls for a complete mobilization of all our forces, military, industrial, agricultural, financial, and spiritual.

The future of the world depends upon the strength of the United States. Complete mobilization may yet persuade Red Russia to back down. Weakness is an invitation to further aggression.

War is not won on the battlefield alone. Victory cannot be achieved by the mere spending of money for arms and equipment.

Wars are won when heroic and valiant fighting men are backed up by a united, resolute, hard-working, patriotic home front, willing to make any sacrifice in their country's cause.

All of us will be called upon to make many sacrifices in order to build and maintain our Nation's strength at its highest peak.

During World War II we observed how certain selfish and unpatriotic men enriched themselves by profiteering and by engaging in black-market operations.

There was tax dodging, price gouging, hoarding, artificial scarcities, and other illicit practices which sabotaged the war effort on the home front.

Some became millionaires overnight, so to speak, at the expense of their fellow citizens, while the flower of American youth gave their lives for their country on foreign soil.

This time it must not happen. It will not happen if an aroused public puts patriotism first and cooperates to prevent such dastardly practices.

Those who would take advantage of war for their own personal enrichment while their fellow Americans endure the hardships and tragedies of war deserve the contempt of every real American. They belong behind prison bars. They are traitors to their country.

My fellow Pennsylvanians, there are many phases of the present situation that have given me great concern.

We are a rich and powerful Nation, but there is a limit to our resources.

We have poured out billions and billions of dollars in the hope that we might be able to prevent the outbreak of another world war. At the moment we seem to have failed.

If we should be forced into another long-drawn-out war on a world-wide scale, the cost would be so great that we could lose our individual freedom even though we were victorious.

In a speech which I made last Saturday to my comrades of the Society of the Twenty-eighth Division I warned of this danger. On that occasion I said:

"The combat cost of World War II, which lasted 4 years, was $356,000,000,000. About 45 percent of that cost was paid for by taxation. The balance, approximately $215,000,000,000, was added to the national debt in the 4-year period.

"The price of weapons, equipment and everything that enters into waging war is almost double today. I have gone into the costs pretty carefully and I have figured out that a 4-year war would call for the expenditure of a minimum of $600,000,000,000.

"If taxes were levied to pay 45 percent of this war, as in the last war, we would come out with a new debt of about $300,000,000,000 in addition to the present national debt of more than $257,000,000,000.

"That would mean a total debt of nearly $600,000,000,000.

"Such a debt would put the whole economy of the United States in a strait-jacket from which we could never free ourselves. We would live forever in a planned economy, with regimentation, regulations and directives controlling every activity of our daily lives."

This is a gloomy picture but we must not look at it through rose-colored glasses. We must have the courage to face the cold facts.

This critical situation calls for a definite and courageous course of action. It calls for the highest patriotism and the most earnest prayer.

In the near future I hope to suggest a course by which we may be able to preserve the freedoms which are the heritage of every American.

The United States is at the cross roads. May God guide us along the right road to victory for peace and freedom.

This is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital. I will be with you again in 2 weeks. Thank you for your attention.

Comparison of Public and Private Power Rates in Michigan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to point out that on May 19, 1950, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] took occasion to make a statement with reference to public power in Michigan in which he claimed that certain public power systems in Michigan provided electric energy at rates considerably below those charged by private power companies. He also claimed that the people of Michigan were being overcharged for electricity to the extent of more than $100,000,000 a year. Allegan, Bay City, Coldwater, Escanaba, Gladstone, Grand Haven, Holland, Kalamazoo, Lansing, Marquette, Niles, Norway, St. Louis, South Haven, Sturgis, Traverse City, Wakefield, Wyandotte, and Zeeland were cited as outstanding examples of Michigan public-power systems offering electricity at rates below those charged by the private power companies.

I wish to present at this point a comparative table of typical monthly residential bills for the municipal electric systems in Michigan mentioned above and the average rates charged by the Consumers Power Co., a privately owned utility:

Typical monthly residential electric bills for the larger municipal electric systems in Michigan on rates in effect as of July 1, 1950

Line No.	Community	Population (1940)	Net monthly bills
			40 kilowatt-hours	100 kilowatt-hours	250 kilowatt-hours	500 kilowatt-hours

20	Average (municipal systems)	------	1.91	3.41	6.40	9.16
21	Consumers Power Co	------	1.80	3.45	6.45	8.50

Source: Bills computed on rates reported by Michigan Municipal Utilities Association as of July 1, 1950.

NOTE.—Above bills for 500 kilowatt-hours or more include discounts for water-heating use during off-peak hours.

The claims made by the gentleman from Mississippi do not square up with the facts presented in the above table of rates. There is also that ever-present question of whether or not the public power systems pay normal taxes or the equivalent so as to afford a true yardstick of comparison to taxpaying, privately owned power companies.

As I have stated on numerous occasions, I am not opposed to the public generation of hydroelectric power whenever and wherever a project can be economically justified. However, public power projects should, wherever practicable, provide for new outlets of demand and not be brought into direct competition with existing privately owned transmission lines. We should have a policy that coordinates public and private power for a maximum of national defense and to the end that there will be no unnecessary duplication of transmission.

I have stated many times before the House that the generation of electric power by the Government is desirable and necessary. The Government controls the water. It is the transmission and disposition of that power by the Government in direct competition with private investment and private enterprise to which I object. If the philosophy of public ownership, control, and distribution of electric power is sound then the philosophy on which this country grew great must be wrong.

The Government should sell the power at the bus bar and let private enterprise do the rest.

Danger of Communist Activities in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
Friday, August 4 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Clear and Present Danger," appearing in this morning's Washington Post, and dealing with the proposition that communism in this country has become something other than a political or economic theory.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER

The opinion of the United States court of appeals, upholding the conviction of the 11 leaders of the Communist Party on charges of conspiracy to overthrow the Government by force and violence, is an important and possibly historic document. Its author, Judge Learned Hand, seeks to find an escape from the dilemma into which the Communist conspiracy has plunged the democratic order of society. The nature of this dilemma was indicated on this page last October 13, shortly after the convicted Communists had been sentenced by Judge Medina. We wrote:

"The truth is that traditional American political theory affords no really satisfactory means of dealing with such a problem as is now presented by international communism. Jefferson and his school envisaged revolution as a means whereby society could, when necessary, assert its priority to the state. The Constitution, as we have seen, has been interpreted as the instrument that enables society to assert this priority without recourse to revolution. But neither of these theories takes account of the possibility of a revolutionary conspiracy that is directed not only against government but also against society, that is, against the social order, and existing social institutions. If the Communist Party in the United States were merely a negligible sect like, let us say, the Bakuninite anarchists or even the Trotskyite Communists, the problem would not be particularly urgent; but the fact is that the Communist Party is a powerful international conspiracy that already has under its domination nearly half the world and is striving to dominate the rest."

With all this Judge Hand evidently agrees; for he observes that while it is one thing to permit the unhappy, bitter outcast to vent his venom before any crowds he can muster and in any terms that he wishes, it is quite another thing to give the same freedom to a highly articulated, well contrived, far-spread organization, numbering thousands of adherents, rigidly and ruthlessly disciplined, many of whom are infused with a passionate utopian faith that is to redeem mankind.

Thus it is not merely a question whether heretical or unpopular opinions, or opinions contrary to the premises upon which our democratic society is based, may be tolerated. It is rather a question whether by tolerating such a dangerous conspiracy, democratic society does not become an accessory to its own destruction. The Communists, observes Judge Hand:

"Claim the constitutional privilege of * * * indoctrinating their pupils, preparing increasing numbers to pledge themselves to the crusade, and awaiting the moment when we may be so far extended by foreign engagements, so far divided in counsel, or so far in industrial or financial straits that the chance [of revolution] seems worth trying. [The Communists] presuppose that the [first] amendment assures them freedom for all preparatory steps and in the end the choice of the initiative, dependent upon that moment when they believe us, who await the blow, to be worst prepared to receive it."

More than 30 years ago, in the case of Schenck v. U. S. (249 U. S. 47), the late Justice Holmes in a majority opinion by the United States Supreme Court laid down the famous dictum that the right of free speech guaranteed in the first amendment applies in all cases unless "the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to constitute a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has the right to prevent."

But Judge Hand holds that the court in determining what constitutes "clear and present danger" must apply a principle suggestive in some ways of the famous Jesuit doctrine of probabilism. The courts "must ask whether the gravity of the 'evil,' discounted by its improbability justifies such invasions of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger." And in doing so they must take account of existing circumstances. In other words, the problem of free speech is not one that can be decided in vacuo like a problem in plane geometry. It cannot be separated from the context of the times. At present, observes Judge Hand:

"We do not understand how one could ask for a more probable danger unless we must wait till the actual eve of hostilities [with Soviet Russia]."

In short, it has become folly to deal with the Communist conspiracy in terms of the politico-philosophic abstractions formulated in the eighteenth century. We must deal with it in terms of what we know to be present realities. Judge Hand's argument is the argument of irrefragable common sense.

Need for a Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 4 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very splendid editorial under the headline, "The shipping outlook," written by Edward P. Tastrom, published in the New York Journal of Commerce.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SHIPPING OUTLOOK—LET'S HAVE SOME ACTION

(By Edward P. Tastrom)

It should be quite apparent from the way world political forces are spinning now that we are going to be in need of a large and efficient merchant marine for a long, long time.

The Korean affair may be only the first of similar incidents involving our manpower and resources. No one can say with any certainty that it will end here.

But we can say with some degree of certainty that Korea has pointed up the lack of readily available shipping with which to conduct these oversea operations.

A good part of our trouble in the Far East today can be laid to the fact that we did not have the right kind of merchant marine ready to move troops and material the moment trouble started. We are paying for this lack in humiliating rearguard actions in the field.

Yet in the face of this situation it is virtually impossible to get any action from Congress on the several shipping bills which are awaiting consideration.

Senator MAGNUSON has seven bills which were reported out to the Senate late last week, only to meet objections in every single instance, which automatically prevented their consideration. We think that Senator MAGNUSON was perfectly justified in standing up and stating to his colleagues that it appears some deep-seated prejudice against the merchant marine is prompting this type of action by some Senators.

Senator MAGNUSON rightly observed that many bills of an emergency nature have been passed recently but that his committee cannot even get the Senate to extend the courtesy of examining the proposed legislation.

These measures represent the findings developed by MAGNUSON'S subcommittee in lengthy hearings held over a period of nearly 2 years during which time all phases of shipping were examined with a view to coming up with a coordinated program designed to fit the needs of commerce and national defense into the present international picture.

That basic legislative improvements governing American-flag vessel operations, as well as the position of the Government in the shipping industry, are called for at this time can be readily appreciated when it is realized, that aside from the Ship Sales Act of 1946, there has been no fundamental alteration of our shipping laws since 1936. But there have been plenty of changes elsewhere as they affect maritime affairs.

What we would like to know, and for that matter we surmise large sections of the public would join in this curiosity if apprised of the situation, is why someone in Congress pops up with an objection every time a shipping bill is offered. Some of these measures represent important legislative changes that are as worthy of consideration by the Senate as almost any of the measures now being discussed.

Probably one of the mental handicaps is that we are thinking of shipping in commercial terms, whereas the emphasis now must be on shipping as it affects national security.

Now where do we stand if we look at the picture from this angle? Frankly, not so good. We have a woeful lack of troop-carrying capacity as well as of specialized types of vessels as has been frequently pointed out.

It has been stated in rebuttal to this, that the combined fleets of our allies would give us an adequate pool of sufficient carrying capacity to draw upon for all our needs.

This raises several questions such as whether it is better to charter or buy foreign vessels or permit American owners to build desired ships (putting up part of the cost), whether our allies will all be on our side if, as and when the chips go down, or whether an enemy, striking without warning, may immobilize some of our Allied tonnage.

Our strategy always has been to carry the war to our enemy, to keep our sea lanes open and fight on his territory. Now, whether we like it or not we have to be self-reliant to follow such strategy. That means we must have ships of the desired types and numbers and the cooperation of the industry in maintaining our merchant marine on a sound and continuing basis.

Let's have those objections removed from Senator MAGNUSON'S bills and bring them up for consideration. The commercial phases of this program are secondary now. The legislation is as much a defense emergency program as many other bills that have been hustled through and sent to the White House for signature.

Steamship "President Jackson"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Mr. George Killion, president of the American President Lines at the launching of the steamship President Jackson at Camden, N. J., on June 27, 1950:

STEAMSHIP "PRESIDENT JACKSON"

Mr. Bossert, the Vice President of the United States and Mrs. Barkley, the ambassadors of many countries, other distinguished guests, and my friends, I welcome you all to this launching ceremony in behalf of the thousands of individuals within Government, industry, and labor whose cooperative effort has culminated in the creation of this fine ship, the President Jackson. Your presence here today is a genuine tribute to America's merchant marine.

Under the bow of this great ship are many distinguished guests, representatives of the United States and other great nations, whose interests are widespread—Nation-wide and world-wide. Many of them have played an important role in planning and building the President Jackson, and many others will have an active part in assuring the success of the President Jackson and of America's merchant marine.

We are highly honored today by the presence of several diplomatic representatives of great countries located on the world-trade route served by this vessel: The Ambassador from Italy, His Excellency and Mrs. Alberto Tarkiani; the Ambassador from Ceylon, His Excellency and Mrs. Corea; the Ambassador from the Republic of the United States of Indonesia, His Excellency and Mrs. Sastromajojo.

Heading the long list of artisans and engineers who have contributed their shipbuilding knowledge and long experience to this ship is its famous designer and noted naval architect, Mr. George G. Sharp.

Our Navy can rightfully claim part ownership in this vessel and share the pride assumed by its designers and builders. Representing the United States Navy here today is that able and distinguished gentleman, Under Secretary of the Navy, Dan A. Kimball.

Another distinguished and able naval official whose interest in this vessel as a potential troop carrier and as an active participant in the logistical support of our military forces serving in oversea areas is Rear Adm. William Callaghan, commander, Military Seas Transport Service.

Representative of the Chief of the Bureau of Ships, whose office is responsible for the national defense features of this vessel and who will direct, in time of national emergency, its conversion into a naval auxiliary unit, is Rear. Adm. C. D. Wheelock.

Representing the service to which the American merchant marine and passengers traveling on American-flag vessels owe a debt of gratitude for their part in making our ships the safest plying the seven seas, we welcome Vice Adm. Merlin O'Neill, the Commandant, United States Coast Guard, and his able assistant, Read Adm. Halert C. Shepheard, Chief of the Merchant Vessel Inspection Division.

Another distinguished military officer whose interest in the American merchant marine has been a source of encouragement to all of us is Brig. Gen. Paul F. Yount, representing the Army Transport Service and the commander of the New York Port of Embarkation.

In carrying out its assigned mission to promote and develop a merchant marine our former Maritime Commission recognized the importance and necessity of a sound vessel construction program. They can find no more real and concrete results of their endeavor than this and other modern ships conceived and built during their administration. We are honored to have as prudent witnesses to the realization of that program and their achievement, a former chairman of the Commission and famous naval officer Admiral W. W. Smith; a former Commissioner, Joseph K. Carson, of Portland, Oreg.; and former Commissioner David Coddaire, of Boston.

They have rendered invaluable service to the merchant marine and to the country.

President Truman recently created a new Federal Maritime Board and charged it with the responsibility of directing the far-flung activities of our merchant marine. It has great and heavy obligations, and its representatives are here today to witness the launching of this great new ship which has now become a part of their responsibility to the Nation. We welcome a distinguished former naval officer, Rear Adm. Paul L. Mather, and his associate on the Board, another able public servant, Mr. South Trimble, Jr.

The Chairman of the Federal Maritime Board is ably represented here today by Capt. Lucius A. Chapel, aide to John Koehler, Acting Chairman of the Board, and Assistant Secretary of the United States Navy.

Demonstrating by his presence here today his interest in a ship-construction program and the merchant marine, to which he has contributed his wholehearted support as the former Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission, and who has recently been nominated by President Truman to the high position of Under Secretary of Commerce for Transportation, is that soldier and notable public servant, Maj. Gen. Philip B. Fleming.

Gracing this gathering is a well-known figure, recognized and loved by all as a symbol of true democracy—your friend and mine—the Secretary of the United States Senate, Mr. Leslie L. Biffle.

We are thankful that the chosen representatives of the American people, the Members of Congress, have joined with us today in observing the launching of the President Jackson. It is Congress, whose wisdom and foresight, which establishes and is now maintaining a strong and healthy merchant marine, and who today are reshaping legislation destined to revitalize this essential maritime industry. It is, indeed, a privilege and a real pleasure to present the Honorable HERBERT C. BONNER, of North Carolina; the Honorable FRANK W. BOYKIN, of Alabama; the Honorable JOHN F. SHELLEY, of California; the Honorable JOHN J. ALLEN, JR., of California; the Honorable EDGAR A. JONAS, of Illinois; the Honorable LINDLEY BECKWORTH, of Texas; the Honorable CHARLES A. WOLVERTON, of New Jersey; the Honorable CHARLES R. HOWELL, of New Jersey.

This magnificent new vessel we are to launch is to be named for President Andrew Jackson, whose courage and progressive philosophy have been a source of encouragement to the millions of Americans who have helped to build this great Nation.

In that same progressive spirit we have now embarked on a program of building a modern merchant marine.

We have resolved to engage in a new shipbuilding program with full knowledge that a vast fleet of new vessels are being constructed in other lands to operate under flags that forced most of our merchant vessels from the sea lanes soon after the termination of World War I.

As all of you know, the result was detrimental to the interests of the Nation, to labor, and to industry.

More than the economic welfare of the Nation is involved now, for all of us realize that the world leadership that has been thrust upon us carries with it the responsibility of assuring that sea lanes are maintained to the ports of all free nations. A large part of that responsibility must be shouldered by the American merchant marine.

In discharging that responsibility we must assure that the world's raw materials and manufactured products will be borne peacefully to and from other free countries, thus providing the most important single factor that will keep those nations free.

In that undertaking we are backed by President Truman, the Congress, by labor, and by the many diversified interests that are essential to the well-being of the Nation. We confidently expect the continuation of that support. The President Jackson constitutes the initial contribution of the American President Lines to that program.

Two sister ships, the President Adams and the President Hayes, are being rushed to completion on adjoining way and will join the President Jackson in the near future. They will be operated on the round-the-world route and will be followed by four others now in the planning stage.

Although the President Jackson will carry cargo on a high-speed schedule, she is essentially a passenger vessel, affording every luxury the art of modern shipbuilding can devise. Thousands of men and women will be safely transported to 30 ports of 17 nations all over the world. I trust that this magnificent ship will bring them many days of comfort, relaxation, and joy.

This ship is exceptionally well constructed to fulfill that wish, and is a great credit to the fine artisans and engineers who have created her and who maintain the enviable reputation of her builders, the New York Shipbuilding Corp.

Upon completion the President Jackson will be manned by seamen who will carry on the fine traditions that have been handed down since the days of John Paul Jones. May it always be for them a happy ship. It should be a happy ship, for ship and crew will symbolize the renaissance of the American merchant marine.

Although the President Jackson is intended for peace, her design is such that she may be quickly converted into a vessel of war. She will serve us well, whatever the future may have in store for the people of the United States.

May God grant her a long and a useful life.

It is altogether fitting that Vice President BARKLEY and his gracious lady should be with us today, for he clearly exemplifies the high ideals and progressive spirit of Andrew Jackson whose name this great new ship will carry throughout her long and illustrious life.

I now present the Vice President of the United States, ALBEN W. BARKLEY.

(Vice President BARKLEY speaks.)

We thank Vice President BARKLEY for his address and timely remarks. It is always refreshing to one to listen to the wise counsel and the thoroughly American viewpoint expressed by our exceptionally able and beloved Vice President.

However, we have with us today another well-known personage who justly shares the high regard that has so readily been given to her famous husband by the American people.

I have the honor to present our charming sponsor, Mrs. Alben W. Barkley.

Thank you, Mrs. Barkley, for a perfectly executed christening ceremony. All sailors have some bit of superstition, and a successful christening and launching are good omens for the future of the President Jackson.

The Damon Runyon Memorial Cancer Fund

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 4 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a telegram from Walter Winchell regarding the Damon Runyon Cancer Fund.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y.,
August 3, 1950.

Senator WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
Senate Office Building:

You will recall when Damon Runyon died December 10, 1946, I tried to enter the fight against cancer. The Damon Runyon memorial fund for cancer research has now received contributions of $3,750,000. All this money is allocated for cancer research in the 48 States as soon as it is received without deductions of any kind. The fund has allocated over $3,000,000 to date in 93 grants to 86 institutions in 37 States and 89 fellowships. Requests on hand exceed our funds on hand but we hope the Robinson-Fusari fight August 9 will raise another $100,000 for the fund. We get 15 percent off the top receipts and all of Sugar Ray's purse of 30 percent; the fund just made grants to Tuskegee Institute and Memorial Hospital in New York. From the earliest days of recorded history mankind has been under deadly and relentless attacks from cancer. All-encompassing good recognizes neither race, color, creed, nor boundary; neither does all-encompassing evil. Without regard to boundaries, religion or background, cancer strikes as impersonally at the mansion as it does at the tenement. But there is nothing which illuminates the common bond of all men more than a common great enemy. For 3,000 years we humbly accepted disasters. Now for the first time we are counterattacking on a wide front. To you who have so wholeheartedly assisted I give the thanks of a comrade-in-arms. It is in the nature of paradoxical reward that in learning the great evil of cancer I have come to know the great goodness in the human heart. I wish I could call your generous dollars the victory loan to humanity. But all I can promise is that the fight will continue and I have enlisted for life.

WALTER WINCHELL,
Treasurer, Damon Runyon Memorial Fund.

Necessity for Subversive Control Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

Friday, August 4 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Politics or Survival," published in one of the great newspapers of the United States, the Plain Dealer, of Cleveland, Ohio. The editorial calls upon Congress to do something now in the way of enacting subversive control legislation.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer of July 27, 1950]

POLITICS OR SURVIVAL?

The hour has struck when there can be no compromise with communism.

Americans are dying in the onslaught of communistic aggression in Korea. Troops are being dispatched from American ports to battle fronts, and the lives of these young men, therefore, could be snuffed out at sea by traitorous disclosure. Industry is looking toward war production, in which sabotage could bring about disaster.

It is a question of survival. Communists must be removed from government and critical industry. The gates must be closed against Communists as we organize for war.

Nevertheless, the Democratic administration in Washington is playing politics with this issue. It is, therefore, playing politics with survival.

We are not thinking only of the Tydings whitewash of the McCarthy charges. Granted that Senator MCCARTHY was reckless and that much of what he said was false, the fact remains that the Democrats on the Tydings committee convinced too many people that they were more interested in smearing MCCARTHY than in weeding Communists out of government.

We are thinking also of the fact that the Truman administration has thrown up a road-block in the path of the Mundt-Ferguson-Johnston bill which would tighten the screws on communistic activities.

The Republican sponsors, Senators MUNDT and FERGUSON, have offered to withdraw their names and permit the bill to go forward under Democratic auspices if partisan jealousy should be a factor. But still the Democratic Policy Committee and the majority leader, Senator LUCAS, have refused to permit the bill to come to a vote.

Senator MUNDT reminds the Democrats that "the American public should be told who it is within this body who declines even now to permit the Senate to vote on a bill which has been endorsed by the American Legion in its convention, by the Veterans of Foreign Wars, by the Knights of Columbus, by the United States Chamber of Commerce, by the National Education Association, by the Daughters of the American Revolution, and by a great many other organizations."

The bill would compel Communists to register and to identify their front organizations in their literature. It would require that officers and members be listed by real names. It would compel the Communist Party to make a financial report. It would be unlawful for Communists to hold Federal jobs by appointment, or to obtain passports.

But the Truman administration has denied Senators the opportunity to support or oppose this bill. It has refused the opportunity to permit Senators to submit amendments in development on the floor. And a rumor has gone about that in due time the administration will bring out a watered-down substitute in an attempt to save face.

It doesn't seem credible that the administration which met aggression with force in Korea should coddle the enemy at home. It doesn't seem credible that the administration which is spending billions to draw a ring around communism all around the globe should protect Communists in Government and industry.

But it is happening, and the answer can be sought in politics. The CIO opposes the Mundt bill, and the Democratic high command has no intention of offending that loyal and powerful political machine. Moreover, the Democrats remember that the radical vote holds the balance of power in New York, and it isn't going to alienate it with election coming up.

Senator MUNDT is right when he says it is time to stand up and be counted on the question of communism at home. "Let us see what goes on behind the iron curtain of the Democratic Policy Committee of the Senate. Mr. President, this is war."

We must choose between unholy politics and survival.

The Pecosian Wildcats of Troy, Ala.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE M. GRANT

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. GRANT. Mr. Speaker, times of severe national crisis prove the hearts of men—real men. True and unchallengeable patriotism is forged down deep in the wellsprings of veneration for one's Creator, of loyalty to native land, of kindly consideration of one's fellow man, and a full and abiding respect for the verities which are the foundation of decent and dignified human conduct.

My colleagues, I proudly submit the list of men below as being worthy wearers of the badge of true patriotism—Americans in the highest sense. It comprises the members of the Pecosian Wildcats, the baseball team of Troy, Ala. Only one member is missing from this list—Charley Jackson, shortstop. He is only 17. Charley wanted to go, too, but they told him he would have to wait awhile.

Here they are:

These splendid young men from the district I have the honor to represent in the Congress, enlisted in a group in the United States Navy and left Wednesday for the San Diego Navy Yard.

How To Lose a War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. RALPH W. GWINN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1950

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in my remarks the article by Edna Lonigan entitled "How To Lose a War," published recently in Human Events.

Miss Lonigan throws new light on the established fact that only free, inventive, creative productive men win wars. Nations which put themselves in the straitjacket of the planned economy do not win their wars. They only build up a vast governmental propaganda machine, which says, "We, the Government planners, are responsible for the Nation's productive powers, and if only we can get more men and more money, we will win the next time."

A planned war economy brought Germany and Japan to their present low estate. Why should the proud, free, creative American people follow their examples? At this moment, when we are fighting for our very survival, we as individuals should be free from price compulsions and restraints that reduce our productive powers. It is increasing production we want. That alone reduces prices.

The article follows:

HOW TO LOSE A WAR

(By Edna Lonigan)

I

The idea is firmly implanted in the public mind today that to win a modern war it is somehow necessary to mobilize all the manpower and the resources of the Nation, putting labor, industry, farming, and even our intellectual life, under militarized central control, like that of the armed forces—what is currently described as total mobilization.

TAFT and other congressional leaders of both parties have said they would go slow in giving the President war powers over civilian life. But they rest their case on the hope that we are only partly involved in Korea. Thus they concede that if the war should spread there is no alternative to accepting militarization of all national life.

A great many Americans believe that victory in war, if it must be achieved by total conscription (with its inevitable dictatorship) will be hardly worth fighting for. The danger of all-pervading despair is real. From the purely psychological point of view, therefore, total mobilization is a dubious step. But there are more general objections.

It is too generally assumed that militarization of civilian life follows military developments which were inevitable because of the new technology, and that political totalitarianism ensued. The exact reverse is the truth. The political climate changed first, and political leaders remade the pattern of war in their image. When leaders possess total power, their war aims become more and more expansive. They mobilize more segments of national life and force them to greater efforts to win more fantastic ends.

Of course these political changes happen more easily in the crisis atmosphere of wartime. But the impulsion to make them does not spring from the problems of the new technology. It is to be found in the political shift from limited to total power.

Opponents of political totalitarianism will be impotent so long as they accept the fallacy that over-all mobilization is the only way to fight a war in the age of technology. Modern totalitarianism is weak, not strong; it is the product not of growth, but of decay.

The truth of the matter is that the war economy with its identical twin, thought control, is probably the best way to lose a war. Survival of the United States in the war in which we are now enmeshed, will depend on our ability to withstand the siren song of those who plead for total mobilization; for standing by the President.

II

Just as the alternative to total government is limited government, so the alternative to total war is limited war. In limited war the government of limited powers must set limited objectives, and so the military, whose means are always limited in fact, have a far better chance to win the war.

The idea of limited war lies deep in Christian ethics. The medieval church strove in every way to limit the impact of war and to surround it by restraints that would reduce its destructive power. When the Christian world divided, the humanists tried to limit war by the development of law, and far-sighted rules had by Marlborough's time imposed restraints on fighting as formal as the rules of chess.

The French Revolution brought the turn to total war. When the badly defeated revolutionary government decided to draft all the manpower of France, war ceased to be limited and professional. This fatal step reversed the direction of our ideas and reached its logical end in the totalitarian state or militarization of all elements of modern life.

Mobilization spread in ever-widening circles to all sectors of national life. Prussia extended military conscription to peacetime and made it permanent. Then Hindenburg's staff worked out the total conscription of production, manpower, and scientific knowledge in 1918. Next, the men who had been trained in Hindenburg's war socialism, like Walter Rathenau and Richard von Moellendorf, carried the idea onward to make the planned economy or total mobilization in peacetime.

Hitler, studying the weaknesses of the welfare state, worked out the last link—the technique for conscription of the mind—by which masses could be made a base completely servile to the new Nazi elite.

It is curious how few people ask the $64 question: Do the nations which adopt total mobilization actually win their wars? Germany, the greatest exponent of total mobilization, last its last two wars. The gradual spread of total mobilization all over the western world has had truly disastrous results. Wars have become more brutal; war objectives more manic; fruits of victory more infinitesimal. The periods between open wars have grown shorter and the descent to barbarism has gained increasing speed.

III

The idea of total war spreads, not because it is efficient but because it trains a body of men who like planning and control over other men. War gives them a vast propaganda apparatus by which to tell people that they, like Chantecler, cause the sun to rise.

The germs of conscription were planted here in the United States in 1918 when we trained a body of young men in habits of "planning" and control. Then Bernard Baruch, one of the young men, wrote down the scheme for immediate total mobilization of this country in the event of another war. Between the wars inertia preserved the ingrained American hatred of regimentation. But there was no active rebuttal of the new ideas, and the seeds grew.

When the Second World War was over, the American people had the energy for only a limited and shallow civil demobilization. Finance was kept under war controls. Industry was kept in near-mobilization by orders for defense and foreign aid. The supervising staff for national mobilization was kept intact in spite of Senator BYRD's valiant efforts to demobilize it. Most important, the party in power kept its dominance over public opinion. By the lightest of pressures the opposition was slowly choked, so that it could not crystallize its emerging ideas into dangerous thoughts.

The managers of "Plainwirtchaft" dress their demands for total power to meet the changes in fashions. Our Moellendorfs and Rathenaus in the President's Council of Economic Advisers, and other high places, have worked out blueprints for permanent management of all national life by the State. If we have unemployment, they call the plan "full employment." If we have prosperity, they call it point 4 In wartime they call it the Defense Production Act of 1950—H. R. 9176. The plans are fundamentally all the same. They are essential steps in the winning of power. They are not essential steps in the winning of a war.

Total mobilization in the past has had one brief advantage. It skimmed the cream of past creative free effort. Coming after a hundred years of industrial progress, it could appear successful in 1918. The Americans refilled the creative reservoir between the two wars and won the last conflict.

If we have any idea that this may be a long war, we dare not yield to the President's demand for creeping total conscription of all national life. We did not, as we said earlier, return to full creative free enterprise after 1945. We did not refill our reservoirs as we did after 1918. We cannot be certain of winning the last battle this time. Our margin is so narrow today that total mobilization, under the suffocating rule of the planners, could mean defeat.

IV

The big fallacy in total war is that we trust the chiefs of state to be infallible at the moment when their judgment is most fallible—when the opposition is no longer permitted to point out their mistakes.

In peacetime, men at the center of government beehive offices do not make better decisions than the rest of us. Under total mobilization, these bureacrats are even less likely to be right. Those who disagree with the chief are labeled as traitors, trying to lose the war. Thus the higher ranks are filled by timid men who say "Yes," trimmers, "Vicars of Bray," who work to build up the party so they can remain in power, and cold, clever men who deceive the chief while they build the power of their own faction.

When there is no strong opposition outside the party in power—not dependent upon it and not afraid of it—there is no way to protect decent men inside the Government whose objective is to serve their country, not to build a political machine. MacArthur and other patriotic military men cannot make the military decisions, and protect themselves against the State Department, without a vigorous opposition, able to tell their story to the country.

In wartime we need moral unity for one purpose—to win the war. Far from needing unity of ideas, we need competition of ideas. In the trial before us, we need a strong opposition party. We need also a strong independent Congress. On the economic front, we need all the free energy of farmers, industry, labor, instead of Government propaganda, forced saving, manpower, and price controls.

What of inflation? The greatest inflation today is in Government. If we take the inflation out of Government we can lay the specter of inflation for a long time to come. For example, the release of Government stocks of butter and cotton ought to precede the two-edged weapon of price controls. The short supply of steel could be relieved by full production in Germany. If we lay the myth that civil mobilization is a magic remedy we can deal with specific problems one by one.

Instead of total mobilization, we must be guided by the concept of limited war. We must take up again this idea of Christianity, of the humanists, of the great political theorists of the west.

It requires far more intelligence to manage limited war than total war. This offers a far more inspiring challenge to our abilities than the strait-jacket of total mobilization.

Income-Tax Exemption for Members of Armed Forces in Combat Zones

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. R. WALTER RIEHLMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. RIEHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced a bill, H. R. 9318, which would afford additional income-tax relief to those members of the armed services serving in combat zones only. It would give each person an extra $1,500 exemption.

With the reactivation of the selective service program, many selectees will sooner or later be found in combat zones. The financial hardship suffered by many of these men in the service, due to severing their positions in private life and giving up their homes, will be severe.

The fact that Congress has not declared a state of war exists or that the President has failed to declare a national emergency makes the proposed relief an equitable one between men on duty at the Pentagon or at stations in the United States of America and those at the fighting front.

Most of the individuals receiving relief from this proposal will be enlisted men and junior officers. Very few high-ranking officers, who are, incidentally, extremely well paid, will be found in the combat zones.

To be relieved of this amount of tax burden on their military pay while so engaged is surely a small reward for their sacrifices.

This would not be a continuing tax exemption; therefore, in the final analysis, the revenue lost to the Treasury would be comparatively small.

I hope that this suggested legislation will receive immediate and favorable action.

ECA Countries Still Doing Business With Communist Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am including as part of my remarks pertinent information indicating that our western European allies, for whom we are bleeding ourselves white, are still doing business with Russia and its satellite nations. These tables reveal that important potentials are going forward on a business-as-usual basis. I am sure the Members of this House will be interested in having the tables which indicate the extent of this inconsistent practice:

Partial list of exports from Belgium-Luxemburg during 1949 to Russia and satellite nations

Iron, cast iron, and steel	19,782,840

Confusion on Controls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the situation that has developed in connection with the pending controls legislation, in the hope that some of the events may be better understood, the news story from the Washington Post of August 4 follows:

HOUSE BACKS AUTOMATIC CONTROL PLAN—VOTE IS MANEUVER BY DEMOCRATS TO BEAT AMENDMENTS ON FLOOR TODAY

(By Alfred Friendly)

The House last night tentatively approved price, wage, and other economic controls so modified as to be almost a burlesque of what the administration asked for.

The measure, adopted after a day of frantic debating and amending, contains a provision for the automatic freezing of prices and wages when the cost of living increases by 5 percent—a provision President Truman yesterday characterized as an invitation to inflation.

Furthermore, by an anomaly understandable only in the light of the parliamentary traffic control rules of the House, the Democrats passed the amended bill yesterday expressly in order to be able to defeat the amendments today.

But—as if to make the situation even more like the outline of a Gilbert and Sullivan opera—the Democrats miscalculated on the rule. They got themselves into one of the worst parliamentary muddles of recent years. They found that if they try to defeat the bill, as previously planned, they may get something much worse.

MAY NOT DEFEAT IT

As of last night here was the situation:

The Democrats have on their hands a bill they don't know whether they want or not.

If they decide they want it, they may not be able to pass it.

If they decide they don't want it they may not be able to defeat it.

If they do defeat it, they face a 3- or 4-day wrangle without any idea of what they may get in its place.

As a result of amendments passed during the day, the economic control legislation came out:

1. With a term of life of only 7 months.

2. Minus authority to regulate commodity exchanges.

3. Without any mechanism to handle the labor problems the wage control provisions in other sections of the bill are almost sure to create.

4. With an "automatic trigger" provision for the invoking of price and wage freezes that denies the President what he feels is enough discretionary authority to administer them.

It is this last provision, perhaps, which constitutes the most objectionable feature of the bill, from the administration Democrats' point of view.

It provides that the President must establish wage and price ceilings—it is not clear on how wide a range of items and employments—whenever the Bureau of Labor Statistics' cost of living index rises 5 percent above the levels of last June 15.

The amendment was offered by Representative MCKINNON, Democrat, California, while Democratic legislators steering the bill were napping. It passed on a different voice vote, without even a standing division.

HIT ON STRATEGY

As this and other amendments began to whittle down the substance of the legislation desired by the Democrats, they decided on what they thought would be a smart parliamentary maneuver.

It was to pass the bill, as amended, in expectation of voting again tomorrow, on a technically different issue, to defeat all the amendments at one fell swoop. Consideration then would revert, it was thought, to the language of the bill as it was originally brought to the House floor.

That language was almost exactly what the administration wanted—controls over allocations, priorities, requisitioning, production financing, and consumer and real estate credit. It contained no powers, even on a permissive or stand-by basis, for price and wage control rationing.

Acting on this expectation, the Democrats mustered the votes to pass the measure. The tally was 159 to 128.

Under the complicated parliamentary rules of the House—it took half an hour for the Parliamentarian to explain the situation to Democratic leaders, after it was too late—the majority found it was boxed.

It will have the option this morning of trying to make permanent the bill it tentatively adopted yesterday, or of trying to defeat it. But if successful in the latter course, the measure will be back where it was 3 days ago--again subject to any amendment any Member may offer.

If the Democrats decide on the first alternative—trying to pass the bill--they may not have the votes to do it. For at least 25 votes in yesterday's majority were obtained by Speaker SAM RAYBURN, Democrat, of Texas, by the promise that the whole measure would be voted down today.

If, on the other hand, Democrats try to defeat the measure, they may find the Republicans suddenly making a switch and upholding the bill.

Even if they succeed in defeating all the amendments and getting back to the original bill, the prospect is for at least 3 or 4 days of considering new amendments—a process equivalent in rewriting the bill on the floor.

TRUMAN TOLD OF ACTION

As of last night, the Democrats had not decided what to do. Presumably they will have a plan of action when the House convenes at 10 this morning.

Shortly after the House passed the McKinnon amendment, reporters advised Mr. Truman of the action at his weekly news conference.

The President said he didn't think much of the idea. "It amounted," he said, "to an actual invitation to raise prices up to the 5-percent cost-of-living increase permitted." That automatic price rise would cause a wage rise. Then the old spiral such as we had in the last war would be repeated.

He added that he had never asked for price controls, but if the Congress insisted on giving them to him, he hoped there would not be any restrictions on the legislation.

He would like authorization, he said, to freeze prices, but not legislative direction saying he had to.

Meantime, the Senate Banking Committee, which is considering the economic controls legislation, battled most of yesterday with alternative proposals similar to that in the McKinnon amendment.

Initially, it heard testimony in closed session from W. Stuart Symington, Chairman of the National Security Resources Board. He relayed the administration's objection to automatic invoking of price and wage freezes.

Then, in a long session with Ewan Clague, Commissioner of Labor Statistics, further objections to the scheme—initially proposed Wednesday by Senator FULBRIGHT, Democrat of Arkansas—were developed.

As the day ended, committee staff members were given the task of trying to work out a semipermissive, semiautomatic scheme. The proposal called for giving the President discretionary authority to set prices and wages, and in addition, requiring him to affix ceilings to certain commodities and labor if the cost of living rose by as much as 6 percent.

Life and Immortality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 4 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, the quality of a man reveals itself most in his hours of crisis; on occasions when his sky is blackest; most of all, at times when he is on the borderline between life and death. Some months ago, Capt. James Patrick McGovern, who has often proved his devotion to the honor and freedom of his country, was suddenly struck down in body to such a degree that it was generally assumed he would die. Today, he is far on the road to recovered health and vigor. There is such a parallel between the will and spirit in his life and in his poem which he submitted to me, that I am glad to recommend it for publication in the RECORD. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD the poem entitled "Life and Immortality," by James Patrick McGovern, of Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIFE AND IMMORTALITY

So awesome are the marvels of mankind,
The realms of earth and sun and galaxy
No skeptic science and philosophy
Can strike the conquering brain and spirit blind.
The universe has light and breath and fire:
The gleam by which both faith and beauty grow,
The heart with joy and sorrows ebb and flow,
The finite love of infinite desire.
Our birth is man and God in unison,
A flower of nature in the body's clock,
A wonder greater than the acorn's oak,
A sign that after death souls may live on.
Man's mortal quest can so transcendent be Truth as his art wins immortality.

How Much Can the People Take?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I am including a letter from a constituent which indicates the temper of the people in my district relative to current problems and bungling in high official places in Washington, as follows:

Congressman LAWRENCE H. SMITH:

We the people who pay the astronomical bills, and furnish the loved ones, are getting fighting mad at the way the politicians are representing us. Truman should have been impeached. Acheson & Co. should get out, quick. There are men of unquestionable ability and patriotism to guide the United States through these bungled waters.

Instead of higher and higher and higher taxes (we know what lies in store for us), let us have longer working hours.

We're fed up with constant and conflicting Washington mouthings, and hurry up calls for more and more billions of our money, and for the lives of our loved ones to clean up the unholy messes (3 already in my 50 years of life) that the inept, or worse, leaders have created.

In '76, the Boston Tea Party acted with less provocation. How much are the people expected to take?

Our Government appears to strengthen the enemy and then to demand that the little people's money and loved ones go to save our way of life.

I am enraged at what has been going on in Washington during the last 20 years. We have crosses to bear without an administration getting us into "wah" every few years. America is running to ruin, and Russia won't have to do much fighting.

Oh, for rome Lindberghs and MacArthurs in high places.

Sincerely,

Mrs. A. S. H.

Comparison of Benefits Authorized for World War II Veterans and Peacetime Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including a table showing a comparison of benefits between World War II veterans and peacetime veterans. This material has been prepared by the office of legislation of the Veterans' Administration, and I am sure that the Members will find it most useful.

The table referred to follows:

Civil-service preference	Certain preferences in Federal civilian employment available to— 1. Veteran. 2. Wife of veteran who is unable to qualify by reason of a service-connected disability. 3. Unmarried widow. 4. Mothers (under certain conditions when widowed, divorced or separated) of deceased or service-connected, permanently and totally disabled veterans.	(See note 2): 1. Veteran, only if he served in campaign or expedition (for which a campaign badge has been authorized) or he has a service-connected disability. 2. Wife—same. 3. Unmarried widow, only if veteran served in campaign or expedition. 4. Mothers (under certain conditions, when widowed, divorced, or separated) only if veteran died on active duty during a campaign or expedition or veteran has a service-connected permanent and total disability.
Mustering-out pay	Payments from $100 to $300 upon termination of honorable service. (Certain categories of persons specifically excluded.)	No.
Homestead preference	Preference in acquisition and establishment of homestead rights to public lands. Veteran must have had 90 days service or service-connected disability. Widow and minor children also eligible.	No.

NOTE 1.—Benefits not listed herein which are available in like manner to both wartime and peacetime veterans are: Out-patient treatment for service-connected disabilities; prosthetic appliances; seeing-eye dogs plus certain equipment for the blind; special housing assistance (paraplegics, etc.); burial in a national cemetery; headstones or markers, and the death gratuity of 6 months' active duty pay for dependents.

NOTE 2.—For the purposes of sec. 2, Veterans' Preference Act of 1944, as amended, the terminal date of World War II has not been fixed by either statute or administrative regulation. Accordingly, persons currently being separated from the Armed Forces are not considered peacetime veterans for this purpose.

Further Evidence of Communist Sponsorship of Stockholm Peace Petition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many of my colleagues have had their attention called to what is described as an information bulletin entitled "U. S. S. R.," published by the Embassy of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics here in Washington. The issue under date of July 28 might well be featured as the Soviet Stockholm Peace Petition. It contains six articles, the titles of which are as follows: "The Soviet Union Is Leading the Fight for World Peace and Security"; "New Contribution of the Soviet People to the Struggle for Peace": "The Signatures of Peace Supporters Will Snuff Out Flames of War"; "One Hundred Million Signatures to Peace Petition in U. S. S. R."; "Russian Orthodox Church Supports Peace and Friendship"; and "Heroic Stalingraders Fight for Peace With Characteristic Valor."

The notation as to the covers reads: "The Soviet people vote for peace." The front cover purports to be a picture of a man signing something with a young man and a woman watching him. It is entitled "Signing the Stockholm Peace Appeal in a Kiev Factory." The back cover shows many people waiting to sign apparently similar petitions and is entitled "Factory Workers Signing the Appeal in Riga."

I now include four of these articles as further conclusive evidence of the Communist source of this false petition:

NEW CONTRIBUTION OF THE SOVIET PEOPLE TO THE STRUGGLE FOR PEACE

(By M. Mikhailov)

June 19, 1950, will go down in the history of the people's struggle for peace as an important date. On behalf of 200,000,000 Soviet people, the Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R. on that day expressed its solidarity with the proposals of the permanent committee of the World Peace Congress, with the appeal of the congress' Stockholm session on the prohibition of the atomic weapon, establishment of strict international control over the implementation of this prohibition, and the condemnation, as a war criminal, of the government which first uses this weapon of aggression and mass extermination of people. The Soviet parliament expressed its support of the Stockholm appeal by adopting a special statement.

The parliaments of the capitalist countries, as is known, did not support the noble, simple, and clear appeal of the permanent committee of the World Peace Congress. This was not done by the parliaments of those countries which do not possess the atomic weapon, much less by those which possess it. The Soviet Union possesses the atomic weapon, but it has again solemnly affirmed that it stands for its unconditional prohibition, for stable democratic peace and international cooperation.

A favorite trick of warmongers is to assert that the peace movement is allegedly Communist propaganda, that the campaign for signatures to the Stockholm Appeal is a distracting maneuver and the Soviet Union, supposedly, does not want the prohibition of the atomic weapon. A reply to these false assertions has been given in the repeated proposals of the Soviet Government calling for the prohibition of the atomic weapon and institution of strict international control over the implementation of this prohibition. The consistent Soviet peace policy has been expressed once more in the statement of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR on the proposals of the permanent committee of the World Peace Congress. This historical statement reads:

"The Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R. unanimously declares its solidarity with the proposals of the Permanent Committee.

"These proposals of the Permanent Committee of the World Peace Congress fully conform to the vital demands of all peoples and to their strivings for a stable and lasting peace throughout the world.

"Expressing the inflexible will of the Soviet people for peace, the Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R. declares its readiness to cooperate with the legislative organs of other states in the elaboration and implementation of necessary measures for carrying out the proposals of the Permanent Committee of the World Peace Congress.

"The Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R. expresses its confidence that the Soviet Government, which is consistently fighting for peace and cooperation among nations, will continue firmly and persistently to pursue this policy of peaceful and friendly relations among nations, to take necessary measures through the United Nations and to use all other measures to insure general peace and international security.

"At the same time the Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R. expresses its confidence that the peace movement, and primarily the afore-mentioned Stockholm appeal of the Permanent Committee of the World Peace Congress, will receive the unanimous support of the entire Soviet people."

In its foreign policy the Soviet Government has always proceeded and now proceeds from the principle of the possibility of the coexistence of two systems—Socialist and capitalist. J. V. Stalin has repeatedly pointed this out, emphasizing that cooperation between the U. S. S. R. and capitalist countries is quite possible in spite of the difference in their economic and political systems. Replying to the question of the Moscow correspondent of the British Sunday Times in September 1946, as to whether, with the further progress of the Soviet Union toward communism, the chances of peaceful cooperation with the rest of the world would remain undiminished, insofar as this depends on the Soviet Union. J. V. Stalin said: "I do not doubt that the possibilities for peaceful cooperation, far from decreasing, may even grow." In April 1947, J. V. Stalin told Harold Stassen: "Collaboration does not require that people have one and the same system. One should respect the system approved of by the people. Only on this condition is collaboration possible."

Such is the ruling principle of the Soviet state. It has again been expressed in the statement of the Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R.

It is common knowledge that the peace supporters in the various countries, while collecting signatures to the Stockholm appeal, demand an explanation from those political and public figures who directly refuse or, more often, avoid signing the appeal under various pretexts. Support of, or refusal to support the Stockholm appeal shows with whom this or that public man stands; with the fighters for peace or with the warmongers, for what he is striving, war or peace. But this is also applicable to governments and parliaments. In the Soviet Union, where there are no exploiting classes, which are the instigators of war, the entire people unanimously stand for peace. The people's representatives—deputies to the Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R.—reflecting the unbending will of the Soviet people for peace, expressed their solidarity with the Stockholm appeal.

Why is it that the parliaments of the Western Powers are not acting likewise but are, on the contrary, refusing even to listen to the peace proposals of the Permanent Commmittee of the World Peace Congress? An explanation for this should be sought in the fact that the parliaments of these countries support the aggressive policy of the imperialist governments, directed not toward peace but toward war. Those parliaments which wish to deny this now have an excellent opportunity to do so: to meet halfway the proposals of the Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R. for cooperating in drawing up and carrying out the necessary measures to realize the proposals of the Permanent Committee of the World Peace Congress. Not by pharisaical phrases and hypocritical oaths but by practical deeds alone can one's adherence to the cause of peace be shown.

Unfortunately the activities of the bourgeois parliaments do not display such adherence. With what are those parliaments occupied? They allocate tremendous funds for the armaments drive, increase credits for colonial warfare; misanthropic speeches, fanning war hysteria, are heard from the platforms of these parliaments.

The work of the Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R. is as far removed from the activities of the bourgeois parliaments, which are hostile to the cause of peace, as heaven from earth. The first session of the new Supreme Soviet, which adopted the statement in connection with the proposals of the permanent committee of the World Peace Congress, also discussed a number of other questions. All the decisions of the Supreme Soviet of the U. S S. R every one of the speeches made from the platform, dealt with the peaceful labor of the Soviet people, with peace and only with peace The Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R. approved the budget of the Soviet state for the current year. This is a budget of peace. Two-thirds of the total sum of the budgetary expenditures go to finance the national economy and social and cultural needs. Expenditures on defense do not exceed 18.5 percent of the budget. As compared with the prewar year of 1940 the share of these expenditures has been almost halved.

This is one more convincing proof showing that the entire policy of the Soviet land is permeated wtih an active struggle to insure peace and the security of nations.

The statement of the Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R. of June 19, 1950, is a new contribution by the Soviet people to the noble cause of the struggle for peace. This statement will inspire the fighters for peace throughout the world, who once again can see that in their struggle for peace they may safely rely upon the Soviet people, led by the standard-bearer of peace, the great Stalin. Encouraged by the unanimous support of the Soviet people, the peace supporters will add new hundreds of millions of signatures to the Stockholm appeal to the 250,000,000 already collected, and will frustrate the criminal plans of the imperialist warmongers.

THE SIGNATURES OF PEACE SUPPORTERS WILL SNUFF OUT FLAMES OF WAR

(By Leonide Sobolev)

The Kazakh people have an ancient legend. Once upon a time, so it goes, an upright man was sentenced to be burned at the stake.

When his execution started, a swallow flew to a lake and, after dipping herself in the water flew back and tried to put out the conflagration by sprinkling drops of water. A magpie saw it, laughed, and asked why the swallow was exerting herself so much, saying she could never put out the fire. Then the swallow gathered all the other swallows, they rushed in a veritable cloud to the lake, flew back, and the drops brought on their wings extinguished the flames, saving the upright man.

Perhaps to the ill-willed magpies in some countries our signatures to the Stockholm appeal may seem like drops on the wings of the swallow But, like the swallows, there are many of us. And we carry on our wings to the flames or war not drops of water but drops of tears of widows, mothers, and fathers, drops of tears of children, victims of the recent war imposed by the Fascists, drops of blood, our blood, shed for victory. These tiny drops, our signatures to the Stockholm appeal, will form a vast sea of human strength. And this sea will put out the conflagration of war.

The collection of signatures to the Stockholm appeal is proceeding now throughout the world. Not as easily and as freely as we do it in the Soviet Union, but with the same feeling of their strength, of the justice of their cause, and with the same confidence in victory, all honest men and women of the world are putting their signatures to this appeal. They are threatened; they are intimidated; attempts are made to prevent them from expressing their will. Those who imagine themselves to be the masters of the earth are doing everything to stem the multimillioned movement of peace fighters which grows daily. Nothing will come of it. We, millions of people striving for peace, will win. For we are mankind.

ONE HUNDRED MILLION SIGNATURES TO PEACE PETITION IN U. S. S. R.

Reports received by the Soviet peace committee indicate that the campaign for signatures to the appeal of the permanent committee of the World Peace Congress demanding prohibition of the atomic weapon has acquired truly nation-wide scope in the U. S. S. R.

From June 30, the date of the opening of the campaign, to July 10, the Stockholm appeal was signed by 96,360,866 citizens in the Soviet Union.

The collection of signatures to the appeal is under way in every district of the country, in cities as well as in villages. According to reports received from commissions formed to assist the Soviet peace committee, the overwhelming majority of the citizens have already affixed their signatures to the appeal in many big industrial centers: Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, Minsk, Baku, Tbilisi, Tashkent, Riga, Stalingrad, Novosibirsk, Sverdlovsk, Gorky, Kharkov, Kuibyshev, Kazan, Odessa, Stalino, and Rostov.

The campaign for signatures has been crowned with success in all union and autonomous republics of the U. S. S. R. All peoples of the multinational Soviet country give their unanimous support to the appeal for outlawing the atomic weapon and condemning as a war criminal the government that would be the first to use this weapon of aggression and mass annihilation of people.

The campaign for signatures is taking place everywhere in an atmosphere marked by high political uplift and redoubled effort on the labor front. Hundreds of thousands of Soviet people spoke at meetings and rallies held in connection with the campaign. Workers, peasants, intellectuals, Soviet women, and youth declared their wholehearted approval of the peace policy of the Soviet Government and expressed the unanimous readiness of the working people of the U. S. S. R. to act together with the peoples of other countries in defense of peace and international security.

Signing the appeal of the Permanent Committee of the World Peace Congress, Soviet workers, collective farmers, and intellectuals back up their ardent desire to safeguard the cause of peace with selfless labor designed to strengthen the might of the Soviet state as a bulwark of peace in the whole world. In factories and mills, collective and state farms, and in machine-and-tractor stations, the working people arrange Stakhanovite "peace shifts" with the object of exceeding production plans, raising quality, and reducing the cost of production. In districts where the harvesting has already commenced, the farms are making grain deliveries to the state ahead of schedule.

The success attending the campaign for signatures to the Stockholm appeal in the U. S. S. R. is a powerful demonstration of the moral and political unity of Soviet society, of the devotion of the Soviet people to their Government, to the Bolshevik Party, to the great standard bearer of peace, J. V. Stalin.

The collection of signatures to the appeal of the World Peace Committee demanding prohibition of the atomic weapon continues.

ONE-EIGHTH OF MANKIND HAS ALREADY SIGNED STOCKHOLM PEACE APPEAL

Only 4 months have passed since the peace appeal was initiated by the Stockholm session of the Permanent Committee of the World Peace Congress, but today signatures to this historic document total about 250,000,000. Thus almost one-eighth of the population of the world has already taken part in the great referendum of peace, has spoken out for the prohibition of the atomic weapon, and the branding as a war criminal of that government which shall first use the atom bomb.

There is not a single country in the world where the campaign to collect signatures to the Stockholm appeal has not met with broad response. Ever new strata of the population are being drawn into the movement for peace. The consciousness of the threat of a new war and of the necessity to struggle for peace, the consciousness that only a steady and persistent struggle for peace can wipe out the threat of a new war has grown among the broad masses of the people.

The tremendous popularity of the Stockholm appeal is due to the fact that it reflects the most vital demands of the great majority of mankind.

The lists of signatures to the Stockholm appeal are lists of those who want peace and who are rising up in defense of it. These are lists of hundreds of millions of people of good will, and among these people the many millions of Soviet citizens hold a place of pride.

May I call to the particular attention of my colleagues the report in the first of these articles with reference to the "statement of the Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R. on proposals of the Permanent Committee of the World Peace Conference" and the allegations with reference to the fact that the parliaments of the capitalist countries did not support "the noble, simple, and clear appeal of the Permanent Committee of the World Peace Congress." Surely it is clear to the great majority of the peoples of the countries whose governments repudiate this false peace petition as to the reasons. But I do urge that the Congress of the United States should make even clearer, by taking specific action on House Concurrent Resolution 247 or similar legislation, the exact nature of this cynical and deceptive piece of Communist propaganda.

American Legion Deserves Compliments for Urging Parents To Teach Children Religion

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 31, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, the American Legion has recently had printed for distribution a very beautiful and timely colored postcard. No; it is not a picture of the Stars and Stripes. No; it is not a picture of a battle-scarred hero. These cards you would rightly expect and welcome from this great patriotic order of distinguished veterans.

Mr. Speaker, it is a colored postcard picturing an American mother in her living-room chair at bedtime for her two children. The young daughter at her left, devoutly kneeling with folded hands, and plainly in prayerful attitude. At her other hand is pictured her young son, in like position, unto that of his sister, a little older than is he, as he too kneels in prayer with his head devoutly resting upon his mother's knee. And the mother? She, too, has an attitude of prayer—as well as an apparent sense of just pride and happiness for the occasion.

At the top of and above this postcard in attractive colored lettering are these powerful words:

No child has a chance who hasn't been taught to pray and love God.

And just below the knees of the two praying children on the card are these words:

How about your children?

American society may collapse for want of loyalty, decency, honesty, and unselfishness. Americans—let's give them and America a new chance—teach children religion.

On the face side of this strikingly significant card, is this language:

The altars of God are the hope of the Nation—the principles of religion alone can avert spiritual, moral, and economic bankruptcy. Going to church regularly will make happier homes and a better community life.

I bought and paid for some of these at 1 cent each. Mr. Speaker, you, my colleagues, can do likewise from the national office of the American Legion, Washington, D. C. I urge you to do likewise, for I know you concur in every word printed by the American Legion on this official card of theirs.

During my first term in this Congress I stated on the floor that there was no permanency to legislation unless it sounded in spiritual values and resourcefulness.

Think it over—as to what this American Legion card says to you and to us as national legislators. This card speaks to every thinking man, woman, and child in America.

I compliment the Legion upon this further contribution to sound, patriotic thinking and living in our great Nation.

War Claims Commission

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial which appeared recently in the Washington Post:

WAR CLAIMS DELAY

One of the lingering tragedies of World War II is the way in which payments to former prisoners of war have been delayed. Under the War Claims Act, Americans who were prisoners of war in enemy countries are granted $1 for each day of their imprisonment, a sum designed to compensate them for violations of the Geneva Convention with respect to humane treatment, food, and the like. Although civilian internees were not covered by treaty, they likewise suffered inhumane conditions and are to be reimbursed a flat sum per month. Such payments come, not from the taxpayers, but from proceeds of enemy property impounded by the Alien Property Custodian.

Of the 135,000 claims received so far by the War Claims Commission, only 7,000 have been paid, although 5 years have elapsed since the end of the war. The appeals that come in from men broken in health and now destitute are heart-rending. At least 150,000 more claims are expected, since Filipino soldiers mobilized into the United States Army also are entitled to compensation for their treatment at the hands of the Japanese. Settlements are now running at the rate of 2,000–3,000 claims a month. Even allowing for a doubling in the rate of payment, it is apparent that nearly 4 years will be required to pay out the remaining claims.

The delay has resulted from no negligence on the part of the War Claims Commission. The staff has worked overtime to bring cases up to date; but it is simply inadequate to handle the volume. The appropriation for 1950 was only $286,000; for 1951 the request of over $1,000,000 has been pared by the Bureau of the Budget and stands at $700,000 in the Senate bill and $600,000 in the House bill. Since the money comes out of enemy funds and is only indirectly a charge against the Treasury, why cannot the Claims Commission be given the appropriations it needs to work at a maximum rate? One of these days war claims from the Korean conflict are going to be coming in, and certainly a better procedure for payment ought to be worked out before then.

A Great American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES C. DAVIS
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 31, 1950

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, on June 17, 1950, a deserved recognition was accorded to the senior Senator from Georgia, Hon. WALTER F. GEORGE. On that date a bronze likeness of Senator GEORGE was unveiled on the courthouse lawn in Vienna, Ga., the home town of the Senator.

The address of the occasion was delivered by the eloquent Representative of Georgia's Third Congressional District, Hon. STEPHEN PACE, who is completing his seventh term in the United States House of Representatives, and who, to the great regret of the membership of the House of Representatives, is not offering for reelection.

In his usual able manner Congressman PACE spoke eloquently of the great service which Senator GEORGE has rendered to the people of Georgia, to the Nation, and to the world.

It is most fitting that this inspiring address delivered by one of the most respected and beloved Members of the House of Representatives on the occasion which honored one of the most able and effective legislators ever to serve in the other body, should be preserved in our imperishable records.

Therefore, under leave previously granted, I insert herewith Congressman PACE's address:

A GREAT AMERICAN—A TRIBUTE TO SENATOR WALTER F. GEORGE

(Delivered by Congressman STEPHEN PACE in Vienna, Ga., on June 17, 1950, at ceremonies for unveiling the Walter F. George Recognition Monument erected by the Georgia Vocational Association)

It is a splendid thing you do today, to assemble here to honor a faithful public servant. It has moved me deeply to be chosen as the one to express a tribute in behalf of the people of Georgia.

In a little while you will witness the unveiling of a small bronze likeness of Senator WALTER GEORGE, erected here on the grounds of the courthouse where, in 1901, he began a long and distinguished career of public service: From 1901 to 1907 as a practicing attorney; from 1907 to 1912 as solictor general; from 1912 to 1917 as judge of the Superior court; from 1917 to 1922 as a justice of the court of appeals, and the Supreme Court of Georgia. Then, since 1922, as a United States Senator.

Certainly, there could be no more appropriate place for this monument.

Nor could there be a better time. So often we wait too late to tell those who have served us well that their efforts have won our appreciation and everlasting gratitude. How fine it is that the object of our admiration, while still in love with life, can be here with us today and observe this public demonstration of our respect and regard and witness this unveiling by four youthful representatives of the boys and girls and the men and women who have benefited so much as the result of his labors.

Yes, tell him now while he can know "all the sweet and tender feelings which from real affections flow."

Why this memorial? Who is responsible for its erection, and what prompted them to bring it about? But a generation ago, public education for the most part, was confined to the knowledge and training obtained from books. Our boys and girls were taught the three R's, some English, a few of the arts and classics, but none outside the professions were instructed in the practical application of their learning, except as teachers.

Our educational leaders realized the urgent need of going outside the classroom and offering our young people the opportunity of being trained in some vocation which would lead to their early employment and provide them with a livelihood.

Though still but a youth, after having taught school for 2 years, and while a student at Mercer University, WALTER GEORGE was faced with the stern realities of life and the fear of having no choice but to return to the classroom as a teacher in the event he was unable to secure the funds needed for instruction in the law. It was then, so early in life, that there came to him a full understanding of how different it would be if our schools offered courses in vocational training.

Soon after entering the United States Senate there came to WALTER GEORGE the opportunity to contribute in good measure to the rapid expansion of this type of education. The Congress had in 1917 responded in a feeble way to the pressing need. Then Senator GEORGE took over and has sponsored every piece of Federal legislation relating to vocational education since he began service in the United States Senate.

The result has been: The George-Reed Act of 1929, the George-Ellzey Act of 1934, the George-Deen Act of 1936, and the George-Barden Act of 1946. One after the other, advancing and expanding the basic objective of vocational education, which is to prepare our young people for occupations in industry, in home economics, and in the training and employment of physically disabled persons.

Rarely does there come to one the opportunity to be of equal public service. Never has one applied himself more earnestly and constantly in the service of the young men and women of our State and Nation. Aside from the millions who have benefited and profited from this training in the years before, we find that in 1949 there were 141,000 in Georgia, and over 2,000,000 in the Nation as a whole, taking advantage of the special training offered through vocational education programs.

Those are the ones who have placed this monument here; those are the ones who are responsible for its erection—the hundreds of thousands of Georgia boys and girls, men and women, able and disabled, whose opportunities in life have been broadened, whose standard of living has been raised, whose hopes and dreams have come true, through the long and tireless efforts of our senior Senator. In their hearts they have erected to him a shrine, and on this plot of ground, through the contributions of their nickels and dimes and dollars, they have placed a permanent memorial so that the generations to come may know and understand.

Some months ago, Senator GEORGE publicly stated that the most satisfying work of his public service has been in the field of vocational education, that through these programs he felt some permanent contribution has been made to the general welfare of the country.

How much the same was the reaction of Thomas Jefferson, one of our greatest Americans and public servants, when he requested that there be included in the inscription on his tomb the words "Founder of the University of Virginia" because he regarded it as one of his greatest achievements.

In the same manner did Robert E. Lee look upon his work during the last years of his life. Although one of the world's greatest masters of military strategy, he took special pride in his service as President of Washington College at Lexington, Va., now Washington and Lee University. It was there that he directed the training of the future leaders of the New Era, upon whom would rest the responsibility for the solution of the problems, and whose shoulders would carry the burden of the social, economic, and political reconstruction, of his beloved Southland.

What a feeling of satisfaction must come today to Senator GEORGE—not only from the great service he has rendered in bringing about this expansion in our educational methods in order to meet the needs and changes in our national life—social, industrial, economic, scientific, and political, but also from the knowledge that his efforts to that end are understood and appreciated by those he has served.

And he continues his efforts to increase the educational opportunities of our young people, as well as improve the standards and economic welfare of the teachers who instruct them, by pressing for passage of a bill to authorize Federal aid for education. Of course such aid, to be acceptable to Senator GEORGE, to me and to you, must be as free from Federal control as have been the funds provided for vocational education.

And mention needs to be made of another outstanding accomplishment of Senator GEORGE in a closely related field—that is, on-the-farm training for veterans.

It will be recalled that during the war the Congress enacted what is commonly referred to as the GI bill for those young men and women who were defending our country in its hour of greatest peril. Among other provisions, this law promised the veteran, whose education or training was delayed, interrupted or interfered with, by reason of his service to his country, that following his return home he would be offered the opportunity to complete his education or training. He could, under certain limits, do this in the schools and colleges, but if he intended to follow a certain trade or profession, he could complete the necessary training on a job, rather than attend college. Millions of veterans availed themselves of the opportunities provided by this law, and the education and training they received has contributed to the economic welfare of the country as a whole.

But, in late 1946, General Bradley, then Veterans' Administrator, prepared for issuance an order which would have, in effect, denied this training to those veterans who intended to make farming their life work.

Upon learning of the contemplated order, Senator GEORGE immediately notified General Bradley that such an order was not in accordance with the law nor in keeping with the intentions of the Congress, and urged that the issuance of the order be delayed until the Congress could act on the question. After repeated appeals by Senator GEORGE, the order was delayed.

In early 1947 the House passed the Wheeler bill to make certain that this training would remain available to veterans who operated farms. But when the bill was brought before the Senate, then under Republican control, it met the violent objection of the Republican leader. Determined efforts were made to prevent the Senate from even considering the bill. Senator GEORGE made an impassioned plea to the Senate, pointed out the threatened discrimination against the farm veteran, and urged the immediate consideration of the bill. He succeeded in this effort, defeated the plan to recommit the bill, and secured its passage by the Senate. But for the skilled and effective work of Senator GEORGE it is doubtful this training would have continued for the farm veterans.

But, let it be said, this is only one instance indicating the service Senator GEORGE has rendered all living veterans and their dependents. Throughout his service in the Senate he has shown sincere understanding and appreciation of the Nation's debt to those who have gone forth to battle. And certainly it can be said that the veterans have shown their understanding and appreciation of his service to them.

Last December it was my privilege to come here and witness the delivery to Senator GEORGE of one of the most highly esteemed awards in this Nation—the distinguished service award of the American Legion. In presenting the award the department commander said: "This award is seldom authorized--few ever measure up to the standard required." After pinning on his breast the simple but cherished legion emblem, the department commander presented to Senator GEORGE the following citation:

"During his long and distinguished public service as Georgia's senior United States Senator, WALTER F. GEORGE has endeared himself to the veterans of Georgia, who have found him a tried, true, and trusted friend of every righteous cause to which the American Legion has dedicated its efforts.

"In the dismal depths of the severe economic depression of the 1930's when the Economy Act brought such tragedy to thousands of veterans and their dependents, Senator GEORGE proved his steadfast friendship by his vigorous insistence upon the redressing of the more glaring evils of this notorious piece of unjust legislation.

"Both in Congress and in private life, Senator GEORGE has proven himself a bulwark of strength in helping maintain a sound foreign policy, backed by an adequate state of national preparedness, a sound fiscal program for the United States, and has continued to back every effort sponsored by the Legion for a peaceful, just, and secure world.

"Wherefore, in recognition of his exemplary contribution to community, State, and Nation, and in appreciation of his unselfish devotion and service to the principles of liberty, peace, and the right of individuals to the pursuit of happiness, the Department of Georgia, the American Legion, at its thirty-first annual convention in Augusta, Ga., on this the 12th day of June 1949, confers upon Hon. WALTER F. GEORGE, United States Senator and gold-star father, its distinguished service award in testimony of its abiding gratitude and regard."

And, of course, the successful efforts of Senator GEORGE to retain the GI training program for our farm veterans is only one of countless occasions when he has rallied to the support of the farmers of Georgia. It has been my high privilege for the last 14 years to work constantly, almost daily, with him in planning the national farm program and in securing its enactment by the Congress. Fortunately, having been born on a farm and being a farmer himself, he understands our farm problems and the difficulties we have encountered in meeting them.

Just as he brought about the expansion of our educational system with respect to vocational education, so has he supported and helped to secure the passage of laws to authorize and expand our present farm program to provide rural electrification, adequate farm credit, support prices, soil conservation, soil building, agricultural research, tenant purchase loans, and numerous other sound and helpful measures. No man in the Nation has contributed more than Senator GEORGE to raising the standard of living on the farm and assuring the farm people of their fair share of the national income.

Possibly there are some who may feel that the small monument which we unveil here today may not be in keeping with the monumental service our senior Senator has rendered his State and Nation. But I think I know the heart of the man—and I'm sure Senator GEORGE would have it this way.

As you travel over the world you will find here and there enormous statues and triumphal arches, reaching upward toward the sky. But for the most part they were erected with funds taken from the helpless subjects to commemorate blood-thirsty conquests.

Such is the Arch of Titus in Rome, commemorating the capture of Jerusalem and the scattering of the unhappy Hebrews to become a wandering race in many lands.

In Paris, in the center of the Place de la Concorde, there stands the Arc de Triomphe de l'Etoile, the largest triumphal arch in the world, placed there by Emperor Napoleon I to celebrate the French conquest of Prussia, Austria and Russia.

WALTER GEORGE would want no part in such as those. Much rather would he prefer the modest simplicity of the one we unveil today, paid for with the small voluntary contributions of those whose opportunities in life have been broadened through his efforts, and bearing the simple inscription—"WALTER F. GEORGE—Champion of Vocational Education."

"No crown of laurel does he seek,
No loud acclaim among the crowd,
For fame would prove a winding shroud.
And crown would mean a shackled hand
Tied down by the ungrateful band
Of men who trample down the weak."

Let me add a final word.

I have real concern regarding the future of our country. This fear arises from the present efforts on the part of men in prominent places to cause the people to believe that they should be supported by their Government. They speak only of rights and freedom; the right to jobs, the right to homes, the right to education, the right to have a voice in government, the right to equal justice; freedom of thought, freedom of expression, freedom of worship, freedom from want, freedom from fear, and on and on.

But not one single word about the duties, obligations and responsibilities of citizenship. Not one word of what men should do, of what men must do to earn these rights and to preserve these freedoms.

With every right there is a duty, with every freedom there is a corresponding obligation, and it seems to me the time has come when those in high places should get back to these fundamentals. The performance of our duties and the fulfillment of our obligations come first. We should first earn our privileges before we enjoy them.

For years now the people have been told of nothing but their rights, they have been advised constantly of the freedoms to which they are entitled, and today there are millions of people in this country who have no understanding of their responsibilities of citizenship and have no desire or intention of assuming them.

We all cherish our rights and they must be protected. We all treasure our freedom and it must be vigilantly guarded. But these rights will not survive, nor will this freedom long continue, unless those who enjoy them daily perform the tasks required for their protection and preservation. They are not self-perpetuating. They can be kept and rightly belong only to those who have the courage, the industry, and the determination to guard and defend them.

Those who claim the right to equal justice must first be just. Those who demand the right to a job must be ready to do an honest day's work. Those who demand a home must be willing to labor and pay for it. Those who would have a voice in government should contribute to its support and respect its laws. Those who would be free of want and fear must be ready to help the needy and refrain from any conduct which would bring fear or danger to others. And those who would enjoy freedom of opportunity must undergo, if necessary, the same hardships, dangers, and trials as did the brave men who established here the greatest land of opportunity known to man.

Yes, the land of opportunity—that is America. A land where young WALTER GEORGE, born the son of a tenant farmer, could work and study and strive, and, through his own determination and efforts, rise to a place of the highest eminence in the councils of his country. There are few places on this earth today where that can happen. And now, as the most respected Member of the Senate of the United States, he is devoting his life to the effort to make sure that the young men and young women who come after him may have the same privileges and opportunities he enjoyed.

May I, in conclusion, express the earnest hope that when evening comes and the shadows fall, when the hour of quiet meditation is here, you drop to your bended knees and thank our Gracious God for WALTER GEORGE and for his continued strength of body and mind.

"He only asks to be a man whose will is right,
Whose law is truth,
Whose heart is just with age and youth;
And who can see in sky and clod
The rich deep nobleness of God."

Mining Equipment for Yugoslavia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALT HORAN
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under the privilege of extending my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am pleased to include a letter from Mr. Frank Lilly, of Spokane, which I think is well worth bringing to the attention of all Members of Congress:

SPOKANE, WASH., July 27, 1950.

Hon WALT HORAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR WALT: When I read in the paper a few days ago that a Spokane firm had secured a contract to provide half a million dollars worth of mining equipment for Tito's government in Yugoslavia, the first reaction was pleasant because I like to see business come to Spokane. But this feeling was dulled somewhat when the article went on to state that this equipment was to be paid for with funds which the United States had advanced to Tito.

Later on, when I thought the matter over and considered the use to which the lead produced with the aid of this machinery might be put, my attitude in the matter suffered a chill. This lead will either enter the United States to compete with United States producers or it will be shipped to Tito's side-kick Joe Stalin.

If the lead is shipped to the United States, Tito will be paid in gold on the basis of $35 an ounce and that gold will probably reach into the Russian economy where it is used on a basis of over $79 an ounce.

If, on the other hand, the lead is shipped to Russia, it could get into munitions that would be turned against us, as happened with the copper, lead, and iron we shipped to Japan.

I believe that Bert Lahr, if he were alive today, might say, "I was wrong when I said that monkeys were the 'cwaziest' people because some of the things we have done and are doing with our money put us in the category of the 'cwaziest.' "

With best regards.

Sincerely,

FRANK LILLY.

National Defense and Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 4 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by me in reply to questions and inquiries on the war in Korea, American foreign policy, national defense, economic controls, and taxation.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, OF MINNESOTA, ON NATIONAL DEFENSE AND KOREA

A visit to your Senator's office and a review of the thousands of letters that come to me every day, would outline in clear and unmistakable terms the thinking of the people of Minnesota and other parts of the country. What are the questions our people are asking? What is it they expect their Government to do? What programs do the people propose to meet the international crisis and the needs of our domestic economy? These and many other problems come over my desk in an ever increasing flow of letters, telegrams, resolutions, and long-distance telephone calls. It is the purpose of this news letter to give you my observations on some of these problems and questions. Needless to say, the situation that confronts us is an ever changing one. It is difficult to have precise and definite answers to meet the problems of a world that is in convulsion and a domestic economy that has been hard hit by the impact of a major international crisis.

A preponderant majority of the letters and telegrams I receive ask the questions: What have we done for South Korea? Have we provided any aid? Why was South Korea so unprepared to meet the Communist attack? Here are some of the answers:

American occupation forces were withdrawn from South Korea in July 1949. In looking back it is easy to criticize this decision, but it has been a traditional policy of our country not to extend our occupation in friendly areas, but to promote self-government and to restore the country to the people. Again we miscalculated and failed to understand the menace of the Communist conspiracy. This is due not only to the decision of our Government, but to the basic humanitarian and democratic desires of our people.

When we withdrew our Armed Forces from South Korea we left vast quantities of war material and munitions in the form of antitank weapons, artillery and other equipment in the amount of $110,000,000. This equipment was estimated to be sufficient for a force of 50,000 men. It included more than 100,000 rifles and other small arms; more than 2,000 antitank bazookas with 40,000 rounds of ammunition: more than 4,900 vehicles and a large number of 37- and 57-millimeter antitank guns, 105-millimeter howitzers, 60- and 80 millimeter mortars, with more than 700,000 rounds of ammunition for these weapons.

In addition, we turned over to South Korea more than 40,000 Japanese rifles with ammunition. To this must be added 79 vessels, including mine sweepers, landing craft, and picket boats, along with about $150,000 worth of spare parts.

American assistance to Korea, however, was more than military aid. Our economic aid totaled $350,000,000 from the end of World War II until the beginning of ECA for Korea. In the closing months of 1948, for example, the first year of ECA, Korea received more than $30,000,000 in aid, consisting of shipments of 75,429 tons of rice; 54,451 tons of wheat; 12,362 tons of barley; 150,775 tons of salt; 3,?44 tons of dried milk; 190,967 tons of coal (from Japan); 148,926 tons of ammonium nitrate; 39,329 tons of ammonia sulfate; 12,352 tons of lime phosphate; petroleum, raw gum, cotton, wool, machinery, and cable cars totaling 679,807 tons.

Dr. Edgar A. J. Johnson, Director of the Korea aid program of the ECA, revealed that as of July 5, 1950, and since January 1, 1949, the ECA had authorized a total of $113,000,000 additional in commodities to aid the new Republic.

We also supplied many technicians and a great deal of technical assistance in order to help the South Koreans place their country on a financially sound basis. Out of the $113,000,000 in ECA aid received in Korea since January 1, 1949, $31,000,000 was for fertilizers; $16,000,000 was for coal and oil; $6,000,000 was for machinery.

As a result of our technical aid, the industrial output of South Korea was increased 62 percent in 1949, and has shown a corresponding increase in 1950

The fertilizers shipped to rebuild the worn-out soil of the South Korean agricultural lands have been responsible for an increase in the rice yield per acre from 23 bushels in 1947 to 30 bushels in 1950.

In addition to these, our 1950 military assistance program provided some $27,500,000 for Korea, Iran, and the Philippines.

We face serious days ahead and it is important that we not be misled by political statements made for political advantage. We have aided South Korea, both militarily and economically. Some of those who are the most insistent critics of our present difficulties in South Korea were members of a political coalition, both in the House and in the Senate, that vigorously opposed the Marshall plan, the point 4 program, and military assistance. A few months ago a political coalition in the House of Representatives temporarily cut off all aid to Korea. It was only after a dramatic appeal by our President that the vote was reconsidered and Korean aid was reestablished.

The South Korean Army was primarily a defensive force. It was trained and equipped for local police action. It had no weapons of aggression. It is clear that the North Korean Communist forces have been supplied by the Soviet Union. The North Korean Army was trained for aggression and was equipped with powerful modern weapons to press a military attack. Both the South Koreans and our own county underestimated the force and power of the North Korean Army. We have a habit of underestimating the strength of our enemies. The most recent evidence before the North Korean attack was our failure to properly evaluate the power of Japan and the ruthless force of Hitlerism.

There is yet another factor that must be honestly faced. The peoples of the Asiatic areas have suffered under the yoke of colonial exploitation. They have a fervent desire for independence, to be rid of the white man's domination and particularly that of the Western Powers. The peasantry, the poor folks, the natives, want land redistribution. The Communist propaganda has found fertile soil because of the memory of colonialism and imperialism. The Communists have redistributed the land. They talk nationalism, they talk a united Korea; a united Indochina; a united China. The hungry, the sick, and the illiterate peasant and native is easy prey for the subtle and vicious Communist propaganda and tactics. It is for these reasons that our program in Asia must not only embody sufficient Armed Forces to resist aggression and maintain law and order, but we must have a clear statement of our political aims and our economic objectives that can be understood by the underprivileged. the sick, the hungry, and the oppressed. It is here that we have failed, even more than in the military aspect. The President's program of economic and technological assistance to the underdeveloped areas of the world represents a political and economic offensive to clean out the points of political and economic infection where communism grows. Unfortunately, the Congress has failed to recognize this. Even now the point 4 program of economic and scientific assistance has been cut another 10 percent. This will furnish additional propaganda value to radio Moscow and the Communist propagandists. We must be as bold in our political and economic aims as we are in our military planning. American policy in Asia in particular must emphasize the protection of national independence, the lifting of the standards of living and the offering of economic and technological assistance to the governments and the people so that these new nations may help themselves.

WHAT HAS HAPPENED TO THE DEFENSE DOLLAR

Literally hundreds of letters coming to my office ask the question again and again: "What has happened to the better than $96,000,000,000 which we in the United States have appropriated for our national defense since the end of World War II. Why, with such tremendous expenditure of funds, do our forces appear to be so weak in Korea?" To answer these questions, the Washington Evening Star recently asked the Department of Defense for an accounting. The report is frank and honest and shockingly revealing of the tremendous cost of even elementary military preparedness in this day of modern warfare. It reveals how amazingly little of the defense dollar goes for the purchase of actual fighting equipment.

Few people realize that for every dollar that is contributed to the Army, Navy, and Air Force, only 18 cents is available for guns, ammunition, tanks, aircraft, and ships. The largest part of the dollar—40 cents—goes for pay or salaries, food, clothing, transportation. Here is a breakdown of the defense dollar:

	Cents
Salaries, food, clothing, transportation	40
Operations and maintenance of equipment	26
Weapons, planes, ships, etc	18
Research and development	5
Administration and secret work	4½
Reserves and National Guard	4
Industrial mobilization	1
Retired pay (nearly)	1
Construction, public works	½
Total	100

With this in mind, let us see just how much we have expended for defense in the 5 years since VJ-day. Our highest World War II budget for defense was $84,500,000,000 in 1945. The postwar budgets were:

1946	$45,134,000,000
1947	14,316,000,000
1948	10,961,000,000
1949	11,914,000,000
1950 (exclusive of Korean supplementary budget)	13,335,000,000

This totals $95,650,000,000. Of this total, nearly $42,000,000,000 was spent from the end of 1945 until June 1946, our demobilization period, which responded to the very natural desire of the American people to have our boys back home. From June 1946 to June 1947, we continued to demobilize and spent about $14,000,000,000 in the process.

Defense officials tell us that our defense expenditure can most accurately be counted from July 1, 1946, to June 30, 1950. Almost $20,000,000,000 went for payrolls, food, clothing, and travel; $13,000,000,000 for operating and maintaining military installations and tactical equipment around the globe, and nearly $9,000,000,000 for procurement of planes, tanks, rifles, artillery, ships, and other combat tools. In evaluating these expenditures, we should also remember that they included the very costly airlift operations which saved Berlin not so very long ago and that these appropriations also included support of our occupation troops in Europe and Japan.

In summary, our defense dollar has had a huge chunk taken out of it by expenses which have produced no tangible equipment for our foot soldiers, fliers, sailors, and marines. In fact, 70 cents out of the dollar went for housekeeping and operational costs. Our fighting men must not only be supplied with ammunition and guns, but must be paid, fed, clothed, housed, and transported.

These facts should be made known to the American people.

During the past 2 years I have received many hundreds of letters demanding economy, urging reduction in the Marshall plan, in our armed services budget, and in a host of other essential appropriations. My files are filled with these letters. I am proud and happy to report that I have refused to vote for a single reduction of Marshall-plan funds or any other foreign-aid program, nor have I voted to reduce appropriations for the armed services. In fact, on several occasions, through public statement and public speech, both on the floor of the Senate and in public meeting, I have pointed out that our expenditures for national defense could not be reduced without jeopardizing the national security of our country.

In the month of May 1950, addressing the Kiwanis Club of St. Paul, Minn., I stated very frankly: "We need more money for national defense, not less. We need to expand ECA and the point 4 program, not restrict it. We are living in a world menaced by Communist aggression. It is either more dollars for defense or the sacrifice of your boys. As one Senator, I refuse to vote for a cut in military preparedness or in foreign aid." My observations were based upon the testimony of General Eisenhower and other military leaders who appeared before the Senate Armed Services and Appropriations Committees.

ECONOMY OR FALSE ECONOMY

The Korean crisis has brought foreign policy to the forefront. The people are asking questions about our national defense and the general conditions and strength of our Armed Forces.

The main points of our American foreign policy are based upon (1) the Marshall plan or ECA, (2) the North Atlantic Pact, (3) military assistance, (4) the point 4 program for technological and scientific assistance to underdeveloped areas, (5) the Voice of America and other educational and informational services, (6) American participation in the United Nations and its support of UN agencies.

National defense, of course, means more than appropriations for the armed services alone. World War II taught us that national defense is also based upon the conservation and development of our natural resources, such as our forests, mines, waterways, and land.

We learned the importance of hydroelectric power in World War II. In the beginning of that war, we had a 40-percent reserve in electric power; today we have a 15-percent reserve. We learned the importance of adequate supplies of food in World War II.

Land reclamation and irrigation was a basic factor in our war effort. The production of sugar beets, for example, was vital not only for food purposes but also for munitions. Expanded sugar-beet production was made possible by irrigation and land-reclamation projects in Wyoming, Colorado, western South Dakota, and other Western States. It is therefore very clear today that efforts to curtail our programs for conservation, inland waterways, public power, REA, agriculture, land reclamation, and irrigation were as shortsighted in the interests of our national defense as were efforts to cripple our armed services. The same can be said for efforts to cut the Marshall plan, the Voice of America, point 4, and our foreign information and educational services.

American security is not fully protected by an army, a navy, and an air force alone. A militant, positive foreign policy is a fundamental part of our national defense. American military power is dependent upon the ability of our industrial economy to produce vast quantities of goods, and the ability of our agricultural economy to meet the requirements of total defense. Industrial production needs electric power and adequate transportation. The relationship of hydroelectric public power, water transportation, reclamation, and irrigation to American industrial and agricultural production is clearly evident.

All of these programs are vital to national security. Military power in great part depends upon long-range strength and productivity of industry, of land, and of people.

AMERICAN POLICY IN THE FAR EAST

The North Korean Communist attack crystallized American policy in the Far East. The President's program is not a reversal of past State Department and Presidential policy; we have always been pledged to the aid of the Philippines, we have repeatedly assured the United Nations that we would support its efforts to maintain peace and order; the ECA authorization provided funds for the China area, which included Indochina; military assistance also provided such funds. The North Korean attack necessitated quick and positive action (this action followed the developments of policy in the Far East insofar as our commitments were concerned through treaty, UN, ECA, and military assistance). The President's statement of policy following the North Korean attack is being altered and strengthened on a day-to-day basis as the military operations develop in that area. It is crystal clear that we are not going to be pushed around by Communist military pressure. It is equally clear that more attention will be paid to southeast Asia in the months to come. The Far East or Asiatic policy will include:

1. Our traditional policy of support for the territorial integrity and independence of the Asiatic nations.

2. Expanded and more generous economic assistance.

3. Military assistance in the form of supplies and key personnel.

4. Strengthening of bases in the Philippines, Japan, Okinawa, and Guam.

5. Closer collaboration with Australia, New Zealand, Great Britain, France, India, and other free countries.

6. Information, educational and propaganda offensive by the United Nations and Voice of America.

The task of statesmanship today is to keep the war from going into an all-out war. We are mighty close to such a situation. We need time to increase our strength and to strengthen our allies. Any slip or ill-advised move could participate an all-out world war III. It is for this reason that American mobilization has proceeded step by step and rather cautiously. Our problem is not to get caught in Korea by diverting too much manpower and equipment there, only to have another major outbreak in Iran, or Yugoslavia, Finland, Germany, or somewhere else. President Truman, the national defense officialdom, and the State Department advisers are moving along the following lines:

1. An immediate request for an additional $10,000,000,000 for American defense.

2. A request for an additional $5,000,000,000 for military assistance to the North Atlantic Pact countries.

3. Relying upon General MacArthur and our forces in Japan, strengthened by additional divisions and replacements from continental United States to repel the North Korean attack.

4. Activation of selected Reserve units of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marines. Emphasis has been placed upon armored units, aircraft units, engineers, and other tactical combat teams. Also the strengthening of the Marines, America's valiant amphibious combat force.

5. An ever expanding use of the Selective Service to bring the Armed Forces up to a minimum of 5,000,000 officers and men. The Congress has removed all ceilings on the number of military personnel and extended the enlistment period for the duration.

6. Increased emphasis upon the stockpiling of critical materials. This program will be stepped up into high gear.

7. Selective opening of training camps and stand-by factories, such as powder plants, synthetic-rubber plants, tank and artillery factories. Four billion dollars of additional orders have been placed for combat aircraft. Emphasis will be placed upon tactical aircraft, the need for which is demonstrated in North Korea. Emphasis to date has been upon long-range bombers, capable of attacking the heart of the Soviet.

8. All-out production of the A-bomb and the H-bomb. Reports indicate that A-bomb production is being stepped up rapidly.

9. Reactivation of a substantial portion of the reserve fleet. This includes both combat vessels and maritime units needed for transporting supplies and men.

10. Refurnishing and putting into active service large numbers of combat aircraft left over from World War II. This same program extends to mechanized equipment, vast quantities of which are in storage.

11. Stepped-up production in weapons, many of which are still in the blueprint stage or available in only limited quantities. The new bazooka gun, more heavily armored and fast-moving modern tanks, are on the priority list.

The additional appropriations for military assistance to the North Atlantic Pact nations is vitally important. It is safe to predict that American forces on the European continent will be greatly strengthened and new equipment made available. Our North Atlantic allies have already been called upon to expand their own defense program, to step up military production, while we pour in new arms and equipment.

THE UNITED NATIONS—AN INTERNATIONAL FORCE

It is the general consensus in Washington that we may be subjected to an epidemic of these international crises along the North Korean pattern. The Soviet Union does not need to use her own national forces. She has her satellites who will carry the burden of the fighting. It appears that Soviet troops will be used only when Russia is ready to enter in an all-out war. It becomes obvious that if the United States must take the responsibility for squelching every Communist uprising and attack all over the world, we will seriously weaken ourselves. This hard fact demonstrates the importance of the United Nations and the collective and combined effort of the members of the UN, other than the Soviet bloc, to stand together and to undertake responsibility in their particular areas.

We should make it crystal clear that American troops are in Korea as UN forces. If America attempts to police the world on her own, the Soviet can bleed us white while we fight her Communist satellite armies and she continues to develop her own national forces without additional strain on her economy.

It is imperative that we recognize that the UN is our international force created to meet the conspiracy of international communism. Fifty-six nations are supporting the UN resolution on Korea. These 56 nations represent a great deal more strength than the Soviet Union and her satellite states. We as a people and as a Government must do everything within our power to bring the other 55 nations to an understanding that world peace cannot be maintained by the United States alone. It can and will be maintained by the United Nations acting together. We have demonstrated in Korea that we will do our part, but we ought to make it clear that the struggle against international communism can be successfully made only when the freedom-loving people represented in the United Nations work as a unit, each doing what it best is able to do, each contributing what it is capable, and each undertaking responsibilities according to its strength of manpower, industry, and armed services.

I believe this concept of the UN enforcing world law and world order is the one means that we have of defeating the Communist plot to overwhelm the free and independent nations of the world.

WAR ECONOMICS

The American people are asking their Government to take positive and decisive action to prevent a disastrous inflation.

We as Americans must face up to the hard facts of the world in which we live. Our Armed Forces must be strengthened. This will require billions of dollars of additional appropriations. Many of our industrial plants must be converted to the production of military equipment and supplies, both for ourselves and our allies. This will require curtailment of consumer goods and the allocation of critical materials to defense industries. Such a program will necessitate allocations and priorities. We will need to utilize our manpower to meet the requirements of national security. Skilled workers and technicians must be released from civilian production and shifted into defense production. We must be prepared to pay the bill. War is not cheap, nor is the protection of our national security to be had at cut-rate prices. All of this means higher taxes, sacrifice on the part of the people back home, while men are giving their lives to defend our freedom and to preserve law and order. Just as the Communist aggressor is an enemy on the international front, so is inflation, runaway prices and profiteering a vicious enemy on the home front. Your Government must take every necessary measure to take the profit out of war and to check skyrocketing prices.

The proposals advanced by the elder statesman Bernard Baruch, and more recently by a second great American, younger in years, but far-sighted and wise and forthright from experience, the Honorable Chester Bowles, Governor of Connecticut, are receiving widespread support. One thing is unmistakably clear. We must prevent price gouging, profiteering, and inflation. To do this action is needed. I support the following program and have recommended this program to the Congress.

1. The President must be given the authority to impose price ceilings immediately on basic commodities at the wholesale and producer levels. These prices must be rolled back to their level between June 15 and June 25.

2. The President must be given the authority to impose priorities, production controls, and the allocation of resources in accordance with our objective to maintain full production.

3. The President must be given the authority to impose consumer retail price ceilings to a level between June 15 and June 25.

4. The President must be given the authority to impose wage controls necessary to maintain the consumer price level.

5. The President must be given authority to impose rationing of those consumer commodities in which shortages may take place. It may be that such rationing will not be necessary at all, but we should be prepared lest inequities take place at the expense of the American consumer.

6. The President must be given the authority to allocate manpower when necessary.

7. The Congress must act to strengthen our existing rent-control laws, extend them and allow for recontrol whenever housing shortages exist.

8. The Congress must immediately enact a program of tax increases on individuals and corporations. Basic to such a program must be an immediate enactment of an excess-profits tax to be effective as of June 25.

There is no room for profiteering in a democracy while American soldiers sacrifice themselves on the battlefield and their families sacrifice on the domestic front.

All of these proposals are necessary if we are to save ourselves from a breakdown of our economy. The cause of human freedom is at stake. The world is engaged in a great conflict of the two philosophies of life—the one, the democratic philosophy, is based upon respect for the individual and his rights as a free man; the other philosophy—the Communist-totalitarian doctrine—is based upon the principle of force and fear where the individual is but a slave and tool of the power-crazed dictators. Sacrifice is never easy, but sacrifice in behalf of freedom is a noble work. I, for one, believe that the American people are prepared to make whatever sacrifices are necessary.

Editorial Exposure of Stockholm Peace Petition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. HASELTON. Mr. Speaker, I am including eight excellent editorials which have been published recently in our American newspapers with reference to the Stockholm peace petition:

[From the Berkshire Evening Eagle, of Pittsfield, Mass., of Tuesday, August 1, 1950]

STRESS PUT ON "PEACE" PETITION SHOWS ITS IMPORTANCE TO RUSSIA

It is hard to see, after the Russian-sponsored invasion of South Korea by the North Koreans how anyone with an I. Q. over 85 can be sucker enough to fall for the so-called Stockholm peace petition demanding the abolition of the atom bomb. Yet the apparent fact that more than a million signatures have already been obtained in this country, and the number is increasing even while our soldiers are being killed by Russian tanks in Korea shows how some people will be gulled by words even when the words are simultaneously being discredited by the deeds of those who utter them.

The petition in question was composed by the Cominform, the Communist foreign-propaganda agency, which has made no secret of its sponsorship. Even more significant is the importance that the Communists put on the petition.

Since the imprisonment of alias "Eugene Dennis" for contempt of Congress, headship of the ACP has been taken by alias "Gus Hall" (Arno Gust Halberg) one of 11 convicted Commies awaiting the result of an appeal from Judge Medina's sentence. This is what Hall has written about the circulation of the petition:

"I want to state as emphatically as I can that the Communist Party must get into this campaign as we have never entered one before. This is one central campaign, and not the circulation of separate petitions in different cities and States, as has been the case thus far.

"This must become the central task of the party. There will be no exception to this. No district, no section, no club, no member is exempted from participation with the maximum energy in this campaign."

Why is Russia, with a military establishment bigger than all the rest of the world put together, so opposed to one kind of war? Why does it want to ban the atom bomb, when it has refused all efforts designed to restrict its production and to permit inspection of manufacturing by the UN? Why are the American Communists, who justify the North Korean attack and exult in the invaders' success in war, going into such a lather on the subject of peace when it involves the atom bomb?

One explanation supplies all the answers. The one place in armament-making where the United States leads Russia is in making the atom bomb. Winston Churchill declares that it is only the United States possession of the bomb that prevents Russia from starting war now. While Russia has the bomb, the belief is that it is several years behind us, and will not have any stockpile equal to ours for some years. If therefore, the A-bomb can be outlawed until Russia overtakes our lead, no nation can use it to defend itself in the event of an attack by Russia or its satellites.

The whole history of Russia's actions is proof of the hypocrisy and cynicism of the Kremlin. If Moscow wanted peace, disarmament and real international control of the A-bomb, it could have had all of them years ago. The present peace drive is a thorough phony, as shown by the fact that the Stockholm petition says nothing about surprise invasions like that of June 25. It is hard to see how it could fool anyone except a numbskull and there is no evidence so far that it has.

WHEN WAR IS PEACE

Neither the fury of the North Korean attack nor the energy of the Stockholm peace petition squads shows any signs of abatement. By next Tuesday, the pro-Communists hope to have the names of a million New Yorkers on those "Sign for peace" petitions. This is language with a strong appeal to the ancient American hatred for war and violence, and a number of innocent people have been trapped by it.

The are in unpleasant company. The Stockholm peace pledge has been signed by Leonid Sobelov, a Soviet novelist, who interpreted it last month as an oath to sabotage food, trains, munitions, and communications all over the non-Communist world. The Communist armies in Indochina call the Stockholm pledge a "sincere decision to help in the slaughter of the French enemies." And German Nazis are taking the pledge, too, at the invitation of German Communist Leader Otto Grotewohl, who last week invited all who mourn for Hitler to join his national front of democratic Germany.

Such are the legions of the "peace loving." They know that the Stockholm pledge is as much a weapon of aggression as the tank. We hope that democratic Americans will understand this trick as well.

[From the New Orleans Times-Picayune of July 31, 1950]

POISONED PEACE PLEA

The so-called Stockholm peace appeal was made in Moscow and put in circulation by a Stockholm meeting only to disguise its source and inspiration. The Swedish Government, through its premier, formally protested the use of the name Stockholm in connection with a piece of international Communist propaganda.

Since then, Moscow's Red jukebox Pravda has let the peace-plea cat out of the bag, revealing its inspiration and purpose. According to a Pravda writer, signer of the Stockholm peace appeal automatically pledged to sabotage the defense undertakings of every non-Red country. The signer was committed, the Red authority insisted, to these performances:

"It means that I shall do my utmost to prevent war. I shall stop the trains; I shall refuse to unload the ships carrying war materials; I shall not supply fuel for the planes; I shall seize the arms of the mercenaries; I shall not allow my son or my husband to go to war; I shall deprive the ministers of food, drink, telephones, transport, and coal."

That call to all-out sabotage in the free countries is addressed to the nationals who were duped into signing the poisoned peace plea. Signers living inside the iron curtain know better than to start any such foolishness against the aggressive military moves of their Russian masters. Whether American signers can be transformed, by the Red interpretation and command, into fifth-columnists and saboteurs apparently is doubted by some of the people who are circulating the spurious appeal in this country. In New York some of them denied any knowledge of the Moscow message and any purpose to incite treason and sabotage against the United States.

In Sweden, thousands who signed under a total misunderstanding of the "appeals's" meaning and purpose have revoked their signatures since their Government exposed the thing as an international Communist racket. The same popular revulsion against it is reported from Denmark. The masked Communist drive for signers in the United States persists. A lot of Americans are addicted to the bad habit of signing unread all petitions or appeals poked at them. But they should be on their guard against this misbranded and poison-baited Red proposal—manufactured in Moscow to make the way of Russian aggression easier.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of July 27, 1950]

FOG OF HALF-TRUTHS

In today's letter column from the people, Lou Kimmel asks the Post-Dispatch a question and by inference makes a serious charge against us. Mr. Kimmel, who is chairman of the organization circulating here the Stockholm peace petition, asks whether we propose the use of the atomic bomb in Korea.

We agree with military experts who point out that use of the atomic bomb in Korea is senseless, because bombing targets there are so small that high explosive bombs can do the job as well, or perhaps even better. We hope that it never will be necessary to use an atomic bomb anywhere, just as we wish it were never necessary to use rifles or tanks or fighter planes.

But as long as there is aggression in the world, and there is in Korea, then such old-fashioned weapons are necessary, and we cannot say, as Mr. Kimmel and his supporters would have us say, that an atomic bomb will never be necessary. The United States alone cannot agree to tie its hands in advance in this matter without knowing what the circumstances may turn out to be. Particularly can we not agree to dispense permanently with the atomic bomb when Russia has made it abundantly clear by its actions in the United Nations that it reserves the right to use the bomb whenever it likes.

For only Russia and its satellites blocked a United Nations plan which would have made use of atomic weapons impossible. Instead Soviet Russia wants to outlaw atomic weapons in the same way that poison gas was outlawed. This is by unenforceable agreement and where there is no good faith there can be no outlawing under that system, as was demonstrated when all nations in the last war made poison gas.

Further weaknesses in the Kimmel argument are listed in the letter from Mr. Cook which follows Mr. Kimmel's. In addition, as this newspaper has pointed out previously, the peace petition is a fraud because it defines use of atomic weapons, not aggression, as a crime; because it includes no workable method of achieving peace, and because of its Communist sponsorship. International communism is backing the invasion of South Korea. International communism hopes only to weaken and divide the free world by misleading people with good intentions into signing these petitions for the benefit of Moscow's propaganda machine.

Finally, Mr. Kimmel wishes to know whether we wish to abrogate the peoples' right to petition their government. That is a fundamental right which should not be abridged. But equally fundamental is the right to point out which petitions serve the best interests of the people and which do not; which are honest and which are spurious.

[From the Portland Oregonian of July 25, 1950]

NAME PHONY, TOO

The Swedes are indignant over the Communists' tying the name of their capital city to the phony Stockholm peace petitions now being circulated in many parts of the world, including Portland. So said Baron C. H. von Plate, first secretary of the Swedish Embassy in Washington, when he landed in New York the other day. Stockholm, he said, has no more connection with the petitions than any other democratic capital.

The Communists undoubtedly choose the name of the Swedish capital to promote their peace campaign in a deliberate effort to mislead potential signers of the petitions. Sweden is known the world over as a peace-loving nation where capitalism and socialism have worked well together. Its citizens have successfully served as neutral mediators between warring factions on several occasions. If it could be made to appear that the Swedes were behind the peace move, some otherwise reluctant signers might be persuaded that the petitions were legitimate.

The petitions could just as well bear the names of New York or Paris, for phony peace conferences were held by the Communists in these cities prior to the session last March in Stockholm. None of the three conferences reflected public opinion of the countries in which they were staged.

The Swedes should proclaim their indignation loudly enough for the world to hear, that the reaction may be directly opposite to that intended by the Soviet sponsors, which was to convince all people that the Soviet is a seeker of peace and the United States an imperialistic warmonger.

[From the Oakland (Calif.) Tribune of July 28, 1950]

PRAVDA AND PEACE

We are glad to note that the Communists who are circulating their phony peace petition in many parts of the world, including Oakland, are running into opposition. A loud protest comes from the Swedes, because the Reds call their propaganda tricks the Stockholm peace petition. Baron C. H. von Plate, first secretary of the Swedish Embassy in Washington, pointed out the other day that Stockholm has no more connection with the petitions than any other democratic capital. Since the Swedes are known as a peace-loving people, famed as neutral mediators, the Reds try to make it appear that they are back of this piece of Soviet chicanery. To anyone who has the slightest comprehension of what is going on in the world today this is absurd, but the gullible are many.

At this late date if there are any who see any desire for peace in Stalin's words or actions, let them consult the way that the Soviet press is handling the Korean war. The contrast between peace petitions and the actual relation of Soviet propaganda to peace ought to be convincing to anyone outside the Communist Party. Pravda told its Moscow listeners of the foulness of the crime perpetrated on Korean soil. It said malignant capitalism is striving with maniacal persistence to herald its own exit by transforming the whole world into a graveyard. It asks:

"In what way is President Truman, that sanctimonious hypocrite, perpetrator of so many bloody deeds in all corners of the earth in postwar years, instigator of murderers, traitors, and marauders, today's murderer of Korean women and children, better than the mad Fuhrer?

"Truman, bustling like a haberdashery shopkeeper, scribbling envenomed, manhating epistles; whispering under cover with the professional butchers, the Bradleys, MacArthurs, and other Forrestals, signing the order for intervention in Korea with an ominously scratching pen—such is the unseemly, disgust-provoking spectacle of the world of imperialist gangsters in the grip of violent insanity."

The spirit of peace, indeed, and yet this is the home background of the petitions now circulated in our midst. Here we have not the will for peace but the desire of a dictator to terrify his own people into further submission out of xenophobian fears.

[From the Kansas City Star of July 28, 1950]

THE TRUTH AS A WEAPON

The "Stockholm peace appeal," which now has been repudiated by some 12,000 of its signers in Sweden, was drafted last March at a meeting of the permanent committee of the Communist-run World Peace Congress held in the Swedish capital. It marked the beginning of what was expected to be a new Russian peace offensive. Three months later North Korean troops, equipped with Russian tanks and obviously directed by Russian strategists, crossed the thirty-eighth parallel in what the United Nations Security Council has termed "unprovoked aggression."

The Stockholm appeal thus emerges as one of the most cynical gestures yet made by the Kremlin. For it is clear that the Korean attack was being prepared at the very moment when Moscow's propaganda agents were telling foreign Communists and fellow travelers that the only threat to world peace was the aggression being planned by the Anglo-American imperialists, with the aid (1) of the atomic bomb and (2) of the North Atlantic security pact.

So instructed, the eager dupes of the Kremlin drew up a manifesto to be circulated among peace-loving peoples throughout the world which pledged its signers to work for an international outlawing of the atomic bomb (without any effective international inspection or other safeguards consistently refused by the Soviet Union) and, in substance, to sabotage the distribution of American arms for the defense of western Europe. This typical piece of Communist trickery seems to have achieved its maximum effect in the Scandinavian countries. About 200,000 Swedes, for example, are reported to have fallen for it.

Of these, rather more than 5 percent would appear to have discovered their mistake—within a month after the United Nations had labeled one of Russia's Asiatic satellites an aggressor. A similar process of disillusionment is said to be evident among the fellow travelers in Denmark. And, indeed, the Stockholm maneuver already had failed of its basic purposes either to generate worldwide support for Russia's atomic hoax or to halt the flow of our military supplies to other Atlantic pact states, even before the invasion of South Korea.

On the other hand, it is disturbing to note that as yet the free world has done little or nothing to exploit the fact that communism—for all its talk about peace—has produced the first unmistakable act of armed aggression since the end of the Second World War. The United Nations today should be trumpeting that amazing paradox to the far corners of the earth. It should not be necessary for 12,000 Swedes to conclude on their own that they had been deliberately trapped into signing a spurious peace appeal for the benefit of the nonpeaceful foreign policy of the Soviet Union.

The United Nations today is having to fight to defend what it long ago described as the only legitimate government in Korea against what it has more recently declared to be an aggressor, acting in defiance of the world community and jeopardizing world peace. The official Russian position is that this is a civil war and that the North Koreans are merely trying to unify their own country against illegal interference from the outside. The truth is that the United Nations is seeking to uphold the freedom of an Asiatic people in the face of an imperialistic attack. But this truth is not being used as a weapon.

[From the Los Angeles Times of Thursday, July 27, 1950]

HOW TO HANDLE PEACE PETITIONERS

This is a warning.

If anyone comes to your door, or accosts you on the sidewalk, with a petition sponsored by an association calling itself the Partisans of Peace—don't sign it.

If you really want peace, that is.

This petition is straight from Moscow, despite that the fact that it's sometimes called the Stockholm peace appeal. The Communists met in Stockholm, Sweden being one of the free nations that still tolerate these vermin, but the Prime Minister of Sweden has taken pains publicly to repudiate their actions.

A TROJAN DOVE

This petition, which Secretary of State Acheson called a Trojan dove, is part of Russia's phony peace offensive. So is the murder of American boys in the Korean war, which the whole world knows Russia started, and could stop in a minute if the Kremlin had any use for peace.

Don't stain your hands by signing.

Los Angeles, according to the official Communist paper, the New York Daily Worker, is a primary target of the petition effort. It calls upon every member of the Communist Party to turn his entire activity to the drive. Locally, the Daily People's World has echoed this party line.

ATOMIC WEAPON

The petition is cleverly gotten up. Uninformed persons, sincerely hoping for peace in the world, might see no objection to signing it. It starts off with an out-of-context quote from the UN Secretary General Trygve Lie, blessing everyone who works for peace. This is printed in large blue letters. It goes on to recite a resolution, passed by "delegates of 52 nations, including the United States," at the World Peace Congress in Stockholm, March 1950. Ironically, this is precisely the number of nations (though not the same ones) who have condemned the Communist aggression in Korea.

The peace resolution reads, in part:

"We demand the outlawing of atomic weapons as instruments of intimidation and mass murder of peoples. We demand strict international control * * * we believe that any government which first uses atomic weapons against any other country will be committing a crime against humanity and should be dealt with as a war criminal. We call on all men and women of good will throughout the world to sign this appeal."

There follows a place for the signer's name, address, and occupation. The Daily Worker gives away the reason for these blanks:

"If we can reach millions with the peace appeal, we shall be involving new millions in the success of all other struggles."

Unless you want to be involved, don't sign.

If you do sign, you are agreeing that the Government of the United States, from President Truman down to every member of the Armed Forces in World War II, is guilty of a crime against humanity and should be dealt with as a war criminal. For it was this Government that first used the atomic bomb.

Notice that there is no mention of outlawing other forms of aggression and mass murder, such as shooting American prisoner of war in the face. Only atomic weapons, which Winston Churchill has said alone restrain Russia from plunging the world into another bloody war.

AND CALL THE FBI

A resolution of the International Red Cross, a widely respected organization, is skillfully worked into the petition propaganda. Red Cross officials have been quick to disclaim it. But such tricks may fool some Americans, as they have people in European countries. For example, 10,000,000 Frenchmen reportedly signed. Russians, Poles, Chinese, and East Germans, of course, signed or else.

The man or woman who asks you to sign this World Peace Appeal may be only a dupe of the Communists, though enough warnings have been published in this country to make it unlikely. If he is not, he is a traitor and an enemy of the United States working against this country while enjoying the freedom and protection of its laws.

What should you do? Don't punch him in the nose, or slam the door in his face. Reds are used to that. The thing to do is ask him for his credentials of identification; get his name and address if you can, take a good look at him, and then telephone the FBI. President Truman has asked all loyal citizens to report subversive activities known to them. But get some facts first.

And don't sign.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 4 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement sent to me by former Representative Gerald W. Landis, of the Hoosier State of Indiana. It is something unusual in the nature of a public-sale bill. Believing that many of my colleagues will enjoy reading it, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUBLIC SALE

I will offer at public auction to the highest bidder, at the United States Capitol Grounds at 10 o'clock on Wednesday, November 8, 1950, the following described property, to wit:

Declaration of Policy on the Present World Crisis by the Italian-American Labor Council

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 4 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, the Italian-American Labor Council was organized during World War II to unite Italian-Americans in the labor movement in the fight against the forces of nazism and fascism which were at that time threatening us. This organization never failed to recognize the evils not only of the dictatorships which emerged in Italy and in Germany, but also of the Soviet Communist regime which now threatens the world's freedom throughout the world. The Italian-American Labor Council has moved quickly to support the actions of the United Nations and of President Truman to combat aggression in Korea. The resolution is an admirable statement of the fight for freedom and democracy which we must wage.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD this declaration of policy of the Italian-American Labor Council.

There being no objection, the declaration was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECLARATION OF POLICY ON THE PRESENT WORLD CRISIS

The Italian-American Labor Council assembled at a special meeting on July 20, 1950, hereby officially defines its stand on the present world crisis in which are involved not only Korea but all of humanity.

Our organization was formed a few days after Pearl Harbor at a call issued by representatives of unions who had fought uncompromisingly against fascism, nazism, and bolshevism for many years.

A new, reliable, and vigorous leadership was given to all Americans of Italian descent who furnished during the entire duration of that war magnificent proofs of loyalty and a tremendous contribution to the victory of our country over black and brown totalitarianism.

While aimed principally at winning the war against Fascist and Nazi totalitarianism, the policies of the Italian-American Labor Council also took into account the potential dangers deriving from the so-called united fronts with totalitarian Communists, and therefore refused to enter any tactical combination with these enemies of freedom. The present world crisis, precipitated by the Moscow instigated, planned and directed aggression against South Korea, is a definite confirmation that the freedom-loving people can never expect any fair play from Stalinite totalitarianism.

It is also a reminder that when in its honest and sincere search for agreements, harmony and peace, democracy allows totalitarians to take control of strategic positions of any kind, these enemies of liberty, utilize them to attack democracy on the first favorable occasion.

So while our present aim is to win the war in Korea under the flag of the United Nations, we should be careful to prevent the defeated totalitarians of yesterday, black, brown, or yellow, being given the possibility of returning to the control of economic, political, geographical and military positions from which they could attack and destroy the freedom of mankind in a third world war. This warning is not the result of dreams into the future, but is based on historical experience and on clear signs of neo-Fascist and neo-Nazi come-back that can be observed in many places.

The Italian-American Labor Council pledges its full and energetic support to the stand taken by President Truman on behalf of the United States, and by the United Nations, to resist and defeat aggression in Korea, and calls on all the workers of Italian descent, who are such an important factor in the basic industries of our Nation, to cooperate fully and enthusiastically to the successful mobilization decided upon by the leadership of the entire American labor movement.

We as Americans of Italian extraction welcome news from Italy showing that only Togliatti's Communists and his satellites of Menni's party are supporting Moscow aggression, while all the Italian democratic parties, including the Socialist Party of Italian Workers and the Unitarian Socialist Party, have condemned the Cominform aggression in Korea and denounced the fake and fraudulent character of the so-called petition for peace being circulated by Moscow agents all over the world.

The Italian-American Labor Council feels that in this new world crisis, we can defeat more surely and quickly our enemies and safeguard the best interest of democracy, if we are careful to avoid—

(a) all policies that could help bring water to the mill bf Moscow propaganda which is busy picturing the United States as the citadel of reaction and exploitation, of monopolistic capitalism, and which tries to link and identify our free democrary with fascism and Wall Street special interests;

(b) all policies and acts which could endanger or restrict our civil liberties, the very foundation of the invincible power of our Republic;

(c) all such nonsense as collective discrimination against native born or immigrants who had been deceived for some time into falling into Communist outfits, and who have later sincerely broken away from Moscovite communism, opposing effectively and skillfully for several years its principles, aims, policies, and organizations;

(d) all attempts to retreat from the road of social progress or to renounce the legislative reforms aimed at enlarging the horizon of social justice in America and in the world.

As an organization with much experience in international struggles, we warn the American people that enemies of freedom of any kind can never be our sincere and sure allies. These totalitarians have joined hands in the past and they can do the same all over again in the future.

The road to victory—definite victory—is to be followed with democratic methods and democratic forces serving democratic ideals. Along this road, the peoples of the world—including the enslaved people of Russia and the masses of European and Asiatic workers deceived and betrayed by the Cominform—will join us and work with us in building the unbreakable pillars of world freedom and peace.

Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 10, 1950

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following statement of Mr. Ewan Clague which emphasizes my remarks made on the floor of the House concerning prices:

TESTIMONY OF EWAN CLAGUE, COMMISSIONER OF LABOR STATISTICS, DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, BEFORE THE SENATE BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND 1948–50

Beginning in April 1950, there was an upward movement of prices. This movement has been accelerated since the outbreak of the war in Korea.

In general, average prices, both at retail and in primary markets, reached their peaks in the summer of 1948. The over-all movement was then slowly downward until the spring and summer of 1949. At that time, prices generally became remarkably stable, and moved very little until the spring of 1950. High consumer incomes and generally good business then pushed prices slowly upward. By mid-June 1950, there were many indications that, for most commodities at least, there was again a tendency toward stability. Late in June, however, when the Korean outbreak occurred, prices began moving up again very sharply, following the same general patterns as in 1941.

I. THE BLS PRICE INDEXES

The Bureau of Labor Statistics price indexes measures price changes at three levels of distribution: (1) In the commodity markets and organized exchanges—the daily index of commodity prices; (2) in the primary markets where manufacturers sell their goods to distributors and to retailers and where they purchase the semifabricated materials that they need to make their finished products—the wholesale price index; and (3) at retail the prices that consumers pay for the goods that they need in their daily living—the consumers' price index.

The daily index of commodity prices is extremely sensitive and frequently has a large speculative element in it. It includes 28 basic raw materials—nonferrous metals, some agricultural commodities like wheat and corn traded on the Chicago Board of Trade, hogs and steers, and some imported raw materials like rubber, tin, and wool.

The wholesale price index is not as sensitive as the daily index because it involves over 900 commodities monthly, many of which have gone through extensive processing. These include not only wool in its raw form, but also yarns and finished apparel. It includes crude rubber as well as rubber tires. It includes copper ingot, and it also includes the motors, which have copper armatures. This index is issued officially monthly, and weekly for a shorter list of items.

The retail price index—commonly known as the consumer's price index or the cost-of-living index—is the least sensitive of all. It includes among its 200 items not only the goods that consumers buy each day, such as milk and other foods, for example, but those which they buy only infrequently like refrigerators and automobiles—and even hospital bills. It also includes rent, public utility bills, and other services.

II. PRICES ON THE COMMODITY EXCHANGES

When the war broke in Korea prices on organized commodity markets reacted immediately. Between June 23 and August 2 they jumped almost 15 percent on the average.

The imported commodities have since shown especially large jumps—rubber rose steadily from 28 cents a pound on June 23 to 54 cents on August 2; tin rose from 76 cents to 96 cents on July 14, and then receded to 90 cents; by July 26, it was back to 97.5 cents; it has since fluctuated around this level. Wool tops which had been $1.35 a pound back in 1946 are now at the peak level of $2.37 a pound; they have risen almost daily since Korea. Coffee beans broke through their previous peak to reach 56 cents a pound, up more than 7 cents since June 23. Even raw sugar has advanced above 6 cents a pound for the first time since early January 1948; this is an increase of 40 cents a hundredweight since Korea. The prices of many important domestic commodities have also risen sharply recently: Cotton is up from 34 cents a pound to 38 cents; lard from 11 cents to 16 cents, cotton print cloth from 15 cents a yard to 20 cents.

These price movements tend to be typical of a war situation in sensitive markets—manufacturers act on the assumption that prices are much more likely to be higher than lower in the foreseeable future. In 1939, for example, there was an increase of 25 percent in this index during the month of September 1939, when the war broke out in Europe.

III. PRIMARY MARKET PRICES

Commodity prices in primary markets also started up in the spring of 1950, and rose more steeply after the outbreak of war in Korea. These increases have affected all classes of commodities, both agricultural and nonagricultural. The Bureau's index of primary market prices—usually called the wholesale price index—is a remarkably accurate indicator of changes in business sentiment. The all commodities index on July 25 was 4 percent above the pre-Korea level and 8 percent above its 1950 low point.

Industrial prices

Large movements in the industrial component of this index normally reflect changes in the feelings of the business community. Excluding the agricultural commodities, this balance of the index turned down at the end of 1948 when business turned down, and reached its low point at the end of 1949. By early 1950, it was clear that the 1949 slump had been mild, and prices started moving up slowly. However, the increase kept moving at a progressively faster rate, and between the beginning of April and the end of July the total increase in the prices of industrial commodities was more than 4 percent. We are now only about 1½ percent below the postwar peak reached at the end of 1948. Building materials are at the new postwar peak and metals and metal products prices are only fractionally below their postwar peak. Lumber prices are setting new peaks each week. The movement from April to June reflected inventory accumulation—a reaction to general optimistic attitudes toward the business outlook for the future. The movement of industrial prices since June 20—an increase of 2 percent—has principally reflected the war situation.

Farm products and foods

The movements of farm products and food prices in primary markets have been largely controlled by the agricultural situation and crop outlook. However, these prices have also shown sharp advances since spring—12 percent between April 4 and July 25. More than half the rise has occurred since the Korean outbreak. The biggest increases have been in livestock and meats—more than 9 percent between June 27 and July 25, 1950. (A portion of this increase is seasonal.) These increases in livestock and meat prices have been promptly reflected at retail. It has been demonstrated in the past that a common characteristic of movements of prices of many foods in a war period is a great shortening of the time lag between changes in the prices of raw materials and their finished products, and between wholesale and retail. There are many indications that this is also true in the current period—replacements costs dominate the current retail food markets.

IV. THE CONSUMER'S PRICE INDEX OF THE BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS

Pre-Korea

The prices of goods consumers buy followed this same general pattern, but at a much slower pace. The Bureau's Consumers' Price Index had an over-all range of only 2 percent in 15 months, with the month-to-month movement never as great as 1 percent. This stability ended in April 1950, however, and by June 15, before the Korean attack, the index increased nearly 2 percent to 170.2 (1935–39=100)—primarily because of increases in retail-meat prices and rents.

The advance since April was the largest since the middle of 1948 when the index reached its peak. The increases of May and June wiped out about half of the decline from the postwar peak.

The movement since April has been largely the result of higher food prices, although rent has been moving steadily upward. Retail-food prices have risen about 5 percent since April and are now less than 6 percent below their postwar peak. The rise in retail-food prices from mid-April to mid-June has been almost wholly due to higher prices for meats. There have also been wide fluctuations in the prices of seasonal commodities such as fruits and vegetables and eggs. Retail-meat prices have advanced 14 percent since January of this year and in mid-June were within 8 percent of their postwar peak.

An example of what has happened to meat prices can be seen in two specific cases: In January, the national average price of round steak was 85 cents a pound; in June it was 97½ cents. Pork chops were less than 62 cents in January; in June they were about 81 cents, and we estimate that they have risen about 5 cents more in July.

The increases in consumers' prices through June in no way reflect the outbreak of war in Korea. More than any other factor, these advances reflect the general upturn in the national economy after the minor slump of 1949. High consumer incomes always bring big demands for meat, butter, and other high-priced foods.

Foods—post-Korea

Retail food prices continued to advance in July again because of higher meat prices. We have completed preliminary checks of food prices in four cities as of July 15. They lead us to expect a total increase of the same general magnitude as from May to June—that is, 2 to 3 percent for food. Part of this rise is scare buying and hoarding by some consumers, and part of it reflects higher raw material costs, like coffee and sugar, which have been passed on with great rapidity to the consumers.

Apparel, housefurnishings, and other commodities in the cost of living

With the exception of foods and rents, the other commodities included in the cost of living in June were either lower or practically unchanged from their levels at the start of 1950. As far as we can tell from scattered reports, it appears that they have not shown any substantial increase since Korea. Although there have recently been price increases for a few commodities, the retailers of the Nation have made a magnificent effort to hold the price line. The majority have not raised the prices of the goods they have in stock despite runs by consumers. They have increased their selling prices only when they have had to buy higher cost replacement merchandise.

Of course, many of the usual summer clearance sales of apparel and housefurnishings have not been so numerous nor have they offered as great bargains as last year. It is also no longer possible to buy appliances at a discount. On the whole, however, the picture is not yet one of actual retail price rises. These price rises will come, however, as the higher costs of raw materials filter through the manufacturing and distributive processes of the economy. For the past few days we have been receiving reports on primary market prices which show increases in the manufacturers' selling prices for stoves and refrigerators, sheets and mattresses, rugs and tires, hosiery, underwear, etc. When this merchandise reaches the retail counters, these increases will be reflected in higher prices. But these increases do not appear overnight—it takes weeks and even months before they are fully reflected in the prices consumers pay.

It is clear that the price situation is very uneven. Some prices have risen 50 or even 100 percent; some have risen moderately; some have not moved at all. The greatest increases have been in the prices of raw materials, of basic commodities in general, and imported commodities especially. The increases in manufacturers' selling prices have been somewhat less, and the increase in retail prices, except foods, least of all.

We know that some of this rise is attributable to scare buying, the building up of inventories, and filling of pipe lines all the way from consumer to producer. This kind of buying has its own limits—when the locker is stocked up, that kind of demand ends. Then prices will be influenced by the demand-and-supply situation—they can level off or even decline.

On the demand side the new factor is the rearmament program—the speed with which it progresses and the commodities on which it falls. This is superimposed on an already high level of regular consumer demand.

On the supply side we are producing at a very high level. The real squeeze will come, and prices could start to move very rapidly, when consumer-goods capacity is diverted to military uses. Unless consumer-purchasing power has been cut back through taxes or purchases of savings bonds, the buying power will clearly exceed the supply of goods. It should be possible from advance knowledge of the military demand to know when and where the squeeze will come long before it appears on the markets.

American Legion Viewpoint on Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. WILSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1950

Mr. WILSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, it is strengthening to know that the veterans of our great land are and will be united in a foreign policy—to fight communism everywhere—to unite in efforts and actions toward the goal of destroying the threat of world dominion.

Members of the great veterans organizations of America, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the American Legion, and others, realize that the greatest contribution that can be made to gain a peaceful world is the preservation of freedom for those who will be free—and through our moral, military, and economic strength, the destruction and complete elimination of false and untruthful philosophies and ideologies.

A striking, timely, and concise statement of the American Legion's world policy was presented by its foreign relations commission to its national executive committee at the May 1950 meeting; and as adopted and printed in the American Legion magazine for July 1950 appears as follows:

LEGION'S FOREIGN POLICY STATED—NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE ADOPTS CONCISE STATEMENT OF ITS WORLD POLICY PRESENTED BY THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMISSION AT MAY MEETING—REJECTS DEFEATISM ATTITUDE

The foreign policy of the American Legion is primarily dedicated to the preservation of freedom, freedom of the individual, and of human liberties.

The menace in the world today is the spread of Soviet communism, whose aims are the destruction of human liberties and eventual world conquest. Therefore, the foreign policy of the American Legion is to fight communism everywhere.

Instead of condemning the mistakes and inadequacies of the past let us now unite our efforts and actions toward the one goal of destroying the threat of world dominion by our real enemy—Soviet Russia.

No longer should we contain communism in one part of the world, then ignore its continued and successful advance in another part. No longer will we tolerate trade or diplomatic expediencies which save us pennies today, but will cost us dollars tomorrow. Our foreign policy must be consistently dedicated to the principle that the greatest contribution that can be made by the United States to a peaceful world is the preservation of freedom for those who will be free—and through our moral, military, and economic strength, the destruction and complete elimination of false and untruthful philosophies and ideologies which are loose in the world today.

FAITH IN THE UNITED NATIONS

We retain our faith in the United Nations. We believe that it can be made an effective world authority which can prevent aggression if the charter is amended immediately as suggested by the American Legion in November of 1946—to accomplish the following:

1. Removal of the veto power in the two specific instances of matters pertaining to aggression and preparation for aggression.

2. The adoption of the United States proposals for the international control of atomic energy and the establishment of arms quotas, both to be guaranteed through a system of positive international inspection.

3. Establishment of an effective tyranny-proof international police force. This force would consist of two parts, an independent active force to be under the direct control of the Security Council and a reserve force made up of the national contingents of the major powers capable of backing up the active forces when necessary. The result would be that the United Nations, through an effective police force, could enforce its decisions, prevent aggression and the preparation of aggression, and so maintain the peace.

We believe that the American Legion plan for strengthening the United Nations provides the essential basic requirements of, and the first steps toward, true world-wide enforcement of law and order, which is the immediate necessity.

OPPOSES WORLD FEDERATION

The American Legion is opposed to any form of world federation or world government, at this time.

In 1948 the American Legion recommended a mutual self-defense pact composed of the nations of the north Atlantic area. Our suggestion was made fully a year before the North Atlantic Pact was approved by Congress.

As a result of the North Atlantic Pact the nations of western Europe, Canada and the United States are militarily stronger than at any time since World War II. Arms and essential materials are now flowing and must continue to flow to our allies in this area so that the North Atlantic Pact countries will have the necessary equipment and trained troops to make a formidable stand against any aggressor.

We now urge the countries of the North Atlantic Pact to join forces within the United Nations to insist on the amendment of the United Nations Charter to accomplish the objectives of the American Legion plan as stated above. In this way the democratic nations of the west would thereby declare to the world their intention of making the United Nations an effective authority for peace.

RECOVERY PROGRAM ENDORSED

We further urge these same democracies which sponsored the North Atlantic Pact to send delegates to a convention to be held soon in the United States to explore the possibilities of the establishment, within the framework of the United Nations, of an association for closer political cooperation among freedom-loving democracies.

To preserve faith of others in our system of freedoms we must continue to help those war-torn nations and people of the world, who will first help themselves, to rebuild their countries and to regain their basic liberties. We therefore urge continuation of the European recovery program as provided for in the present Economic Cooperation Act, which the American Legion was the first Nation-wide organization to endorse. We believe that this program has been administered to the benefit of the American people and that it has accomplished its purpose of rehabilitating the economies of western Europe and has contained Communist expansion in this area. We urge all possible economies in the administration of ECA, so that our own economy will not be jeopardized. We heartily endorse a proposal that a study by a commission be made sufficiently prior to June 1952 so that appropriate recommendations can be made to the Congress and the American people as to what steps, if any, might be necessary after that time to continue economic help to the countries of Europe who have joined forces with us in our fight for freedom.

We should encourage economic, educational and spiritual development in western Germany. This area will again be a critical spot in Europe's development. But Americans must be realistic in their aid and ever watchful in their assistance in eliminating military power in Germany. We must not abandon these people to the Russians, but equally we must avoid the historic danger of strengthening them to a point where they will again menace their neighbors whom they overran in two world wars.

We should support in every way possible the religious minorities in the satellite countries in Europe that are trying to hold the last citadel of freedom in their countries—the right to worship God as they please. These people have seen the state subjugate the church, and then, try to abolish the church. We must support them in their fight to regain freedom of worship.

Some central European problems cannot be solved until the final settlement of the Austrian peace treaty. Many important issues are at stake. Confidence in western Europe and America will be greatly aided by our insistence that the treaty be concluded as soon as possible.

EASTERN MEDITERRANEAN AREA

Americans can view with pride the accomplishments of our helpfulness and aid in the eastern Mediterranean area. Greece would not have a democratic form of government today if it had not been for the bipartisan support of the Truman Doctrine of 1947—which stated that Communist aggression should advance no further in Europe without the United States, through the United Nations, taking notice of, and doing something about, such aggression. America fought Communist aggression in this area, for we wanted the people of the Near East to have a chance to mold a destiny of their choice—and not one dictated to them by Moscow.

We must continue to effectively and affirmatively enlighten the people of Europe and Asia as to the truth of the American way of life in the advantages, both material and spiritual, to be gained by free people operating under democratic processes—where the individual is served by the state without being dependent upon it. Containment of Soviet aggression is not enough. We must go forward to the destruction of the aggressive power of the Soviet police state. Massive propaganda projects must be launched to take the truth to all corners of the world so that all peoples will have an understanding of the basic issues in this great struggle for freedom's survival.

We believe that good results in this direction have been obtained by the Office of International Information and the United States Information Service. We urge that these two agencies and others operating under the guidance of our State Department continue to take the truth to the far corners of the world We urge Congress to allot sufficient funds to carry out this important phase of winning the cold war.

AID FOR CHINA AND FORMOSA

The American Legion urges opposition to the expansion of communism in Asia. We propose that our Government extend every reasonable assistance to foster all influences favorable to democracy. We oppose recognition of Communist China.

At the 1949 Philadelphia Convention we urged that our support should be made available to any patriotic groups or organizations of Chinese whose principles and stability are worthy of our confidence and who will vigorously fight communism and outside aggressors to preserve the basic rights and liberties of a free China.

We again say we reject defeatism and abandonment of this area to Communist aggressors. The immediate threat is at Formosa and in the Philippines. We abhor the idea of abandoning the free and independent Government of Formosa. If we are opposed to Communist aggression, and if we are the world's last and greatest protector of human liberties, then certainly we cannot abandon Formosa at such a crucial moment. If we do so, then we are merely borrowing a temporary period of peace until we are forced to face the same issue in another place, which will be just a bit closer to the heart of our national defense structure.

FORMOSAN DEFENSE IMPERATIVE

We believe it is imperative that our Department of Defense appraise the defendability of Formosa at once, with the thought that Formosa be preserved, with our help, as a bastion of freedom and a base for military operations against the Communist aggressors on the mainland of Asia.

We should also aid the Philippine Government in every possible way, to resist the infiltration of Communist aggressors and to maintain a free democratic government.

Because the North Atlantic Pact has been of such immense value and protection to the countries involved and because a similar regional alliance might be a deterrent to Communist expansion in the Pacific and far eastern areas, we again urge our Government to lend its aid in forming a regional alliance under article 51 of the United Nations charter, composed of those countries of the Pacific and far eastern areas, who, through self-help and mutual aid, desire to guarantee their mutual defense and to preserve individual liberties.

The President's point 4 program recommends that Congress provide funds to finance technical, scientific, and managerial knowledge to underdeveloped areas of the world, and also, limited financial assistance for the creation of productive enterprises. The President has requested $45,000,000 to finance the program for the first year.

This plan suggests assistance in many fields and emphasizes technical projects in health, industry, labor, agriculture and scientific research with respect to natural resources in underdeveloped countries showing particular need. The wise and careful administration of such a program bears great possibilities for the development of international understanding and cooperation, and would contribute considerably to the enlargement of world trade.

The American Legion approves, in principle, the President's point 4 program. We urge the full cooperation of our Government with private enterprise in the development of such a program.

MUST STRIVE FOR PEACE

The foregoing should constitute the foreign policy of the United States as visualized by our Commission at this time. The best evaluation of any foreign policy is whether or not it can keep the peace. We know that we cannot have peace by just wishing for it or by negotiating a temporary breathing spell with the Politburo.

We will have peace only after we have accepted and absorbed the fact that we in America must offer the leadership necessary to win this great global conflict of ideas. We must fight the insidious menace of communism and totalitarian aggression with all our might and resources. We must gather to us, as allies, all people who will be free—all who are willing to join with us in this final battle for liberty, justice, and democracy.

And when successful—as we will certainly be—our peace will be built upon the rock of self-reliance of all free people, good will, and international law, internationally enforced. Only then can we openly admit to ourselves and to each other that we have found true peace and real security.

All this is possible if we, as individuals, accept the responsibility to do our share to protect our own liberties. With our trust in God we shall find divine guidance along the rough road that lies ahead. This call for God's help is not to lull the peace-seeking into weakness and compromise. Only in strength of character and arms and purpose, based on Christian principles of justice and righteousness will America be able to offer proper leadership to peace-hungry citizens of the world who starve for God's most cherished gift—human dignity.

Mr. Speaker, indeed there is hope in the expressions that we retain our faith in the United Nations, and that we preserve faith of others in our system of freedoms. It is within the bounds of reason to carefully consider and weigh all possible means and proposals to strengthen the United Nations in the hope for real peace, but in doing so, let us keep the United Nations for what it was sincerely intended. Further, in considering any proposal, it is imperative that America preserve her sovereignty, and that we carefully examine and oppose any theory of world government which would entail the surrender of our national sovereignty.

Letter From Deputy Attorney General

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter I have received from Deputy Attorney General Peyton Ford:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., July 17, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: This has further reference to your inquiry of June 2, 1950, addressed to the Attorney General, relating to the licensing of Schering Corp.'s patents and the effect on such licensing of sale of the stock in that corporation now held by the Government.

In December 1947, the Department of Justice publicly announced a policy under which many patents held by corporations in which the Government had seized a controlling stock interest would be made available for licensing at reasonable terms, except in some cases where the grant of a license would be prejudicial to the maintenance of competition in the field. Schering Corp. advises that in pursuance of that policy many of its patents have been and are now offered for licensing on reasonable royalty terms to qualified applicants. This offering covers patents owned by Schering in the hormone field as of the end of 1948, including patents which are used in the production of substances now receiving wide attention or being experimentally used in the treatment of rheumatism, arthritis, and other diseases. This policy remains presently in effect. To date, Schering Corp. has issued to 20 American companies, on reasonable royalty terms for the life the pertinent patents, irrevocable licenses to market such hormone substances as progesterone, pregnenolone, estradiol, estradiol benzoate, ethinyl estradiol and other pharmaceuticals. In addition, nine bulk chemical suppliers have been given royalty-free permission to supply the requirements of the drug trade for most of these products. The corporation advises that applications for such licenses are in fact currently being received and acted upon.

It may be noted that Schering Corp. has been a pioneer in the development of many of the pharmaceutical products referred to above. It has, however, been properly cautious with respect to their value in the treatment of specific diseases. In a press release dated May 26, 1950, Francis C. Brown, president of the corporation, stated:

"Schering was the first to introduce pregnenolone to the medical profession. While this drug shows promise for the relief of sufferers from rheumatism and arthritis, it is a cruel deception to hold out any hope that it relieves or influences cancer or that it is a miracle drug."

With reference to the rumors of impending changes in patent policy, these probably arise as a result of the Department's preparations to sell the vested Schering stock. It should be understood that imposing a patent-licensing policy which will be effective after sale is more difficult than maintaining such a policy while the Government owns all of the corporation's stock. This is especially so since the Department of Justice considers it desirable policy for the Government to relinquish as fully as possible its participation in the affairs of vested corporations after the sale of their stock to American buyers. It is the working out of an effective postsale licensing procedure for Schering's patents that is now under consideration. When this has been accomplished the vested shares of Schering Corp. will be registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission and offered at public sale under sealed bids through the medium of a prospectus.

The obligation imposed upon this Department in the exercise of the functions delegated to it under the Trading With the Enemy Act with respect to vested property is that such property shall be "held, used, administered, liquidated, sold, or otherwise dealt with in the interest of and for the benefit of the United States." We are fully aware of our public responsibility and are doing everything possible to resolve the problems involved in a manner calculated to best serve the interests of the United States. This is our primary responsibility in the administration of vested property.

Your interest in the matter is appreciated. The newspaper clipping which you enclosed with your letter is returned herewith, as requested.

Yours sincerely,

PEYTON FORD,
Deputy Attorney General.

The Curtailing of Mail Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GARDNER R. WITHROW
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein an editorial which appeared in the Daily Advance of Lynchburg, Va., relative to the order issued by the Postmaster General relative to the curtailing of mail service. I might add that this paper is considered very conservative:

THE POSTAL SERVICE

The United States Post Office Department was founded to provide postal service for the people. It was not expected to make a profit and was expected to be operated at a loss, but not being a business and designed as a Government service of the first importance, it should not be discussed in business terms.

When Postmaster General Donaldson cut home mail deliveries to one a day, he acted as if he were running a business which must show a profit. In attempted refutation of criticism he presented a statement which misrepresents the true nature of the service. For example he showed an operations deficit of over $500,000,000. By striking from this deficit about $300,0 0,000 in costs that are intended to be charged against service rendered, without any revenue of importance, the deficit is more than cut in half. This shows the phony bookkeeping used to support the position of the Postmaster General.

Third- and fourth-class post offices are operated at a considerable loss, if revenue and costs are presented on a business basis. They cannot be operated otherwise. They represent costs over revenue of about $45,000,000. Rural free delivery costs about $75,000,000 and so on with services considered vital and indispensable and to be operated at heavy costs.

The Hoover Commission recommendations called for efficient reorganization of the Post Office Department. Donaldson's only response is to pretend to effect savings by curtailing service. The mail carriers are thereby overworked, the public gets poorer delivery service, the expensively subsidized air mail becomes farcical in its delivery time in many instances and business mail also is delayed to an important extent.

There is a limit on the weight a mail carrier is supposed to carry on his trip. It is obvious that on a heavy day, with more mail than usual, he cannot get the mail delivered in one delivery. And substitute carriers, to help the regular carrier, are never sufficiently available under the new Donaldson system.

The present international crisis makes prompt mail delivery more important than ever. It makes more efficient service, prompter deliveries, mandatory, else there will come a situation which will force drastic action on the part of the Congress.

Congress will reverse the Donaldson action if the public makes itself heard. Congress might even, if moved to a thorough investigation, remove Donaldson. He plainly is not providing the service the Post Office Department is supposed to provide; he went over the heads of his superiors, the Congress, to curtail service; his rise in the Department to his present position can be associated with politics that refute largely the somewhat appealing story of his rise from mail carrier to Postmaster General.

As more and more thousands of men go into uniform, are away from home, there is going to be a big increase in letter mail. Some of that mail is going to be delayed, under the present restricted delivery service. There is going to be a howl that will get action from the Congress. It would be better if the public registered its complaints now, with Senators and Congressmen, to get full service restored before its need becomes more critical.

The Fruits of the New Deal in Colorado

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE N. ASPINALL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion one of the most challenging political addresses that has come to my attention to date during this campaign year is that of the Honorable James M. Noland, a district judge of Colorado, which address was made before the Young Democrats' Organization of Colorado at their annual convention. The Young Democrats of Colorado led off, as usual, in our State in the beginning of campaign matters for this election year. Judge Noland in his talk not only treats of the political situation as it exists in Colorado, but he also enters into a very understanding dissertation on political matters in the Nation. Because he has set forth in such an admirable manner the political challenges of the hour and in a large measure expresses my personal feelings on some of the various questions which are perplexing us, I desire to have the address printed in the RECORD so that any others desiring to do so may benefit from the thoughts expressed by this talented and capable Democratic leader of Colorado:

ADDRESS OF JUDGE JAMES M. NOLAND BEFORE STATE CONVENTION OF COLORADO YOUNG DEMOCRATS, GUNNISON, JUNE 17, 1950

The words of the late great Edward P. Costigan, uttered in 1931, are as applicable to our present national situation as they were to that of those black depression days. Then he said, "In scientific and material development the advances of the last century outdistance imagination. Nevertheless, the general welfare continuously eludes us. If the ideal of the fathers had been that the many are to be impoverished while the few are to have and to hold then certain present-day economic conditions would not be so surprising. Happily many descendants of the fathers have reached the goal of plenty. But faced by the Jeffersonian dream of a country of equal and exact justice to all and of a land where none was to be excessively rich and none were to be poor, we are conscious of our fundamental national failure." Senator Costigan continued by quoting Thomas Paine, "When it shall be said in any country in the world, 'my poor are happy; neither ignorance nor distress is to be found among them; my jails are empty of prisoners, my streets of beggars; the aged are not in want, the taxes are not oppressive; the natural world is my friend because it is the friend of happiness'; when these things can be said, then may that country boast of its constitution and government."

We are members of a political party which has adopted that creed for its own; you, with the vitality, the inspiration and imagination of youth, have been constantly breathing into a sometimes ailing, a sometimes wavering patient that energy and sustenance, that courage and conviction so absolutely essential to our continued existence as the party of Jefferson, of Wilson, of Costigan, of Franklin Roosevelt, of Harry S. Truman—of the once forgotten men of the fields, the marketplaces, and the back streets.

We witnessed during that period when the strong voice of Senator Costigan was being heard, a virtual social and economic revolution in this country—a bloodless one, to be sure, but nonetheless as far-reaching and decisive as any that ever accompanied the clashing of swords. It marked what we had hoped was the beginning of a new era—the forgotten man came into his own—the general welfare became the paramount interest of a government which had been entrusted into the hands of the Democratic Party.

Let us review briefly just a few of the steps of that revolution.

Rural electrification came into being. It was an unheard of thing. Yea, it was socialistic. But it brought light and power—light and power both literally and figuratively to one of America's forgotten citizenry. For generations the men who tilled the soil had had to live under the most antiquated conditions. They were the very root of the American economic system, for they produced from Mother Earth the food for our people, and the raw materials for our factories. Yet our highly vaunted capitalistic system had not found it profitable to supply those millions of rural families with the comforts, necessities and conveniences enjoyed by the more fortunate urbanites. A liberalized Democratic Party, one unafraid to break with hide-bound precedent, found a way to raise in a few short years the living standards of a great class whose neglect had so long been a government scandal. Electric power and energy was brought to the living rooms and the milking sheds of 10,000,000 rural residents.

Within our own generation the total breakdown of an outmoded economic system had left 10,000,000 American citizens unemployed, 30,000,000 (approximately one-fourth our population) on the verge of want. An opposition administration had stumbled helplessly in the darkness, blinded by its old fetish of concentrated wealth, afraid to break with its tradition. Its advice was, Let us be calm and this shall pass. Hunger and wretchedness cannot remain calm, however, and it didn't pass until an enlightened, courageous party gave new meaning to the words, "We, the people of the United States * * * in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, promote the general welfare * * * and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity * * *."

That the hungry might be fed, that the naked might be clothed, that the jobless might have work, that the breaking American homes might be knit together again, our party conceived it to be the duty of the Nation—of those who were still able to pay taxes—to support programs of direct relief, WPA, PWA, and the like. Do you remember the hue and cry, even in the face of that terrible national crisis? Socialism, they screamed—methinks the sound of the voices that cried that word has a familiar ring.

Then it wasn't long ago when this land of ours was literally cluttered with poorhouses. Sometimes we eased our collective conscience by calling them county farms. They were designed as the final haven for the poverty-stricken, disease-ridden, physically broken oldsters of our society—the human machines who were worn out and useless to the further needs of our great industrial Nation. Numerous as they were, there were still not enough of these institutions to take care of all the human junk, so the rest were left to the big-city garbage cans and the street-corner panhandling. Again, a great political party, condemning man's inhumanity to man, struck with the might and strength that is born of a just cause, and there came into being unemployment compensation, social security, old-age pensions, and their related programs, all designed toward establishing a decent, comfortable, respectable place in the American social and economic structure, and a dignified refuge for those whose unfortunate lot would eventually become that of sickness, poverty, and the ravages of old age, once more from the plush-bottomed chairs of the Nation was raised the old familiar cry.

We could go on and on with a proud recitation of those successful campaigns of the New Deal revolution—it would include water and power conservation, public lands reclamation and development, collective bargaining for capital and labor, banking security, home owners' loans, adequate housing, public health and sanitation—each and every one a new and liberal conception of the promotion of the general welfare of our people. Every step in that revolution was bitterly fought. Never a single one of those battles was won without the accompanying chant of the reactionary mourners, consisting principally of those who saw evilly acquired power and wealth slipping from their ruggedly individualistic hands. Each new victory for the people's forces was another toll of the bell that was sounding the death knell of a system which had kept millions of America's peoples for generations economically enslaved. Lives were given by our forces, and not the least of those were America's Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Colorado's Edward Prentis Costigan. Yet, bitter as that fighting was, there is the voice in America today that would have the courage to advocate the tearing down of the rural electric lines, the abolition of our social-security system, the denial of the right of labor to arbitrate, the blasting of the dams, the loosing of the rivers, the return of reclaimed millions of acres to dust bowls, the restoration of the poorhouses?

I come now to the purpose of these recitations. We have heard from the cradle the adage "History repeats itself," and there is strong evidence at hand to sustain that statement today. We are presently in what may be called the second phase of the bloodless revolution of which I have spoken. This time we are beset with opposition from both within and without. The aims and objects of those opponents are entirely different, and knowingly they would brook no alliance one with the other, but strangely, dangerously, they are a common threat to our existing democratic institutions. Americans, regardless of partisan political views are as one in their determination to stop the Communist threat. We are prone to forget, I am afraid, the insidious methods of the Communist, bent on our destruction. He may yet attack with force, but the history of his operations has been marked by another type of attack. He believes that a house divided against itself cannot stand, and proceeds accordingly. He implants jealousy, hatred, envy, and suspicion in his intended victim, then waits for the victim to destroy himself. There are indications that he is having some measure of success in our present national trends.

It is time that free Americans should rise to the defense of that freedom which can exist only in a democracy. On the military front we are arming defensively (and may God give us the courage and foresight to continue to do so), against the threat of powerful forces bent on the destruction of all democratic government. We have wisely and justly made it our policy that there shall be no aggression on our part, and no offense until it shall become necessary as a defense.

But there is another front on which we had better be taking the offensive, and soon. It is time, it is past time, that we put a stop to the demagogery that is going on in high places in this Government, and on our streets, and in our drawing rooms as well. It is something that follows the Communist pattern of infiltration through distrust and suspicion, and can well become as great a threat to democratic government as would military force from the outside. In high places it is typified by the performance of a notorious character from one of the great States of this Union. Clothed always with the immunity that he usurps from his position in the United States Senate, he mouths invectiveness, hatred, false suspicion indiscriminately among his fellow Americans. Does anyone in this room, does any thoughtful American believe for one moment that JOE MCCARTHY is hunting Communists? If it were so, he would have the help and encouragement of all of us. But no; Senator MCCARTHY is one of those die-hard mourners whom I have already mentioned. He sloshes through the mud and muck of the unkept grave of reaction and attempts to raise therefrom the ghost of that old character. It is the same ghost whose chains clanked with every advance of the New Deal, but it wears new robes fashioned by the adroit hands of the Senator from Wisconsin. Whereas it used to be a socialistic ghost, it is now a communistic one, and it is brought forth from the grave to frighten the people, this time from the Fair Deal and the social and economic advances which are being born of it. Americans who have the courage and intelligence to keep fighting the good fight for the promotion of the general welfare of our people and of all the peoples of the earth must now risk the slander and abuse of him and other cowards of his ilk who shield themselves behind a screen that was never created for any such purpose. And it is not to the credit of some of his fellow Senators who sit silently by, biding their cowardly time to speak up with either an "I told you so," or "I had nothing to do with it," depending upon the directions which the political winds may ultimately take. It is to the everlasting credit of a great woman Senator and American, MARGARET CHASE SMITH, and a few brave and conscientious Members of the opposition party, that they should have said these things in a much abler way than can I. It would seem appropriate to hear a little more from the Democratic side of that Chamber.

And we need give our attention to similar lesser but still effective performances in places not so high. It seems to have become the vogue in these times of stress to label liberal thought with varying shades of one of the primary colors now in great disrepute. There are too many good Americans who are being hoodwinked by that practice which again is inspired by the bogeyman tactics of the old mourners. More and more often of late the cry that challenges liberal thought and action, foreign and irreconcilable as it may be to communism, is "Red; Red." It is used, of course, because it is guaranteed to create fright and panic. The shade depends upon the degree of liberality in its relation to our past and now outmoded theory of the real function of government. For instance, if rural electrification were now being proposed for the first time under the Fair Deal, it would probably rate pink, whereas reclamation might get into the salmon shade. And surely Abraham Lincoln's program for the abolition of slavery would be hailed a very brilliant red.

We Democrats and Republicans alike need to reappraise our Americanism, and take account of the true import of the liberties and the freedom which we guaranteed ourselves by our own Constitution. Our system envisages the right to espouse those things which within the limits of that Constitution, the greatest, most perfect ever devised by men, we deem will best promote equal and exact justice for all. When we reach that stage where we indiscriminately label those who disagree with us in principle or politics as adherents of a foreign concept of government then we are creating in our people the distrust, the jealousy and hatreds which of themselves can well destroy democracy. And we thus play into the hands of communism.

This very organization which I have the honor of now addressing has itself been a victim of those tactics. One of your members, whose strong liberal voice will be heard and heeded in the Senate of the United States ere another year shall have passed, knows the cruelty, the sting and the injustice of that sort of attack, and will, as the coming campaign progresses, no doubt become a further target for it. The mourners will find, though, that John Carroll does not cringe in the presence of ghosts.

It behooves you, the younger members of America's greatest political party to take the lead in combating these modernized methods of attack on our constitutional rights of freedom of thought and freedom of action. There are many, many battles yet to be fought before we shall have attained our ultimate goal of equal and exact justice to all. There are still great groups of our people who are being denied the right of suffrage, and the right to attend free American schools on a basis of equality with others whose rights appear to be based on some chimerical superiority of color, blood, or nativity—certainly not on the constitutional guaranties bequeathed us by our founding fathers. There are still countless American citizens who have no conception of the joy of breathing clean air, of drinking pure water, of seeing any horizon beyond their own squalid walls; whose children, our future citizens, know only an America bounded by the alleys in their dingy neighborhoods. There are yet acres to be reclaimed, rivers to be dammed—there is water to be brought to parched farm lands, there are harbors to be dredged, schools and hospitals to be built. And even as evidenced by the wails of the mourners today, each of those battles will be desperately fought. The McCarthys and the Tafts, with their assembled horde of ghosts will continue to rattle the chains and play bogeyman. We will hear repeated again and again the mourners chant of "Welfare State," "Communism," "Socialism," "Red," "Pink,"—that is, we will hear it until a fully enlightened and thoroughly disgusted America shall rise in its wrath, and say to these men, as did Senator SMITH, "We have heard enough." And when that time comes, we shall turn fully to the final task of establishing justice and promoting the general welfare, according to the concepts of those who gave birth to this Nation.

An Open Letter to the President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES W. WADSWORTH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Le Roy (N. Y.) Gazette-News of August 3, 1950:

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT

HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President, United States of America,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT. You are the executive head of what is perhaps the leading nation of the world today. I am the editor of a little country weekly newspaper that has been published in the village of Le Roy, N. Y., for 134 years. We are both citizens of this Nation—a nation which guarantees to us freedom of speech and permits the humblest citizen to express his thoughts to the man holding the highest honor within the gift of his fellow citizens.

By some turn of the dice along the pathway of mankind in these United States of America you became alined with the Democratic Party and I became a Republican. As such we may honestly have divergence of thought as to the best policies for the conduct of our national affairs. That is, we may have these differences of opinion in normal times. But, Mr. President, as good Americans and patriotic citizens, we cannot allow ourselves any difference in thinking when grave danger menaces our Nation.

We are involved in a war in Korea and every hour American boys—boys who might be your sons or mine—are giving their lives far away from home and loved ones, to uphold the Stars and Stripes under which you and I had the great good fortune to be born, and to have lived for many years with greater freedom, larger opportunities, and more comforts than are enjoyed in any other land we know. I have every confidence of ultimate victory in Korea but I am sobered and tremendously concerned in the connection between Korea and a greater war that looms, with Christian civilization and communism as the opposing forces.

We must not only win the war in Korea but we must, along with associated nations, prepare for a much more devastating war possible at some time in the future.

It is because of this, Mr. President, I beg of you to firmly, squarely, courageously, and promptly meet the issue that confronts us, and use the authority you possess to conscript not only the fighting men but capital and labor as well, to win the war in Korea and prepare for the war that may come. I know there is the temptation to you and to Members of Congress as well to consider political factors and to temper your acts in the light of the coming election. God forbid that you or any Congressman yield to this temptation. Our boys are dying on the hills of Korea and a slinking enemy in Europe is awaiting the opportune time to pounce.

The young men that are being conscripted into the Armed Forces have no choice in the matter. They must go, accept the prescribed wage, eat the war rations however good or bad they may be, and face the bullets, any one of which may have their names on it. You fought in World War I. Tell me, if you will, if there be any justification or excuse for permitting capital, as represented in manufacturing necessary for the prosecution of war, or allowing those producing and processing the necessary food, and the labor involved in both, to gain profits beyond those common before war started in Korea?

This is not a battle to be fought by the soldiers alone. It is a battle for all of us. Let us face it as Americans all, and not as profiteers, hoarders, or politicians.

The Nation as a whole today—the folks back home—find it difficult to comprehend the thinking, or absence of clarity in thinking, that has been so alarmingly revealed in the Korean situation. If those in whom you manifested confidence have not measured up to the needs of the hour and the place we occupy in international affairs, it involves a correction you as our leader must promptly make.

I appreciate, President Truman, that you or no other one man can contain within a single mind all of the factors relevant to the present situation. You have delegated much of this to others, but the great decisions must be made by you. It is difficult for me to accept your expressed thought there is no need at the present time for regulating much of anything or placing the Nation on a war basis. This, in my humble opinion, indicates you are being ill advised or else you are unwilling to accept your responsibility as President and face the most important issue within your life.

Not hours, Mr. President, but minutes are wasting. Despite grim courage and heroic valor, our men, greatly outnumbered and lacking in necessary equipment which we have failed to make available to them, are foot by foot being forced into a small perimeter in the southeast corner of Korea. Before them death is riding rampant; behind them there hovers a Dunquerque. Rome burned while Nero fiddled. God alone knows what is going to happen to our boys in Korea and to us as a Nation if you fail to act and act immediately, to place every resource of our Nation on a war basis.

As one who is willing to make any sacrifice necessary to bring victory in the war in Korea, and to prepare for like success in a possible war that will determine history for centuries ahead, I pledge you my efforts and pray God to give you the wisdom and Christian courage to measure up to the challenge of the hour in your great responsibility as President of our Nation.

Respectfully yours,

EDWARD M. PERKINS.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE N. ASPINALL
OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, my State of Colorado is rich in cultural and charitable institutions. The climate of my State has always been ideal for the treatment of various physical ailments, some of which fail to respond in other sections of the country. One of the best known curative institutions in the State of Colorado is the National Home for Jewish Children, situated in Denver. Recently delegates from many localities gathered in that city to dedicate an addition to this hospital—a wing for asthmatic children, established in the memory of one of our boys who died in World War II, Paratrooper Daniel L. Simon.

At this dedication, the principal address was prepared by Brig. Gen. Julius Klein. In this address, he brought into bold relief the heroic contributions of another outstanding Colorado soldier who gave his life in the last war, Maj. Gen. Maurice Rose.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I ask to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD General Klein's address, preceded by the introductory remarks of Mr. Harry Pells, a well-known citizen of Denver:

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS BY MR. HARRY PELLS

It is a distinct honor to have been selected to introduce my dear friend, Gen. Julius Klein, to you, and I am grateful.

Since, due to aggravated international conditions, General Klein cannot be here in person, he prepared a speech and sent it to Dr. Birnbaum, and I have been given the honor of reading it to you. Before I do so, I would like to tell you something about General Klein. He is a native of Chicago, a former newspaperman, and head of a Nation-wide public relations business. He is a veteran of World Wars I and II, served in the Illinois National Guard for many years, and with this outfit went into active Federal service in June of 1941. He served with distinction for over 5 years and was appointed special assistant to the Secretary of War in 1946. He spent over 3 of the 5 years in the Pacific area in command of various combat troops. He was awarded the Legion of Merit, the Bronze Star, and the Soldiers' Medal, and received decorations from foreign governments.

In my opinion, next to the Congressional Medal of Honor, the Soldiers' Medal for Heroism is the highest reward that one could receive, and General Klein was awarded this medal for risking his life to save the lives of various military personnel when a terrific explosion wrecked the docks and ships and part of the base at a port in New Caledonia, where he was stationed.

General Klein is past national commander of the Jewish War Veterans of the United States, and, in this capacity, not only furnished our organization with outstanding leadership, but represented other Jewish organizations as our national leader. He had a great part in bringing about the recognition of the new State of Israel by our Government. We can all be proud of Gen. Julius Klein as a great American, a great Jewish leader, a statesman, and a soldier.

ADDRESS BY BRIG. GEN. JULIUS KLEIN, COMMANDING GENERAL, ONE HUNDRED AND NINTH AAA BRIGADE, AND PAST NATIONAL COMMANDER OF THE JEWISH WAR VETERANS—NATIONAL HOME FOR JEWISH CHILDREN, DENVER, COLO., JULY 23, 1950

I wish to thank your board of trustees for bestowing upon me the honor and granting me the privilege of addressing you on this occasion which is another important milestone in the splendid history of a great institution.

My words are uttered in humility, for I have great respect for those who have dedicated their lives—like Mrs. Lorber, Mrs. Williams, and others—to something about which I learned in my father's home—to Ze'dokoh, to charity.

I am humble, too, because in my mind your city will always be identified with a great hero and soldier, my comrade-in-arms, the late Maj. Gen. Maurice Rose, who gave his life for his country, so that you and I may live * * * and so that you can bring health and happiness to the unfortunate children to whom fate has been unkind.

General Rose was a brilliant military leader of great courage. Since receiving the invitation to speak here I have found out about the personal life of Daniel L. Simon, and I am glad to pay tribute with all of you here assembled to his glorious past. Of two things I am sure, however, that he, too, must have had courage, for it is the prerequisite of a paratrooper. And he comes from a fine, spiritual family, since they thought of keeping his name alive not through monuments of marble and stone, but through the erection of a building dedicated to helping the unfortunate children of our fellow men.

May I compliment all those responsible for the planning and erection of the Daniel L. Simon Building? I know that the families and the children who will benefit from it will bless you all.

You have taken the name of a soldier and given it to a building—the name of a soldier who died in a war which ended but a bare 5 years ago—and today the world is holding its breath and asking whether we are on the threshold, or perhaps even across the threshold, of the next conflagration.

As I thought about this talk and wondered what I might say to you, my mind went back to a few years ago when I had the privilege of commanding combat troops and when it was always my sad duty to officiate or be present at the last rites of some of my boys. I've seen boys who died because in this twentieth century of ours man has not yet learned the art of living peacefully with his fellow man. I've seen boys die—boys like Danny Simon—because there was a dictator who dreamed of conquering the world, and I regret to say that the end of mass slaughter will not even be in sight as long as other dictators can keep large masses of people enslaved. For people raised and educated in the democratic tradition there is no difference between the dictatorship of Hitler and his murderous henchmen and Stalin and his men of the Kremlin.

I spoke a moment ago about some of my boys who gave of themselves to the last ounce of devotion, and I recall the vows at their graves—the promises to fight, and work, once the shooting was over, to make this little earth a better place to live in.

Some have forgotten those vows and promises. It is good, therefore, to see that here in Denver some have remembered.

Frankly speaking, when I first heard from Dr. Birnbaum, inviting me to speak, I thought of this institution as a place, a hospital for asthmatic children. No more, no less. What was the image I had?

Rows on rows of beds. Doctors and nurses working quietly, examining, ministering to children, children in the throes of asthmatic attacks, struggling, fighting for breath, eyes bloodshot and glassy, blue lips, and faces bathed in clammy perspiration.

That's what I visualized. A place of sadness and sorrow. But there is laughter here and joy, and you're not only healing the bodies that are sick, but also the souls, for your patients' sickness has emotional effects too.

For a man who has seen as much of war and destruction as I have, and who at the moment must hold himself in readiness to go back to war again, the thing about your institution which strikes and impresses me most is its constructive contribution.

I say my thoughts went back to the days of fighting in the Pacific, and they came to rest when the name of my best buddy came to mind, Father Lynch was his name, a Catholic chaplain who didn't return and who, through his action, taught me more about real tolerance and understanding for my fellow human beings of different faiths than all I could learn by reading the books and pamphlets of our tolerance-preaching organizations.

The scientists tell us there is no Aryan race, there is no blueblood. We know they are right, but it was in the field of battle that the American GI discovered the evidence of it and it wasn't done with microscopes and test tubes. The whining bullets were a factor, and when they came over we all behaved alike, officers and men, Negroes and whites, Protestants, Jews, and Catholics—all of us.

For us, of the minorities, there were no quotas there. The enemy didn't say only 5 percent of America's population is Jewish, so we will kill a proportionate number of Jews. To them we were all Americans—enemies we were, better dead than alive. And they did not discriminate. It is for that reason—and without reference to the Bill of Rights—that we demand the end of quotas in the colleges for any person who is an American. It is for that reason that we, as members of a minority group, must continue the fight against discrimination.

This building will be dedicated to life but it bears the name of a man who gave up his life. I say to you, give that name meaning. Danny Simon died in a war against nazism and fascism which ended less than 5 years ago, but we are so preoccupied with the new menace that the Nazi beast is rising again and nothing is being done to stop it from growing.

In Danny Simon's name, I say, let us be vigilant.

At the outset I spoke of Ze'dokoh, the Hebrew word generally translated as charity. Let me end with that word too. It's a beautiful word, because it also means justice and righteousness. It ties together the religious, social, and ethical concepts which are the basis for decent human relations. It applies to all—to the rich and the poor. To those who can and do give to the home as much as to those who receive from the home.

Ze'dokoh is a commandment, for it is written in the Good Book "Thou shalt open wide thy hand unto thy brother—and to the poor and needy in the land."

Through your devotion to the National Home for Jewish Children, and through your work you are fulfilling God's commandment. Ladies and gentlemen, I know I find myself in good company. I congratulate you on your accomplishment and wish you continued success for the future.

Permit me again to express my deep appreciation for the honor you conferred on me by asking me to help you dedicate this beautiful institution. I cannot conclude my remarks without a personal tribute to one of the fine, great leaders in your community, my old comrade, Harry Pells, whose name and contribution to everything that is good have gone far beyond the borders of your magnificent city.

Let us hope and pray that we shall be privileged to meet again here in peace and contentment. And now, as an old soldier, I would like to salute the memory of Private Simon, who symbolizes everything that is good and sacred in America. Private Simon—and all our comrades—we shall try to show ourselves worthy of your sacrifice. This new home, dedicated to children, is a worthy part of our purpose and intention to carry on for a better world and future for our children. I thank you.

Ten Million Dollars to Douglas County in Federal Aids

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, to give all people an insight of just how a Congressman can be of help to the folks back home by being on the job, I wish to have printed in the official RECORD a report to the people to this effect. I propose to do this county by county for each of the 14 counties in my district.

The Federal-aid programs outlined below are all sound and needed. I supported all of these aids and had a direct part in formulating laws in Congress which outline these Federal aids for the people back home. All of these aids were drawn up and passed into law during my term in Congress.

On each of these Federal-aid programs I appeared before the proper committee and helped draw up the bills which are now law. After they became law I saw to it that each county back home got its fair share. Many of the applications for these aids were handled through my office. When many of the applications were slow in being approved, as soon as my office was contacted I got positive action.

Douglas County in the last 8 years received in Federal aids and offices more per capita of population than any county its size. Even after the war, when there was a retrenchment of Federal employees and bureaus, Douglas County was not among them. In fact, Douglas County gained two new bureaus after the war—the Farmers Home Administration office and a branch of the Veterans' Administration office. Both of these were established through my efforts.

My office has always been a clearing house for all these projects. When not handled properly, your Congressman was the first to hear about it. When slow in being approved, your Congressman was the first to hear about it. When any information was desired, your Congressman has always supplied that information. When push was needed to speed approval, your Congressman was always on the job to give it a push. It has never been necessary during my tenure in Congress for any county, city, or town to send a representative to Washington. All they had to do was to contact me by mail or phone and they get action at once.

In my term as a Member of Congress I receive numerous invitations to travel all over the world at Government expense. I am one of the very few who refused. I turned all of them down. I stayed on the job and worked on the job to get things done. It has never been necessary to censor me to devote full time to my job, because I was always on the job 12 to 16 hours a day. I never took 3 months off from my public job to go around campaigning as some candidates for Congress do. My services are always available. That is why Douglas County got so much with so little effort. Douglas County would not be in very good shape today without those Federal aids.

Here is how my being on the job has brought huge dividends to the folks in Douglas County. Here is a list of projects and the amount of Federal money for each coming into Douglas County during my term in Congress.

SUPERIOR HARBOR

During my term in Congress, maintenance work has been done on Superior

Harbor in the amount of $920,901, and the estimated expenditure in the present appropriation bill for 1951 is $168,000 for maintenance work on Superior Harbor. Four thousand five hundred dollars, as a result of a bill by me, will be spent before 1951 for a new survey of needed improvements in the Superior Harbor. Total for Superior Harbor alone during O'KONSKI's term—$1,093,421.

I have introduced and secured the passage of a resolution for the investigation of the need for further new work on Superior Harbor. A public hearing has already been held. The Army engineers advise me that their report will be completed in 1952—following which I will see, as I did in the past, that it gets an appropriation for the new work needed. I have never been turned down on these projects. That in itself is quite a record. It is to be noted that during my term Superior Harbor got more funds than any other harbor in the State of Wisconsin.

PUBLIC HOUSING FOR SUPERIOR

Public housing has gone over well in Superior. In 1944, 60 temporary dwellings at Bayview Courts were constructed at a cost of $205,450. On April 25, 1950, $130,000 was approved for planning of 400 housing units in Superior. If accepted, this will bring $4,000,000 to Superior: 200 units to be constructed in 1950 and 200 units to be constructed in 1951. Total Federal money to Superior for public housing during O'KONSKI's term in Congress—$4,335,405. No city in Wisconsin, the size of Superior, can compare to what Superior received during my term in Congress for housing.

AIRPORT AND SEWAGE FACILITIES

Fifteen thousand dollars has been advanced to the city of Superior for the planning of its airport, and $19,000 has been advanced to the city of Superior for sewage facilities planning. The city of Superior, or Douglas County, can get as much as $395,000 from the Federal Government to complete up to a class III airport if it decides to sponsor same on a Federal, State, and local matching basis. Thirty-one thousand dollars are presently programed for this Superior airport. The next step is up to Superior or Douglas County. The Federal money is available. Total for Superior Airport already given, programed, or waiting, $460,000, during O'KONSKI's term as Congressman.

FEDERAL ROAD AIDS FOR DOUGLAS COUNTY

The postwar Federal Road Aid Act was first passed in 1944 when I was a member of what is now the Public Works Committee. I had a direct hand in drafting this legislation. The distribution of money on a mileage basis rather than a population basis was a hard-fought victory for Members of Congress like myself from rural areas who put up the fight for this provision. Douglas County benefited much from this provision in the law. Read here what this Federal aid has brought to Douglas County.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION PROGRAM

Electrification of farms and small towns has been among my chief interests as a Member of Congress. Every REA bill got my full interest and complete backing. I fought every attempt to reduce or slow down the REA program. I was always on the side of those who fought valiantly for full-speed ahead on this program. As a result of this effort the head of the Lakes Cooperative Electric Association at Superior received six loans totaling $731,000 for distribution and lines. This is almost three-quarters of a million dollars to the Superior REA during my term in Congress. Not only did I work for appropriations for the REA but many of the applications for these loans I had a direct hand in getting approved. So add $731,000 to benefits received by Douglas County folks for REA during my term in Congress. Ask the REA officials of the head of the Lakes Co-op office how willingly and effectively I have been of service to them.

FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION

The Farmers Home Administration to help needy and marginal farms, to encourage farmers, has been a pet hobby of mine while in Congress. No agency in our Government is more justified in its existence. Funds for this work were always my deep concern. Being a farmer by background, I understand their problems. My first 18 years were spent on a family-owned farm which reared a family of 10 children.

FHA leaders and officers will verify how I have sold its existence to fellow Members of Congress. It was this kind of selling to city Congressmen that kept the program going. Drought loans alone as the result of my bill, the first so introduced, brought $60,000 for farmers stricken by the dought disaster. During my term in Congress, FHA loans to Douglas County farmers exceed the $500,000 mark. So check up another half million dollars in direct help by the Federal Government to Douglas County folks during my term in Congress. Besides this, I was directly responsible for the establishment of an FHA office in Superior to better aid Douglas County farm folks. The salaries of the Superior FHA employees are not included in the above-mentioned amount.

It should be mentioned here that when legislation was passed to help drought-stricken farms with soft loans, Douglas County and other northern Wisconsin farmers were the first designated by Federal authorities as a disaster area and were, therefore, the first in the Nation to receive this aid. This was directly handled by my office upon application of a county agent.

RIVER FLOOD CONTROL IN DOUGLAS COUNTY

During my term in Congress I have introduced bills calling for War Department Corps of Engineers surveys of every river and stream in Douglas County flowing into Lake Superior or the St. Croix system. The Amnicon, Poplar, Tamarack, Black, and every other major river or stream in Douglas County flowing into Lake Superior or the St. Croix system are now being or will be surveyed to plan a Federal flood-control system. Every town chairman who wrote me got action. Not once has the Congress turned me down on these bills. Every one was passed speedily and without objection. This has never been done before in the history of Douglas County. If any stream is left out of this planning, it is because some town chairman has neglected to call it to my attention. Just think of it. Not one major river, but all rivers in Douglas County are being considered in this flood-control plan. No county in the whole Nation ever got so much consideration. These surveys and plans will mean an expenditure of another $20,000 for Douglas County as a direct result of my work. When plans are completed Federal expenditures will run into another million for completion.

I started all of these projects and have never yet failed to deliver. What I need is cooperation and not obstruction to complete the job. To get such speedy action one must have the confidence and acquaintance of fellow Members of Congress. Do you want to set this program back several years or to go forward?

SCHOOL AND OTHER FACILITIES RECEIVED BY SUPERIOR FROM FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

I had a direct part in getting school and other facilities for the city of Superior from the Federal Bureau of Community Facilities. Every request made of me was fulfilled speedily. Not once was I turned down. Among the facilities gotten by me for Superior during my term as Congressman are as follows:

City of Superior: Advance planning school facilities, $4,420.

City of Superior: Advance planning school facilities, $2,700.

City of Superior: Fire truck, $5,500 Federal grant.

Superior State Teachers' College: Laboratory facilities.

Superior vocational school: Automobile mechanic shop with heating facilities.

Superior vocational school: Furniture and equipment.

Superior Teachers' College: Furniture and equipment.

Superior Teachers' College: Office, cafeteria, biology and physics laboratory facilities.

Superior nursery school: School facilities for children, $61,966 Federal Government contribution.

The school facilities Government contribution above were given under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act—a bill which I cosponsored. The nursery school and the fire truck Federal grant of $5,500 were under the Lanham Act, which I appeared before the committee and helped formulate and secure passage.

Here then we have another $200,000 in Federal aids for the city of Superior. All of these applications were granted with the help of my office. I not only helped draw up and pass the laws setting these aids up—but saw to it that Superior got its fair share. In fact, about $200,000 is far more than any city the size of Superior received in these kinds of aids.

SCHOOL LUNCH PROGRAM

Thousands of dollars come to Douglas County schools as Federal aid for the school lunch program. Nine years of teaching in high schools and colleges have put me in a position of personal knowledge of the need and the good of such a program. I have appeared each year before the proper committee to get adequate funds for this program. This is another of the good Federal aids that no one would banish. This Federal aid brings several thousand dollars a year in employment and food to Douglas County folks. I had a most active part in setting up this program and securing enough funds for its operation.

FIVE MILLION RFC LOANS TO SMALL BUSINESS

During my term in Congress the RFC has loaned more than five million to small businesses in the Tenth District. Every applicant who wrote me got immediate results. Sometimes applicants did not contact me until after they were turned down. Even then I got to work and in most cases succeeded in getting the loan approved.

My offices handled the processing of more than 40 loans. On another 40 loan applications information and procedure were secured through my office. About 50 cases are still pending and securing my help. No small-business man who contacted me was refused action or help on my part. So here we have another five million of Federal money coming to northern Wisconsin folks.

This does not include large defense contract loans which will be dealt with under war contracts. Almost $1,000,000 of these small loans went to Douglas County folks. Here is another one million of Federal aid to Douglas County folks.

SUPERIOR CAN GET AS MUCH AS $450,000 FROM FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN HOSPITAL FACILITIES

Another of my pet projects while in Congress has been better hospital facilities for the people of northern Wisconsin. I had a direct hand in formulating and passing a Federal hospital aid program during my term in Congress.

Fifteen cities in the Tenth District have been declared eligible for this aid. Five cities have already received this Federal aid during my term amounting to $200,000. These cities get up to 45 percent of the cost of hospital construction from the Federal Government.

Superior is designated as one of the eligible cities by the Federal Government. All Superior need do is get approval of the State board of health at Madison, Wis. As far as the Federal Government is concerned, due to legislation I had a direct hand in formulating, the job is done.

Should Superior decide to go ahead on a $1,000,000 hospital construction program they can get $450,000 of this amount from the Federal Government. This gives another example of what it means to have an alert Representative in Congress.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

I appreciate the fact that each and every old age pension group is mindful of my work on behalf of the aged people. Their testimonials are unanimous in praise of my work for the aged. All old age pension groups support me in my work.

I have always worked for and voted for a decent old age pension system. I have voted and worked for increased social security benefits. The present benefits are a pittance and a disgrace. The House of Representatives with my vote a year ago passed a decent social-security benefit bill. It has been stymied in the Senate since then.

In 1946 I voted for an increase in the ceiling for old age pensions. I have always voted to increase the Federal Government's share. The burden on counties, cities, and towns is too heavy and costly. I support the proposal that the Federal share should be increased and local share eliminated. This is the only way old folks will get a break. Here again about a quarter of a million dollars comes to Douglas County folks in old age pension aids.

PROMOTING SUPERIOR AND DOUGLAS COUNTY

On many occasions I have called personally on Government departments to promote Superior and Douglas County. There is not a single agency of our Government that does not have information about Superior and Douglas County before them. I delivered this in person.

The Superior Chamber of Commerce sent me a hundred promotion bulletins and materials of promotion. These were delivered in person to the proper agencies. It was my work that sends each day to the Superior Chamber of Commerce and the new industries bureau all notices of bids for Government contracts and all information needed in this respect. Way back in 1948 the shipbuilding facilities of Superior were strongly placed before the Navy Department. As a result of my efforts Navy representatives were in Superior to survey facilities.

I was not asked to do this. But I did it anyway. Superior now has an application in for a huge laboratory to be built by the Federal Government in several places in our Nation. I was not asked for this information. Nobody had to prod me to do this. The information was sent to Superior authorities by me because I am alert and on the job.

It is not necessary for Superior or industries in Superior to spend money to send someone to Washington to get something for them. All they need do is go to the chamber of commerce or new industries bureau and they will find that O'KONSKI has seen to it that the information is sent to Superior even before they themselves think about it.

SUMMARY

By being on the job Douglas County has received from the Federal Government during my term more than $10,000,000 in Federal aids—either directly expended or available. There are two classes of folks in Douglas County. There are those few businessmen who are opposing me and raising money to defeat me who say Douglas County is getting too much Federal aid. Then there are those who say ten million is not enough, they should get more.

I am mindful of both critics. I have fought for only those aids that are necessary to keep Douglas County going as a sound county. I fought for only those aids that no sensible or reasonable person would stop.

What is most important, I had foresight to look ahead. Much criticism has been heaped upon me for the public-housing program in Superior. I have been denounced for supporting it. However, if the world crisis continues so that billions of dollars of contracts are given out for construction of war matériels, adequate housing would be a good talking point.

Folks of Douglas County, I have done the best I could. I know for sure nobody else could have done more or better.

REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, the people of Mecosta County, Mich., in my district, have been known down the years for their genuine patriotism and love of country. Their approach to their responsibilities as citizens has always been outstanding. They look with apprehension upon the inroads made by Communists who, because of Executive carelessness or worse, have been able to invade that branch of Government. They view with alarm the resistance to attempts to remove Communists, subversives, and perverts from the public payroll. They are particularly exercised over the mishandling of the situation and conditions leading up to the present military activities in Korea. They believe, and I am in complete harmony with them, that one of the most important things to be done by this Government is to retire to private life the present Secretary of State, Dean G. Acheson, and the Secretary of Defense, Louis Johnson. They want this done immediately.

Mr. Speaker, I have resolutions adopted by the Mecosta County Republican Committee, setting forth their views on the more important questions before the public at this time. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to extend my remarks and include therein these resolutions in which I fully concur:

RESOLUTION FOR SUBMISSION TO STATE AND NATIONAL COMMITTEES AND TO MICHIGAN CONGRESSMEN AND SENATORS—REPUBLICAN

Whereas it is becoming increasingly evident that Truman party liners are going through an all-out effort to whitewash Truman-appointed high-ranking bureau and Cabinet members, and members of the State Department in particular as evidenced by the recent Senate investigation on the Mc-

Carthy charges—a report so misleading that one of the minority members, Senator LODGE, submitted a 32-page minority report opposing the majority (Democratic) report, and the other minority member, Senator HICKENLOOPER, wouldn't even bother to issue a retort; and

Whereas it is so patent that the bungling and ineptness of our State Department is to a very large degree responsible for the very serious straits in which we find ourselves in Korea today—(if we may believe Brig. Gen. William Roberts, recently returned from Korea for retirement from the United States Army, who stated when interviewed on the west coast that it was due to State Department insistence that the South Koreans were not properly armed or instructed—that the State Department firmly forbade instruction of anything but defensive tactics because it was afraid that the "South Koreans would wage war on the northern Koreans); and

Whereas the empty boasts of Defense Secretary Johnson were to a large degree responsible for our lack of preparedness in the present Korean conflict as evidenced by his recent statements prior to Korea, that the United States was in the finest shape that it had ever been—that we had nothing to worry about insofar as warfare was concerned due to the "secret" weapons which were and had been developed—and his patent inability to bring about order and unity among the various branches of the armed forces—a situation which frankly has resulted, together with the State Department's bungling, in loss of American lives, loss of "face" for the United States throughout the Orient and the balance of the world; and

Whereas the slipshod methods which characterize the conduct of our executive branch, the many instances in which President Truman has implicitly and tacitly put personal loyalty to friends and political appointees above loyalty to his country—a situation which is being negatively commented upon more and more by the man on the street—the evasive assurances of our troops' successes in Korea (which are refuted daily by reports from the Orient)—the seemingly superconfident attitude struck by President Truman relative to the Korean situation; the lack of any coordinated program for the successful pursuit and fruition of this conflict at executive level; the misleading reports as to the over-all picture on the Korean police action, and the constantly changing reports issued from Washington regarding calling up of troops, draft, National Guard, etc., is constantly causing more and more distress, puzzlement, and disgust on the part of the average citizen of this section of the country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the State and National Republican committees, every Michigan Republican Senator and Congressman (and sane-thinking Democrats as well) be petitioned to enact legislation which will call for a thorough investigation into the State Department and Defense Department, beginning first with a request for the dismissal or resignations of Secretaries Acheson and Johnson; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress be petitioned to forcefully and strongly urge the President of the United States to clean house and putting loyalty to his country above all else, remove the deadwood from the various executive bureaus which have caused so much concern in the past and at present; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress be petitioned to call for immediate 100-percent mobilization of all manpower and industry to the end that we shall put ourselves on a national preparedness basis that will allow us to take care of the Korean situation with as much dispatch as possible, and to maintain a National Military Establishment of such size and equipment that we will be able militarily or psychologically to ward off the threat posed by Soviet Russia, and that, if necessary, to pursue such ends by means of defensive aggression; and be it further

Resolved, That legislation be passed by the Congress providing for the instant dismissal of any employee in any department for suspected disloyalty to the United States, if such legislation has not already been passed, because we feel that to permit any person whose integrity is not far beyond reproach to serve the United States is to give Russia an open pipeline into our Government secrets; and be it further

Resolved, That the very deepest and strongest consideration be given by the State and national committees and Members of Congress to the resolutions listed above, due to the fact that Republicans, and we might say a good many Democrats as well, are fed up with the vacillating policy of our National Government in this time of dire peril, and if firm steps are not taken to remedy the grievous situation existent, it will be remedied at the polls this fall.

Unanimously adopted by the Mecosta County Republican Committee, Paris Township Hall, July 19, 1950.

The War Takes on New Meaning in Northwest Oklahoma

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. WILSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. WILSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, Oklahoma's Forty fifth National Guard Infantry Division, the famous Thunderbird, has been called to the colors and will go into Federal service on September 1 for training at Camp Polk, La. Gov. Roy J. Turner, commander in chief of the guard, has made an official announcement that the Forty-fifth has been alerted, stating that he was advised of such action by the Secretary of the Army. The Governor also announced that the Forty-fifth's summer training camp at North Hood, Tex., previously set for August 6 to 20, has been canceled.

Activation of Oklahoma's Forty-fifth National Guard Division will affect nearly 1,000 northwest Oklahoma men, according to Col. O. T. Autry, of Enid, commander of the One Hundred and Eighty-ninth Field Artillery Battalion. Mobilization will call heavily on men in the units located at Enid, Cherokee, Blackwell, Tonkawa, Alva, Ponca City, and many other Oklahoma towns, as well as the Chilocco Indian Agricultural School.

Mr. Speaker, a very timely, thoughtful, and important editorial was published Friday, August 4, 1950, by the Enid Morning News, of Enid, Okla., upon this subject, and it is as follows:

The war on the other side of the world in Korea has suddenly taken on very real meaning in Enid, Garfield County, and northwest Oklahoma generally. Designation of the Forty-fifth Division as one of four National Guard divisions to be mobilized hits the city hard. In addition to great personal sacrifice on the part of the men and their families, the calling of the Forty-fifth will mean sacrifice for the community as a whole.

The same qualifications that make good soldiers also make good citizens. The more than 400 Enid men who will enter training in September are from the ranks of the city's most productive and responsible citizens. Maj. James E. Tindle is a member of the city commission. Col. O. T. Autry, Lt. Col. Harry H. Hughes, Capt. Jewel W. Ridge, and Lt. Hardin Wilkerson hold responsible positions in the school system. There are businessmen, skilled workers, students, farmers, clerks—all doers and builders.

It will not be easy to adjust to their absence. But, as in wars past, the men themselves see the necessity of undertaking an unpleasant task and the community stands ready to make its sacrifices. For all its unpleasant aspects, the mobilization of the Forty-fifth Division does honor to the men who comprise it and to the communities from which they come.

The Forty-fifth has a proud tradition. Its successes in Sicily, at Salerno, and Anzio and in the drive through southern France, into Germany form one of the most heroic chapters of the last war. The fact that the division is one of the first called in the present emergency is evidence of its efficiency and state of readiness.

Enid takes great pride in its units of the Forty-fifth. No one doubts but that they will give a good account of themselves if events should require their active participation on the battle fronts.

Maj. Gen. James S. Styron, of Hobard, Okla., the commanding general of the Forty-fifth, is quoted recently as saying:

None of us like war, particularly the large number of veterans we have in officers and top grades of noncoms, but we seem to be in it, and there's no looking back now.

Further:

There's a rich heritage in the Thunderbird history, and, although it is somewhat of a dubious honor, it still is an honor to be considered one of the Nation's best outfits.

Just 10 years ago the famous Forty-fifth Division was notified on August 31, 1940, and the division went into Federal service on September 16, 1940. The outfit's first action in the war was in June 1943. This was followed by 511 days of combat, including eight campaigns and four amphibious landings.

Its front-line record earned for the Forty-fifth the title of the "Fightingest Outfit in World War II." The Oklahoma men fought in Sicily, at Salerno, Anzio, and in southern France. Its first taste of war was July 10, 1943, in Sicily. The division fought its way over Bloody Ridge and helped capture Messina. Then came the Salerno landings on September 10. The Forty-fifth went in and helped halt a German break-through and followed it up with 2 months of continuous fighting at Naples, Foggia, and the Benafro-Cassino district.

The division saw 125 days of combat in the Rome-Arno campaign and came out fighting in spite of casualties that reached 118 percent of its original strength. Replacements from every State in the Union took the places of the men lost. The Forty-fifth landed in southern France, and on March 28, 1945, fought its way across the Main River. On VE-day, May 9, 1945, the Forty-fifth was in Munich.

Mr. Speaker, indeed, the Forty-fifth has a proud heritage and will give a good account of itself.

Profits Must Help Pay for the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER B. HUBER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, last Friday, I introduced H. R. 9344 to reimpose excess-profits taxes and I sincerely hope that the Ways and Means Committee will report this or similar legislation favorably in the very near future.

The strongest instrument available for stabilizing the economy at the high production levels and preventing creeping inflation lies in a tax policy which takes back through taxes substantial portions of the funds which the Government pours into the economy in the purchase of war goods and services. Inflation does no one any good. Inflation will not produce extra output and thereby aid the defense effort. What it does is to raise the cost of living, make profits for the speculator and profiteer, create labor unrest, and add to the cost which the Government must pay for its defense materials. Costs of defense are sent spiraling to still higher and higher levels.

An indispensible element in any tax program for war or near war conditions is an excess-profits tax. No part of the population can be permitted to reap big profits out of war while another part of the population is fighting and sacrificing in military uniform. Ever since the first excess-profits tax was imposed during World War I, the American public has accepted, indeed, demanded, an excess-profits tax as a major instrument in preventing the enrichment which some are able to find in the activities necessary for preservation of the Nation against aggression.

Corporate profits have been running at extraordinarily all-time high levels since the shooting of World War II stopped and reached a peak of nearly $34,000,000,000 in 1948. Preliminary estimates indicate that in 1950 profits are again on the rise after having leveled off in 1949.

In 1940, before we entered the war, the corporate profits before taxes amounted to $9,300,000,000. In 1950 it is expected that they will be more than four times that amount. Corporate profits can and must, therefore, make a substantial contribution toward defraying the current costs of war. Nothing can now be gained by postponing the taxation of these profits, just as nothing can be gained through permitting further price increases and further inflation. Next year will be too late.

The schedule of excess-profits rates contained in the bill which I have proposed will impose no hardship upon any corporation. The bill is drawn upon the structure, the regulations, and detail provisions of the World War II excess-profits tax. It preserves the alternative methods whereby the tax may be calculated on either the invested capital basis or on the basis of average earnings for a base period. It preserves intact the provisions to take care of extraordinary individual cases in which the specific formula might provide inequitable results. Recognizing the special problem of small businesses, a specific exemption of $25,000 is allowed.

The bill is designed to apply to all excess income accruing after July 1, 1950, which was to all intents and purposes the beginning date of the Korean war. Differences from the World War II law relate only to: First, the base period; and, second, the schedule of rates to be applied. The new base which has been selected is 75 percent of the average rate corporate profits for the 3 years 1947 through 1949. The excess-profits tax will thus not apply to 75 percent of the average profit earned during these three base years when profits were running at record levels. It is only upon the top 25 percent of the profits earned above that high average that the schedule of increasing rates will apply. The rates proposed begin at 65 percent and are stepped up to 100 percent when the net income of a corporation goes 25 percent above the high levels of the base years.

Growth of Marketing and Purchasing Cooperatives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from News Bulletin for August 3, 1950, by Paul O. Peters:

GROWTH OF MARKETING AND PURCHASING COOPERATIVES

TABLE 1.—Number of farmers' marketing and purchasing associations

Crop period	Marketing associations	Purchasing associations	Total number
1932-33	9,352	1,648	11,000
1933-34	9,052	1,848	10,900
1934-35	8,794	1,906	10,700
1935-36	8,388	2,112	10,500
1936-37	8,142	2,601	10,743
1937-38	8,300	2,600	10,900
1938-39	8,100	2,600	10,700
1939-40	8,051	2,649	10,700
1940-41	7,943	2,657	10,600
1941-42	7,824	2,726	10,550
1942-43	7,708	2,742	10,450
1943-44	7,522	2,778	10,300
1944-45	7,400	2,750	10,150
1945-46	7,378	2,772	10,150
1946-47	7,268	2,857	10,125
1947-48	7,159	2,976	10,135

Of the 10,135 cooperatives operating during the 1947–48 crop year, the Farm Credit Administration reports the marketing co-ops divided as follows: Cotton and products, 514; dairy products, 2,091; fruits and vegetables, 929; grain, dry beans, and rice, 2,233; livestock, 552; others, 840.

Of the purchasing cooperatives, 2,879 were classified as local and 97 as large.

Volume of business

Year	Marketing	Purchasing	Total
1932-33	$1,190,500,000	$140,500,000	$1,340,000,000
1940-41	1,911,000,000	369,000,000	2,280,000,000
1943-44	4,430,000,000	730,000,000	5,160,000,000
1947-48	7,195,000,000	1,440,000,000	8,635,000,000

The statistics reveal that while the cooperatives have decreased in number, the volume of business has increased by 600 percent in marketing and over 1,000 percent in purchasing.

The question arises now, Shall the Congress move to tax cooperative marketing and purchasing associations on their earnings, distributed back as "patronage refunds" or "patronage dividends," on a basis comparable to the tax on individual enterprisers?

Our Greatest Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech I made Saturday, August 5, 1950, at ground-breaking ceremony:

Distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, I came down from Washington last night to be present for this occasion. This ground breaking marks a further distinct step forward in the development of Barksdale Air Base. It means the beginning of the construction of 692 housing units on this base under the terms of a new law that we know in Washington as the Wherry plan. Such construction will furnish more work for our people and more homes for our people to live in.

In a larger sense, this ground breaking today means not only a further expansion of Barksdale Air Base, it symbolizes an intensification of our efforts to obtain adequate national security for our people. The time for maintaining small standing military forces has long since run its course; and for a long time to come, we as a people must maintain a much stronger national defense.

This national readiness should provide for the greater Air Force of 70 air groups, the return to active service of much of the mothballed Navy and a substantial expansion of our Army and Marine Corps. The President has estimated that over $10,000,000,000 more is needed entirely for our defense—more than the $13,200,000,000 already provided in the appropriation bill will be required, making a total to date of over $23,100,000,000 in all, in the next 12 months, for the defense of this Nation, including the Korean action. The total budget of expenditures will, therefore, be in the neighborhood of $50,000,000,000—a record expenditure in a time of comparative peace.

As a matter of fact, we as a people are not exactly in a state of peace; and yet we are not in a state of war. We are in a condition of neither war nor peace; we are in the twilight zone which may lead to the one or the other. This is a status which is difficult for any nation or any people; but this status is especially difficult for a democracy. We are about to be surrounded by controls and regulations which will effect our daily way of living and which will most certainly annoy us and vex us greatly. At the same time, we are not at the point where the full flood of our patriotic emotions calls for all-out sacrifice or for all-out war. In such a condition we, the people of the United States, find ourselves; and we do not know just how long such conditions will remain with us.

One thing we do know, however, and that is that free nations have their backs to the wall with the odds against them greater than at any time since the Moslem invasion of Europe centuries ago. After the First World War, we chided our leaders that we did not assume our rightful place as a leader in world affairs. Perhaps it was a miserable mistake to have failed to work for the fruits of victory after the end of World War I. Perhaps this failure more than anything else may have brought on the Second World War and may have been the reason for so many of the untoward events which have plagued civilization since the end of the early twenties. We cannot now fail to realize that the United States has finally assumed a position of full leadership in the affairs of mankind; and all of us know that this position carries with it an awful responsibility, a responsibility of using our influence to create a just and a peaceful world. It carries with it the further necessity of hardships and privations which have not been too widespread in America during times of peace; and we may find that the burden of leadership in the affairs of mankind is especially heavy upon our people.

At this point, we have no alternative. To turn back to a condition of isolation in the world is but to court immediate disaster and to give the world over to communism. It is the road which promises short surcease from the burdens of the day; and it is in effect selling our birthright for a mess of pottage. Our only course is to go ahead—push on in spite of the perils of the path and the hardships and sacrifices of the rough road. It is the one chance of working this matter out so as to attain a lasting peace in our time. It is the one method of supporting the United Nations and making this great Organization work.

In making this decision, our people are not beguiled or fooled. They know the meaning of more taxes and rationing and privation. They know what it is to endure hardships and sacrifices. They know rigid economy and austerity. In Government, it means the cutting down of useless and unnecessary expenditures. But it means far more than this.

In the future, and for a long time to come, the United States must place national security first of all on its list of boasted securities. Before any problem affecting the lives of our people is solved or before any problem effecting the development of our great land is approached, we must first provide for national defense. We must do this if we are to live and survive in a world threatened constantly by dictators. We must do this if we are to remain free men—not slaves to a communistic tyranny. Irrigation, reclamation, power development, internal improvements—may all be pushed aside for the time being in the face of the urgent need for self-preservation. Government economy alone is not enough. It is going to take Government sacrifice and Government austerity and rugged honesty.

Even more closely home, may come the burden of family sacrifices and economy. As a people, we may, for the time being, be compelled to forego the boast of our great national American prosperity and high standard of living—with an automobile for each family and each individual of each family; a radio set for every home and every room in the home, a television set, a family washing machine and many other things which so many of us accept as every-day necessities and requirements under our American standard of life. This may be part of the post-war requirement of world leadership in our all-out effort to provide for a lasting world peace. This may be part of the cost to make the world secure that our grandsons and their sons may not be called upon periodically to leave their homes and offer their lives on a foreign field of battle.

My friends, I regret that this speech must be somber on such a happy occasion as that of the beginning of construction of 692 homes for enlisted men and officers of the Air Force. Providing homes for those who need them is always a happy occasion, whether it be within or without the Armed Forces. We rejoice with the commanding officer of this great air base that the beginning of this work will mark our active efforts to provide long-needed housing for Air Force personnel. It will mean a more contented garrison with a far greater percentage of reenlistments. It will mean a finer and a greater Barksdale Air Base, a greater national defense and a stronger, although perhaps for the time being a less comfortable, Nation. For it is only by strength and sacrifice in times such as these that our priceless liberties and our sacred heritage shall be preserved to our children and to succeeding generations.

As I look around me today I see others whose forebears have gone through the pioneer days of toil and privation. Our people hewed a Nation out of a wilderness and brought it to full maturity through effort and sacrifice. In two great world wars during my lifetime, our people have shown courage and stoicism and sacrifice; and today, in far-off Korea, our boys are making the supreme sacrifice on the field of battle. Our people know what to expect. They are accustomed to sacrifice, and they also know that our American heritage has been obtained and maintained through the years only by sacrifice and privation. I am satisfied that they have the courage and will meet the test.

California Farm Bureau Says Broadcasting Essential to Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 31, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I submit for the information of you and my other distinguished colleagues, the text of the following resolution. It is self-explanatory. This resolution was first adopted at their convention in my home city of Long Beach on November 20, 1947, and again readopted at their annual business sessions, in 1948 and 1949.

I have noticed that several of my distinguished colleagues have heretofore extended their remarks on related subjects to this important resolution. For instance, Hon. CARL HINSHAW on May 5, 1949; Hon. CLINTON ANDERSON, January 19, 1950; Hon. TOM CONNALLY, February 1, 1950; Hon. O. C. FISHER, July 11, 1950; and others:

CLEAR CHANNEL RESOLUTION—CALIFORNIA STATE GRANGE ANNUAL MEETING, 1949

California State Grange in annual meeting, Sacramento, Calif., is aware of the threat to clear channel radio stations in legislation pending before both Houses of the Congress of the United States. We are also concerned over possible detrimental action by the North American Regional Broadcasting Conference now in session in Montreal, Canada. The California State Grange requests that this conference allow no duplication of American clear channel broadcasting frequencies by foreign countries. We further urge that the rights of rural radio listeners in the United States be protected and that we be heard by the United States delegation to the conference if any such action is contemplated.

The California State Grange reiterates its previous position that there be no further break-down in the number of clear channel radio stations. We oppose any legislative measure that would limit in any way the ability of clear channel stations to serve rural people. We further vigorously request that the Federal Communications Commission allow clear channel radio stations sufficient power to serve adequately rural areas now receiving little or no service.

Passed unanimously, November 18, 1949.

Austin Cramps Malik's Style

OF
HON. HALE BOGGS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from New Orleans States of August 4, 1950:

AUSTIN CRAMPS MALIK'S STYLE

On the UN diplomatic front, our line is holding, thanks to the astute, forceful generalship of our chief delegate, Warren R. Austin.

He has had to fight an enemy who occupies the commanding ground of the battle scene, the chairmanship of the Security Council. Since August 1, that position has been held by Soviet delegate Jakob A. Malik.

Despite this Red advantage, Austin has fought an aggressive battle that has kept the Soviet chairman from imposing his will on the Council.

And in the course of his struggle to keep Russia from diverting the council from its initiated course against the Red aggressors in Korea, Austin has provided the world with vigorous diplomatic passages that are a far cry from the usual mealymouth stuff bandied about in the striped-pants circles.

His refusal to enter into a suggested "deal" for the settlement of the Korean war was enhanced by;

"So long as men are dying in defense of the United Nations, this council will not wish to cheapen their suffering or sully their heroism by seeming to engage in the consideration of deals."

That kind of language will go far to counteract the propaganda harvest Russia expects to reap from the speeches of its Malik in the Security Council.

It is obvious that one of the main reasons Russia returned to participation in the Security Council was to use it as a sounding board for propaganda. The strategy is for Malik to sound off as often as possible on the theme that the United States is the aggressor in Korea; that the Soviet is the fervent seeker of peace.

For instance, he declared that Austin's resolution for localization of the conflict was diplomatic language that really meant: To increase and expand the conflict, increase the munitions, and the flying fortresses.

For a dictator nation to accuse its opposition of aggression that the dictator nation itself is plotting is an old routine. You would hardly expect anyone to be fooled by it. But the Russians remember another maxim that accompanies this sort of trickery. And that is that a lie repeated often enough will be believed as truth by many people.

To the Russians, the United Nations Security Council is a good stage on which to present their act. Thanks to Delegate Austin, the Soviet act is being loused up.

The Federal Incentive Income-Tax Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, there has come to my attention an address delivered by Frank Wilbur Main, CPA, of the firm of Main & Co., Pittsburgh, Pa., public accountants, at the Twelfth Annual Institute on Accounting, Ohio State University, May 19, 1950.

The subject of the address is the Federal Incentive Income-Tax Plan. The subject matter is such as to challenge the thoughtful consideration of all who are interested in the subject of a proper basis for our tax structure. The thoughts expressed by Mr. Main in his address take on greater significance and importance because of his many years of activity in the field of public accounting. The experience he has gained and the high repute in which he is held in his profession entitle anything said by Mr. Main on the subject of taxation to the greatest consideration and attention.

I include the address to which I have referred as part of my remarks. It is as follows:

THE FEDERAL INCENTIVE INCOME-TAX PLAN

It is a pleasure and a privilege to meet with so many outstanding certified public accountants, educators, and leaders in business, finance, and industry.

The Federal incentive income-tax plan has been before the country for the past 5 years and has been subject to wide discussion, including opposition as well as commendations. The plan was first presented to Congress and to selected groups in April 1945 and was based on 2 years' careful research and specialized study by my partners and myself, preceded by more than 30 years' experience, both extensive and intensive, in the field of Federal taxation. Since that time there have been three revisions of the plan, the last being that of April 1950. No change has ever been made in the plan's basic philosophy or structure. Modifications appear only in the proposed exemptions and rates of taxation.

The Federal incentive income-tax plan is based on an entirely new concept of Federal taxation, namely, the taxation of income rather than the taxation of individuals and corporations. This taxing of income automatically simplifies the tax structure. This new concept is accomplished by identical rates for individuals and corporations, with the same general exemptions, same graduations, same ceiling, and by freeing dividends from taxation in the hands of the recipients. This simplified tax structure, if adopted, will completely neutralize the question as to whether business is done as a corporation, a partnership, or an individual.

Specifically, this tax plan will eliminate what are probably the greatest sources of difficulty and controversy in our present income-tax structure. These are:

1. The taxing, at different rates, of identical amounts of income, depending solely on the manner in which the business is conducted.
2. The reasonableness of salaries and other compensation of corporation officers who are also major stockholders.
3. All the questions in respect to unnecessary accumulation of surplus.
4. The double taxation of dividends.

While the accomplishment of simplicity in the tax structure was a primary purpose in the devising of the Federal incentive income-tax plan, it was secondary to the recognized necessity of bringing about incentive in our national economy.

This incentive we would accomplish by raising exemptions so that there will be more income in the hands of all taxpayers. We have especially in mind those who are dependent on fixed incomes, from pensions or otherwise, and so are unable to adjust their incomes to the inflationary trend. This is only one part, however, of the incentive feature. The other is to place a ceiling on the taxation of any income, and thus to provide funds for investment both in already established concerns and in new and risk-taking ventures.

Specifically, we would raise the exemption of single individuals from $600 to $1,000; of married couples from $1,200 to $2,000; of corporations to $2,000; but leave the exemption for dependents at $600. The graduated scale of taxes we propose ranges from 15 percent on net taxable income, after all allowable deductions and exemptions, to 50 percent on all net taxable income over $50,000. By placing a limit of 50 percent on any part of taxable income, and by freeing dividends from taxation, a substantial incentive is provided for investment.

The freeing of dividends in itself not only would bring about increased investment, but also would probably result in relieving sound companies from fixed indebtedness. Investors, in our opinion, would much prefer a dividend on which they pay no taxes rather than interest on which they do pay taxes. In such cases, Uncle Sam would not lose anything, inasmuch as the interest is now free of taxation to the corporation but is subject to taxation on the recipient; on the other hand, under the Federal incentive income-tax plan the dividend income would be subject to taxation on the corporation but would be free of tax on the recipient.

Inflation can only be leveled off and controlled, we believe, by increased production. This involves two factors: First, increased ability to buy on the part of all citizens, and second, increased investment on the part of those with surplus income.

You may be interested in the background and philosophy of the Federal incentive income-tax plan and in the response which we have received to it.

In April 1945, we stated that the present Federal taxing structure needed not so much amendment and adjustment, which would further complicate an already very complicated system of taxation, but rather a complete overhauling. Our present tax structure is geared to war economy. What we must have is a taxing philosophy patterned for years of peacetime living.

Let me review briefly our Federal taxing structure and the factors that have controlled its development.

As early as 1909 we had an excise corporation income tax. In 1913 the income-tax amendment to the Constitution was passed, and graded income taxes became possible. These taxes, however, did not amount to much until 1917, when the impact of the First World War brought about the necessity of drastic increases in taxes, with the resultant high normal and surtaxes for individuals, and high normal and excess profits taxes for corporations. In the 1918 act the taxes were increased still more.

In the years that followed there were reductions and then further increases, culminating, during the Second World War, in the very high normal and surtaxes for individuals and normal, surtaxes, and excess-profits taxes for corporations. In addition to these taxes, there were the victory tax on individuals and the capital stock tax on corporations. One major objective of all these very high taxes was to siphon off the income of individuals so they would not have the money to buy the articles and products that either did not exist or were very scarce. Another objective was to take away from the corporations all excess profits, so that they would not profit unduly from wartime activities.

During the war period a single person with a net income of $1,500 before personal exemption paid a Federal tax of $230; a married couple without dependents with a net income of $2,500 paid a Federal tax of $360. In the case of high individual incomes, the rates rose to in excess of 90 percent. The rates for corporations rose to extremely high percentages. The purposes were sound and the desired results were attained. As an indication of the accomplishment of these taxes, the number of tax returns increased from approximately seven to eight million in 1940 to forty-odd million in 1945.

The excess-profits taxes on corporations have been eliminated; likewise we no longer have the victory tax. There have been some adjustments in exemptions and tax rates, and we now have the benefit of split incomes for married couples. For the calendar year 1950, it is estimated that under the present law there will be about 55,000,000 income-tax returns.

Under the Federal incentive income-tax plan, with our assumption of national income for the year 1950, there would be about 35,000,000 income-tax returns, or approximately five times the number in 1940. We would relieve 20,000,000 taxpayers of income-tax liability.

You may well say, "Why should there be 20,000,000 less income-tax payers?" Our answer to that is, first, that income taxes are threatening the living standards of many in the lower economic brackets; and second, that citizens with lower incomes pay the greater part of the excise taxes. By the way, those excise taxes now approximately equal the total income of the Federal Government from all sources in the year 1940. In other words, an amount equaling all the Federal receipts in 1940 is now being paid through the taxes on amusements, tobacco, liquor, gasoline, and the various miscellaneous excises. It is at once apparent that these taxes are largely paid by those in the lower income groups, because of the simple fact that they comprise most of our population.

The first Federal incentive income-tax plan proposed in April 1945 was based on a postwar national income of $160,000,000,000, and a Federal budget of $25,500,000,000. Other tax proposals made at that same time were based on a postwar national income of $100,000,000,000, with a possibility that it might reach $125,000,000,000. These plans were also generally based on an assumed Federal budget of from sixteen to eighteen billion dollars. Why were we so far out of line with other proposals in our assumptions of national income and Federal budget? Let me give you a little economic background.

The national income, during the period from 1932 to 1940, had varied from approximately $40,000,000,000 to $78,000,000,000. The highest national income this country had ever had before the Second World War was that of 1929, namely, $83,000,000,000. The Federal budget, during this same period, viz, from 1932 to 1940, had varied from approximately $4,000,000,000 to $9,000,000,000, the Government take averaging approximately 11 percent per year. Our Federal debt, which had been on an almost stationary level of $2,500,000,000 from the Civil War to the First World War, had increased to $25,500,000,000 as a result of the First World War. Along with many other Americans, I personally was much concerned by this great increase. The late Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, advocated a reduction in income taxes at the close of World War I. This advice was followed, and the tax incentives resulted in expanded business, which produced sufficient Government revenue to reduce the debt in a few years to $16,500,000,000. Then came the thirties, and at the time we entered the Second World War, our debt was approximately $45,000,000,000. However, we were a richer country than I had realized in 1918 and 1919, and this debt was handled more easily than I had anticipated.

With the advent of the Second World War, it was necessary to win, whatever the cost. Our estimate in April 1945 was that our Federal debt would go to approximately $300,000,000,000. Our studies also convinced us that with this debt and with our obligations to our veterans, a large army and navy, and many other additional expenses, the minimum budget that we could expect would be at least $25,500,000,000.

How were we going to raise a budget of twenty-five billion five hundred million dollars? Certainly not from income such as we had in 1932, or from the income we had in 1940, or from an income of one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five billion dollars, such as many predicted in 1945. During the period from 1932 to 1940, as already stated, the Government take had been approximately 11 percent per year. We figured that the Government perhaps could take 15 percent without permanently endangering the national economy. With a budget of $25,500,000,000, and a Government take of 15 percent, a national income of at least one hundred and sixty billion would be required.

We now doubt very much that the Government can continue to take as much as 15 percent without further puffing up our income through inflationary forces. In 1946, before the national income reached one hundred and sixty billion, we went on record in Washington and elsewhere that we were not at all in doubt that the national income would go to $160,000,000,000 and beyond. We were certain that without a sound incentive tax plan, geared to peace, the national income could not be held at this figure, and that we would be faced with ever-rising inflation until such time as we had a sound taxing plan, together with economy in our national administration. A sound taxing plan is not the only step necessary for the elimination of inflation and for the establishment of a sound economy, but, in our opinion, it is a most important one. It should be followed closely, perhaps it would be better to say accompanied, by economy in the administration.

While our plan, in 1945, was based on a national income of one hundred and sixty billion, our current revision is based on the assumption that personal income in 1950 will amount to two hundred thirty-seven billion five hundred million, and that there will be thirty-five billion of corporate compiled net profits. Whether or not we seem today to be a little high in our estimate does not greatly matter, because the inflationary forces are still at work, and if our forecast is high today, it will, we believe, be low before too much time has elapsed.

Now as to the reception given to the Federal incentive income-tax plan, and the reaction of the public and interested groups—at the time the plan was first proposed, we thought that we could anticipate the criticism which we would receive. We felt that such criticism would center largely around the complete freeing of dividends and the placing of a limit of 50-percent tax on any income. This did not prove to be the case.

The first criticism received was that in the postwar period it would be impossible to have a national income of $160,000,000,000. You will recall that there was a great deal of agitation in the closing months of the war to make certain that our national income did not drop too drastically and thus bring about mass unemployment. The New York Sun, on June 1, 1945, had a very interesting review of the plan. The editorial writer stated, however, that inasmuch as the plan was based on an assumed national postwar income of $160,000,000,000, it was quite impractical. The writer did, however, commend a private citizen for interest in this matter. There was also a great deal of criticism in respect to an assumed budget of $25,500,000,000. I was practically referred to as an advocate of Government extravagance. The passage of time has more than taken care of these two criticisms.

There was likewise a great deal of criticism in respect to raising the exemptions. It was and is still felt by many that everybody ought to pay some share of the cost of Government. Actually everybody does, through the multiplicity of hidden taxes. The fact seems to be overlooked that if we are to have a sound, healthy economy, as well as decent and equitable society, we must leave in the hands of all citizens, and particularly in the hands of those dependent on pensions and other fixed incomes, sufficient to live with some degree of comfort. The inflation has already gone so far that if such people are completely relieved from taxation, a fixed income of say $100 per month, which at one time was a rather substantial amount, will not now provide any great comfort.

Perhaps the feature of our proposal which has been most criticized is that we would raise the corporation tax on all taxable income over $50,000 from the present 38 percent to 50 percent. The principal objection to this is due to the theory, on the part of many, that corporations actually do not pay taxes—that they only pass them on. Our answer to this is that all taxpayers pass their taxes on as best they can. The workman asks for increased wages; corporations raise their prices; the professional man endeavors to raise his fees—all succeed to a certain extent, but nobody is too well satisfied with the manner in which he passes on taxes. There is one great group, however, that has not been able to pass on the taxes, and that is the pensioners and the others who are dependent on fixed incomes.

One answer to the criticism against raising corporation taxes has been that the Government has to have a certain amount of money. While our original plan and the first revision provided for a ceiling of taxation of 50 percent, we felt, just before the cold war became quite hot, that with the reduced Government spending which then appeared to be in the offing the maximum ceiling could be reduced to 40 percent. This is the percentage that we had planned to propose on our second revision, but with the changed conditions such a maximum would not have been honest, since it would not have provided sufficient revenue.

Even with a maximum of 50 percent on corporations, our studies also convinced us that corporate stockholders would be better off for several reasons. In the first place, their dividends would be free of taxation. In the second place, in order to provide the officers with the income to which they are entitled, if the individual paid no more than 50 percent on any part of his income it would not be necessary for as large salaries to be paid at the higher levels. With an economy expanding on a sound basis, we are also convinced that a 50-percent tax on the corporate income that would be earned would be better than the 38 percent in an economy which has been expanding very largely through inflationary forces.

While there has been some criticism of the incentive income tax plan, there has been a great deal of commendation, too. More and more citizens are becoming interested in it. We were naturally quite pleased that Life magazine, in its February 13, 1950, issue, referred to this plan as one of four proposals now under consideration. We were also pleased with articles by Mr. G. A. Price, president of Westinghouse Electric Corp., in reference to the Federal incentive income tax plan which appeared in Fortune and Coronet magazines. While many in Washington and elsewhere know about the plan, this is a tremendously big country, and, after all, many still do not know about it. If you believe the plan is meritorious, and that its enactment would be a good thing for our country, I hope you will say so to your Senators and Congressmen.

I thank you.

What Are We Fighting For?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Raymond Moley, outstanding news columnist for Newsweek, in its issue of August 7, asks a most pertinent question, What are we fighting for? I commend it to the attention of all Members of this body and I include it at this point in my remarks:

The Korean operation once more reminds us of the critical needs of considering again the distinction between immediate military victory and the steady pursuit of long-term international political objectives.

This broad question is the subject of a little book, Great Mistakes of the War, by Hanson W. Baldwin, perhaps this country's most penetrating military writer. Baldwin's criticism is pregnant with meaning for the present and the future, as well as the past.

The deep meaning of international politics is that we live in the midst of living forces, movements, and all sorts of national ambitions. The absence of war does not mean freezing these forces. Nations guided by wise and far-reaching foreign policy take account of them and adjust their permanent policy to the ultimate preservation of their interests and ideals. Since they generally seek peace on terms favorable to their own security, they take account of the possible aggressions of other nations. There was plenty of evidence of Communist purposes long before the Second World War began. But brushing this danger aside and ignoring the more worldly wise Churchill, Roosevelt and his military high command concentrated upon the quickest military decision against the German and Japanese alliance.

Baldwin puts his point in these words: "Our major American wartime errors were all part and parcel of our political immaturity. We fought to win, period. We did not remember that wars are merely an extension of politics by other means; that wars have objectives; that wars without objectives represent particularly senseless slaughters; that unless a nation is to engage in an unlimited holocaust those objectives must be attainable by the available strength, limited by the victor's capacity to enforce them and the willingness of the vanquished state to accept them; and that the general objective of war is a more stable peace."

It seems strange that two master politicians on the domestic scene like Roosevelt and Truman have been unable to comprehend this point. But in domestic politics the candidate looks only to the next election or two. He cannot chart a course for decades and generations.

Some of the mistakes that resulted from mistaken policy were the unready Philippines, the refusal to adopt Churchill's "soft underbelly" strategy, unconditional surrender, the Morgenthau plan, the pause before Berlin, Prague, and Vienna, Winant's permission for Russian encirclement of Berlin, and the unnecessary use of the atom bomb on Japanese cities. Then there was capitulation to the Russians at Yalta.

The Truman regime continued this course in the wanton destruction of German and Japanese industry under the direction of theoretical social reformers and of military people ignorant of either politics or economics. Finally, there was the Acheson policy in Asia.

All this is not second-guessing, as the record will show.

Years of war and years of peace are indistinguishable when the course of a nation's policy is unrolled. Wise nations have had such policies. There was Bismarck's Germany, and England from Chatham to Churchill. Changes in party ascendency should not alter these deep currents of foreign policy. But in the past 2 years Acheson has reversed Seward, Blaine, Hay, Root, Hoover, and Stimson in the Orient. And the Nation stands perilously on the edge of an uncharted wilderness, without a policy and with still indeterminate resources.

The question is now raised whether vast expenditures shall be made in lives and matériel in land operations or whether we shall continue the operation with the Air Force and the Navy. Baldwin makes the point that Japan was reduced to the point of surrender without a land invasion and before the atom bomb was dropped. Korea is smaller, and we are based on Japan. We must also consider this operation as a background for future possible engagements on a similar scale or on the wide continent of Europe. The road ahead is long and our resources, however great, are limited. Let us look to our political objectives and guide ourselves accordingly.

Mobilize Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, the editors of the small-town newspapers frequently have a better appreciation of the problems confronting Congress than do the editors of the metropolitan dailies.

I desire to extend my remarks and include a paragraph from the Lovilia (Iowa) Press, edited and published by Mr. Gayle M. Bennett, a young man of character and ability who served in the Armed Forces during the recent war with distinction and credit and is now publishing a very fine small-town newspaper. The editorial is as follows:

The problem of complete or partial mobilization of the military and the civilian economy is plaguing the administration.

However, the Nation must realize that there is a definite possibility of another wide-scale war. Partial mobilization will cause the least convenience and cost much less at the moment, but if we are plunged into another terrible war, it may also be disastrous.

A crystal ball for Congressmen at this time might be appropriate, but we don't have much faith in them either.

It might save money and many lives if this Nation mobilized for war now and prepared to stave off any attack. We already know how costly it is to have too little, too late. The next time might see our way of life go up in smoke, and our freedoms cannot be regained, once lost, through the expenditure of money.

America's Most Rugged Highway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I am inserting in the RECORD, an article by the Honorable Richard Neuberger on the Lewis and Clark Trail. Dick Neuberger is America's outstanding authority on the American Northwest and I commend the article to the membership of the House not only because it is well written but because it shows there are still frontiers for the people of our country to develop.

The article, from the Portland Oregonian of July 23, 1950, follows:

AMERICA'S MOST RUGGED HIGHWAY—COSTLY ROAD BEING PUSHED THROUGH IDAHO WILDERNESS

(By Richard L. Neuberger)

Gen. William Tecumseh Sherman, of "War is hell" fame, also said something else. While serving as chief of staff of the United States Army in 1877, the old leader of Civil War troops said: "From all reports received at the War Department, the Lolo Trail in Idaho Territory must be the most terrible trail on the North American continent."

A road over this formidable route now is within 35 miles of completion. When construction ends, the road will be the first highway ever thrust across the vast Salmon River wilderness of Idaho, the most immense roadless area in the Nation.

Eastward out of the remote Idaho settlement of Kooskia, men have hacked a 26-foot roadway along ledges of solid granite. Westward through pine forests from Lolo Hot Springs in Montana, crews have cleared a corridor for 19 spectacular miles.

The closing of the breach will make accessible to tourists a succession of mile-deep canyons and rocky peaks never before glimpsed from a tonneau. It also will reduce the distance by car between the seacost cities of the Pacific Northwest and the population centers of western Montana—Missoula, Butte, and Helena.

On the maps this route is known officially as Idaho State Highway 9. However, to the people of this backwoods realm it is the "Lewis and Clark Trail." The first white men to trudge across the continent were also the first to use the Lolo Trail. On this tortuous path, worn by many generations of tribal moccasins, Meriwether Lewis and William Clark were lost in dark chasms and desperately divided a half-starved timber wolf among their 27 followers as food.

The journals of the celebrated explorers record the Lolo Trail as by far the grimmest phase of the 2-year trek which planted the American flag on the shores of the Pacific. In the 1870's the Second United States Cavalry under Gen. Oliver O. Howard pursued the Nez Perce Indians up the Clearwater and Lochsa watersheds, through which the Lolo Trail dips and circles.

The terrain was so pocked with frightening ravines that Chief Joseph, leader of the Nez Perce, could pitch camp within sight of the troops and still know they would be unable to establish contact with him in less than 24 hours. Hardened veterans of the Indian wars, many chevrons and service stripes ribbing their blue tunics, dismounted to lead their horses gingerly over perilous switchbacks.

The awesome aspects of this scenery are reflected in prodigious construction costs for Idaho Highway 9.

The average expenditure per mile is $115,000, and this takes care only of surfacing and drainage. Bridges and gravel are not included. A number of 1-mile stretches have required $200,000 apiece. Near the Idaho end of the road, where pneumatic drills and explosives must erode away the frowning bluffs above the Lochsa, one particular mile cost a fabulous $304,000.

Engineers of the Federal Bureau of Public Roads point out that this sum, merely for advance work on a two-lane highway, may well approach some sort of national record. It also explains why completion of the road has been long delayed.

A highway over the Lolo Trail first was planned in 1920, according to James Reid, chief engineer of Idaho's bureau of highways. In the beginning it was a project of the United States Forest Service, for the road invades three huge national forests: the Nez Perce, the Clearwater, and the Lolo. Not until just before World War II, however, did pioneering survey crews of the Federal Bureau of Public Roads map a route up the Lochsa River and across the summit of Lolo Pass. "Most rugged and cantankerous country I ever was in," summed up the foreman of this venturesome undertaking.

Some idea of the wilderness pierced by the Lewis and Clark Highway may be gained from the fact that the finished Alaska Highway, breasting the mighty solitudes of the Yukon Territory cost $47,500 a mile. This is considerably less than one-half the $115,000 budgeted for each mile between Kooskia and Lolo Hot Springs.

Idaho Highway No. 9 received its greatest impetus when a Federal prison camp was opened near the hamlet of Lowell in 1943. Conscientious objectors and other prisoners hung in rope slings from the precipices and helped to hew a rocky ledge along the Lochsa. This closed the breach between the Idaho and Montana ends of the road to 35 miles; it will be down to 33 by this summer.

Ultimate completion of the spectacular highway depends entirely upon how fast the necessary funds are allocated by the United States Government and by the State of Idaho. In the meanwhile, motorists can cover the graded sections which already have been completed. These stretches of 26-foot, graveled roadbed get cars deeper into the Salmon River fastnesses than ever before.

Missoula is the principal transportation center to reach road's end in Montana. It lies on United States Highway No. 10 and also is served by the main lines of the Northern Pacific and the Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific. Missoula is the seat of the University of Montana, sprawling at the base of Sentinel Peak, and boasts one of the most modern hotels in the Rocky Mountain region, the Florence.

Lewiston, where the Clearwater River pours its glacial tribute into the Snake, is the Idaho portal for this wilderness saga. Sixty miles of road, all except eight of it hard-surfaced, connect Lewiston and Kooskia. U S 95 serves Lewiston, and so do branch passenger routes of the Union Pacific and Northern Pacific. These lines operate the wandering Camas Prairie railroad to the very jumping-off place for the Lochsa hinterland. Appropriately enough, Lewiston's traditional hotel is the Lewis and Clark.

The total cost of the highway over the Lolo Trail will be $8,121,000. The Bureau of Public Roads recently announced that approximately $3,000,000 of this sum already had been invested. Although a wide gap still separates the two beginnings of the highway, travelers can wheel their automobiles into one of the Nation's great hunting and fishing meccas.

Thirty-inch trout are not uncommon. Elk, deer, and moose forage in the groves of Ponderosa pine. Some of America's few remaining grizzly bears compel the unarmed wayfarer to be careful. The Lochsa and the Clearwater are flecked with white-capped riffles. Where the Lewis and Clark Highway twists close to the water, a man can practically cast from the driver's seat and fill his creel.

It also is a land of picturesque people. School children cross forbidding chasms in miner's buckets, using a rope and pulley. In a few schoolhouses the youngsters live from Monday until Friday, because it is too far to go home each night. One prospector, when he leaves his cabin, invariably nails a sign to the door: "Some of everything here has been poisoned."

It is a land of history and tragedy, too. In White Bird Canyon, 21 miles from Kooskia, Chief Joseph and his warriors wiped out Lieutenant Theller and 34 troopers of H Company. It was the most tragic slaughter of soldiers on any one day of the Indian wars except that of the Custer Massacre. A hush hangs over the gloomy defile where the cavalrymen were ambushed.

Not only tourists are pressing for the Lewis and Clark Highway to be completed. Idaho's people also are bringing pressure on Boise and Washington, D. C., for an accelerated program of construction. Along a distance of 300 miles, no road stretches east and west across Idaho. U S 30 follows the Snake River at the southern edge of the State. U S 10 is far to the north, in the wooded panhandle. In between, no land route spans Idaho.

This is why the closing of the 35-mile breach on the Lolo Trail looms as so essential. "This road will reach into a region," explains James Reid, Idaho's chief highway engineer, "where there has been practically no transportation except by air. The country is of such rugged grandeur that there even have been comparatively few usable air strips."

In fact, the men now doing another summer's work travel as did their predecessors of long ago—Lewis and Clark. Beyond the end of the highway, they trudge on foot, ride horses and embark in rafts and canoes on the Lochsa. Even in a drive to the end of construction, the motorist feels that he is heading his car where few internal-combustion engines have been operated before.

William R. Moore, ranger on the Lochsa district of the Lolo National Forest, advises tourists to bring along tents, blankets, and canned goods. No inns or lodges are expected to dot the Lewis and Clark Highway until the gap along the Lochsa is closed. Until then, the wayfarer must tote his own food and shelter.

The contractors on North America's most rugged road this summer are Miller & Strong Construction Co. Their headquarters are located in Roseburg, Oreg.

A Time for Action at Home

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Tablet of July 15, 1950:

A TIME FOR ACTION AT HOME

The news that comes from Korea is tragic because hundreds of American boys are being killed and thousands of others are suffering in a war over 7,000 miles away from home. With it comes the promise of more casualties. In addition, there is the threat that the Soviet may disperse our limited Armed Forces by starting warfare in one, or more, or all, of six other widely separated places in distant parts of the world. Americans will b expected to provide the flesh and blood and sinews of war in Asia, Europe, and Africa for what are called the United Nations. The latter Organization has been induced to furnish the flags—to show that the troops are fighting for the United Nations, not the United States.

That this situation is serious is obvious. But what makes it doubly serious is not receiving sufficient attention. The fact is that the very same men in the State Department whose record is one of compromising with and whitewashing communism and Soviet Russia are still in office. These men will have great influence over our Armed Forces and will play a large part in directing the strategy upon which we must depend to defeat a vicious and satanically directed enemy. When the warfare dies down, if it ever does, these same men will go to another Yalta to "handle" another peace.

These are the same men who were entrusted by Congress to spend $10,500,000 for the defense of Korea and $27,600,000 to strengthen the anti-Communist defenses of the Philippines, Iran, and Korea, and who spent only $200 of it—for wire, which, incidentally, has not arrived in Korea yet. Why? According to testimony reported as given recently before the Senate Appropriations Committee, it was because the State Department "thought it unwise to leave the South Koreans weapons with which to become aggressive." The State Department's policy has been, "Don't arm South Korea," "Don't arm China," "Don't arm Spain," "Don't arm Japan," "Don't Arm Germany." Could Stalin have adopted a better policy to insure a Soviet triumph? Could the Communists want a better program than to have the United States spread its strength all over the world without allies and without sufficient manpower to fight satellites which Russia has armed, trained, and indoctrinated, and whose millions the Soviet can direct against us to do their fighting?

Again, these same individuals, who helped turn China over to the Soviet, who were willing to sacrifice Formosa, who kept telling the American people the Chinese Reds were not real Communists but "agrarian reformers, now shout demands for unity. They expect the American people to be confused and to forget the State Department's bankruptcy. Unity, to them, means unity with the blunderers who are still in control.

It is the very same demand that was made when lend-lease was given Russia, with the result we built up the Soviet to be the menace it is today. It is the same cry that smeared all criticism of the barbaric Morgenthau plan, the unconditional-surrender policy, the boundary agreement for Poland, and the insistence of a government in that heroic country which would be partly Communist, the setting up of tyrannical Red governments in a dozen other countries which had been "liberated," and, finally, the undeniable weaknesses of the United Nations Organization.

Strong criticism might have revealed these colossal blunders in time, but the American people were given a bogus unity appeal and told to feed on the Atlantic Charter, the "four freedoms," world peace, and democracy. "Stand by the President" was the slogan that contributed much to the strengthening of Soviet Russia.

One thing should be done at once. The people should be told the truth. Back in January, when Senator TAFT publicly asserted the United States Navy should patrol Formosa and not permit China to be completely sold out by State Department policies modeled upon the Amerasia and Institute of Pacific Relations pro-Communist programs, the Senator was bitingly scolded. Secretary Acheson used terms of ridicule in referring to "this distinguished statesman who is often in error but never in doubt." Finally, in July, President Truman did what Senator TAFT had recommended 6 months previously, without, of course, acknowledging the latter's sound judgment.

That the people have been continually misled is conceded on all sides. Why not tell them the Reds' aim is and always has been to control the world? Why not admit frankly that some Americans have betrayed our Nation and assure the people that every Communist and Communist sympathizer within our Government—as well as every quisling and fifth columnist—will no longer hold a public post? Why not tell them who is responsible for sending the small, ill-prepared and poorly armed troops of Americans into the Korean shambles against a well-trained and strongly armed enemy of whom we know little?

The American people know that their country is in peril. Let them be told that the State Department policies which have played into the hands of the Communists are at an end, that neither in Washington nor in any State or city will Communist conspirators be permitted to bore from within?

Then, to prove the point, appoint a Secretary of State in whom the people can have some confidence and of whom it cannot be said that he is "a product of the tea-cozy camarillas (composed of Washington press and politicos) with whom the Secretary's synthetic English accent and oh-so-cute ventures in humorous understatement went over great guns." Senator MCCARTHY has so completely unmasked the State Department that today he needs no FBI files or photostats to prove his case. Events have done that for him. Those attempting to make "McCarthyism" a term of opprobrium in their attacks on a man striving to defend his country against the common enemy might well ask themselves whether the international tragedy in which we are mired is not due to "Achesonism" rather than to "McCarthyism." It is now evident that the floundering around of Senator TYDINGS, the smothering of the Amerasia case, and the throwing of mud at the Wisconsin legislator have been not only lending comfort but strengthening the imperialistic designs of Communist Russia.

The warning of George Washington, "Put none but Americans on guard tonight," is, as our cartoon of last week pointed out, both applicable and vital at this hour of crisis. The day of the Marxist, his stooge, and his collaborator in Government must come to an end. The task is not easy, for the enemy has organized and placed his forces well.

St. Benedict's admonition, "Ora et labora," must be the watchword of every American. Let us pray for God's assistance in our work to save America from the curse and slavery of Godless communism.

War Measures—or Hysteria?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 27, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am including as part of my remarks an article that appeared in Newsweek on August 7 by that well-known economist and writer, Mr. Henry Hazlitt. His article on war measures or hysteria calls the turn on our responsibilities in Congress. The article is as follows:

From laxity and unconcern prior to June 25, Washington has swung over to hysteria. Technically we are still fighting only a police action in a tiny country. Yet Washington acts as if our only hope of national survival lay in immediately turning our whole economy inside out and frightening to death the very corporations responsible for our unparalleled production. The proposed measures into which Congress is being stampeded reflect not so much real war necessities as the familiar demands of a statist and controlist ideology.

Congress should, of course, appropriate without delay whatever additional amounts can be spent quickly without misdirection or gross waste. But even if all of the President's additional appropriation request of $10,500,000,000 is really necessary, is it also necessary that the Federal Government should add that net amount to the expenditures it had already planned? Most of the bureaucrats and Congressmen who are so sternly calling on the consumers and taxpayers for more sacrifices are singularly silent about any cut in their own pet programs for handing out taxpayers' money to pressure groups or diverting resources to unessential welfare or pork-barrel projects. Apparently, aside from mere token cuts, these are to go on as usual.

Yet Arthur Krock, writing in the New York Times, considers $7,000,000,000 a moderate estimate of what could be cut from the Fair Deal budget if some of its programs were suspended during the crisis.

Nor is the nonmilitary budget the only one that needs to be critically examined. The American public is entitled to a much more convincing explanation than has yet been offered of why the almost $50,000,000,000 spent on defense in the four fiscal years since July 1946 bought apparently so little of it. The sum is not negligible. We spent on defense in the last fiscal year alone as much as we spent in the whole 16 fiscal years before Pearl Harbor.

The chairman of the House Armed Services Committee now wants to know just what there is on hand to show for the military expenditures of the last 4 years. This is a laudable, if belated, curiosity. One would have supposed that a committee properly carrying out its responsibilities to the American people would have been checking on this at least every quarter. The Armed Services Committee urgently need a numerically adequate permanent full-time staff of military experts and investigators, responsible to Congress alone, to check on the requests from the services and to know at all times how much defense the people are getting for their money.

The ideological hysteria of the moment is reflected in the demands, even on the part of so-called conservatives and professed believers in a free-enterprise system, for overall Government economic controls, including a blanket freeze of prices and wages. Such demands stem from a complete misreading of the lessons of the last war. These controls and freezes would tie the economy in red tape. They would delay or prevent the very price and wage readjustments that are most necessary. It cannot be pointed out too often that the only way to control the general level of prices is through money and credit policy.

The administration has still to show real awareness of how serious, compared with present practices and proposals, money and credit control would have to be to accomplish this purpose. It must begin with restraints on the Treasury and Federal Reserve System. We must severely limit the expansion of credit by the Federal Reserve banks themselves. These banks must abandon the inflationary policy of cheap money rates and Government bond pegging. The Government must shut down on all new loans from the RFC or the Export-Import Bank. Commercial bank credit must be restricted by allowing interest rates to rise, by tightening reserve requirements, and by scrutinizing new loans. Demands for installment credit and real-estate mortgage control only divert attention from these more serious credit controls.

Address of Hon. Eugene D. Millikin, of Colorado

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM S. HILL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, on July 28, 1950, Senator EUGENE D. MILLIKIN, of Colorado, addressed our State Republican Assembly. I include his address as part of my remarks, as well as excerpts from an editorial in the Rocky Mountain News of Denver, Sunday, July 30, 1950:

REMARKS OF EUGENE D. MILLIKIN, REPUBLICAN SENATOR OF COLORADO, BEFORE THE REPUBLICAN STATE ASSEMBLY, DENVER, COLO., JULY 28, 1950

Within 5 years of the end of hostilities of World War II, the peace that was to follow and endure has been shattered and our servicemen are again fighting and dying on foreign soil.

Once more our young men are being drafted and trained for battle. Once more the pangs of leave-taking, the anxieties over the missing and wounded, the mourning for the dead. Once more all of the hateful dislocations of peacetime life, sparing nothing and no one.

Whenever and wherever our servicemen confront the enemy, the Republican Party, its members and public officials, along with all other patriotic citizens, will do whatever is required to support their effort and to assure their victory.

We shall insist that our fighting men shall be promptly armored and supplied, not with blueprints or fancy plans, but with the best munitions that American ingenuity, resources, and industry can produce.

Every needful measure to guard their health, to sustain their morale, to shelter them from needless peril, to care for the wounded, the widows, orphans and dependents and to give practical expression to the Nation's gratitude when they return, shall have our devoted backing.

Their sacrifices shall spur our unending efforts to find a durable peace with honor.

We shall continue our vigorous and relentless efforts to cleanse from our Government all disloyalty, all divided allegiance, all security risks by whatever name they may be known, and under every mask with which they disguise themselves.

Our fighting men abroad will know that by our election they will not be stabbed with treachery at home. They will know that when they have finished their tasks abroad they will return to a purified land of freedom at home.

These Republican efforts will be continued despite all attempts of the opposition to vilify, divert, discourage, obscure or thwart them.

We pledge that we shall spare no efforts to take this Government out of the control of those who have lost the promised peace earned by the costly victory of World War II and who have gravely imperiled our present and future security.

We pledge that we shall spare no effort to retire from public life the bunglers and wastrels who, since the end of World War II, equipped with unstinted billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money to keep our country safe and enable us to defeat aggression wherever it might appear, have shamed us at home and throughout the world with such nightmarish lack of preparedness that a twentieth-rate country can enjoy even a temporary victory over American forces on the field of battle.

No wonder that nations which have been subsidized with our bounty and which have promised to join their military strength to our own are thinking strongly of neutrality.

Let us bring back the objectives of World War II so that we can measure their betrayal and better understand why we have been in a cold war and are now fighting in Korea and why we are threatened with World War III.

It is especially important that the veterans of World War II know clearly why the promised peace to follow the complete military victory which they won for us has never materialized. They were fighting during a good part of the time while the peace was being betrayed in secret and after they came back home the propaganda machines of the guilty did their best to keep us thinking of other things.

In August of 1941, President Roosevelt and Winston Churchill met on the Atlantic. We were being readied for war and an inspiring standard of justification had to be raised. And so at that meeting it was declared among other things, that—

"Their countries (the United Kingdom and the United States) seek no aggrandizement, territorial or other;

"Second, they desire to see no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the people concerned;

"Third, they respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcefully deprived of them; * * *"

Russia specifically approved and charged herself with the obligations of the Atlantic Charter by signing what is known as the "Declaration by United Nations" of January 1, 1942.

By that time we were in World War II and that declaration gave long-term meaning and encouragement for the sacrifices of our fighting men. It should be added that this declaration designed to motivate a war was so lightly and cynically regarded after it had been widely publicized that for a long time not even a copy of it could be found.

The promise that you were fighting a war to be followed by a just peace, not merely to provide an exchange of oppressors or to create a new and even more dangerous enemy, was reiterated in numerous and various ways.

It was included in the resolution of November 5, 1943, of the United States Senate. The Charter of the United Nations ratified by the United States Senate on July 28, 1945, proclaimed among other things:

"We, the peoples of the United Nations, determined to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind; and,

"To reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small; * * * have resolved to combine our efforts to accomplish these aims."

Now let us see what those in control of the executive department of this government were actually doing in secret behind closed doors at the Big Three conferences of the United States, the United Kingdom, and Russia. Let us see how they related their actions to the peace-making pledges which I have described.

The Big Three meeting at Tehran ended on September 1, 1943; that at Yalta, on February 11, 1945, and that at Potsdam on August 2, 1945.

At Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam, the partition of our ally Poland which Russia had accomplished while she was an ally of our enemy, Germany, was confirmed.

Wholesale evacuations and resettlements of several millions of persons in many parts of Europe and without their consent, were decreed.

It was agreed—

That Europe was to be carved up into spheres of influence

That Communist Russia was to have predominance over what we now know as the satellite countries;

That Communist Russia was to occupy eastern Germany;

That she was to have the Kuriles and Sakhalin;

That she was to be in Northern Korea;

That she was to have dominating special privileges in Manchuria and other parts of China;

That we were to have a place in Berlin without a road to get in or out of it, subject to blockage at any moment by Communist Russia which surrounded that city. You will remember the airlift operation which was necessitated by that fantastic piece of stupidity.

It was agreed that the Chinese Government, our friend and ally, grievously weakened after years of resistance to the invading Japanese, a resistance which commenced long before and continued throughout World War II was to be persuaded—which meant that she was to have her arm twisted—into accepting these degrading and destructive arrangements made in secret and without her knowledge or participation.

Please know, veterans of World War II, that, as has been said, most of you were fighting while these things were being done, that you were not permitted to know, and the American people were not permitted to know what was going on, and you were not consulted and the American people were not consulted whether they favored this switcheroo which gutted the moral basis of that war and which laid the foundations for others to come.

Those disastrous appeasements of Communist Russia at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam not only stultified the moral incentives for our participation in World War II, they fueled Communist aggression all over the world. They led to Korea. And is that the end?

That which our Government collaborated in doing at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam put communism in East Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Manchuria, and Northern Korea.

Turkey, Italy, Greece and Iran are never free from the menace of the giant predatory bear who was unleashed by those deals to prowl all over the face of the earth.

When those deals were made it was well known that murder, terror, slavery, concentration camps, banishment, lying and aggression are considered as legitimate means and are advocated and practiced for the desired ends of communism.

When those hundreds of millions of people were handed over to communism with the aid and connivance of those in charge of our foreign affairs, it was well known that the free exercise of religion is not safe under communism because religion deals with the spiritual lights and duties of the individual, and exalts his individual, spiritual personality. And thus it competes with the totalitarian ideologies of communism which exalts the state even above God.

It was well known that the totalitarianism of Communist Russia cannot exist anywhere where human dignity shall prevail, cannot exist in the presence of freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of religion, the right of people to assemble and petition the government for the redress of grievances.

How could anyone believe that what was done at those meeting places for treachery would conform to the promises to stop aggression, to promote peace, to assure the sovereign rights of independent peoples? Nothing was learned from the broken pledges which induced this nation's naive recognition of Russia back in 1933.

Did these things satisfy the pledge that territorial changes should accord with the freely-expressed wishes of the peoples concerned; with the pledge that sovereign rights and self-government shall be restored to those who had been forcefully deprived of them as a result of World War II?

Did those perfidious deals provide the promised reaffirmation of faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small?

It was obvious that the constant appeasements, the groveling "Yes, yes" to every request of Communist Russia would generate the appetite for more and ever more conquest by demands, threats, intrigue and these failing, by armed aggression under the theory that there was little too fear from peoples with gutless and faithless leaders who were determined to play Trilby to Stalin's Svengali.

The results of these treacheries were quickly apparent. The nations which were the victims of these deals became through murder, terror, and conspiracy, the obedient vassals of Communist Russia and they passed from the world of freedom into the blackness and terror of communism.

The Russian bear saw tempting honey pots extending to the channel and the shores of the Atlantic, yes, even in the Mediterranean areas, and he coveted them.

The intervening nations looked like easy prey, especially if they could be taken piecemeal.

And so we were compelled to draw a line beyond which aggression would not be tolerated.

The leading figure in this attempt to salvage something from the previous mistakes of the opposition was Republican Senator ARTHUR VANDENBERG.

And thus we promoted the North Atlantic Alliance and then the arms implementations program and the ECA program, all intended to build an economic and military base for resistance to further aggression.

These measures may work; they may not work. It seemed to me to be worth a try even with the expense and risks if we were to keep Communist Russia from our eastern shores.

The scene changes to China. Despite our observation of what had happened to the satellite nations of Europe, our President and our State Department actually tried to pressure Chiang Kai-shek to take communism into China which had already been dismembered with our assistance.

Chiang Kai-shek refused. He was then deprived of help which had been authorized by Congress. This below-the-belt blow to our friend and ally carried with it the loss to the Nationalist Government of that indispensable element of strength in the Orient, called face.

Chiang Kai-shek chose to fight to hold his country against communism. Our leaders wanted to give China to communism for free.

What were some of the reasons for these appeasements, these aids of incalculable benefit to communism in the Orient?

It was said that the Communist movement in those areas was disassociated from Russian communism and from Russian plans of aggression. It is said that the native Communists were misnamed—that they really believed in democracy. It was said that they were simply trying to better their ways of life; that they were gentle agrarians who meant no harm to anyone except those at home who had oppressed them.

Today those dear hearts and gentle agrarians in North Korea, of a piece with those in China and Manchuria, are breaking the backs and shooting off the faces of our sons taken in battle.

Lincoln liberated 3,000,000 slaves and won humanity's deathless gratitude. He gave the Republican Party the inspiration for its being.

At Yalta, Tehran, Potsdam, Cairo, and other meeting places for the hatching of treachery, the befouled gang in power collaborated in putting chains on 600,000,000 children of God, and put a lighted torch in the hands of a known arsonist for burning the dwelling places of freedom.

They now ask that we bestow our approval and confidence.

We commend the awakening after the burning embers had blown into the firehouse and singed the fire chief and his dozing crew.

We will help find the water and man the pumps and carry hose to extinguish the conflagration, but we will not join any chorus of "Hail to the Great Fire Chief."

If that outfit must have praise and confidence to bolster its nerve as it stands in the rubble of its self-created wreckage, let it take back some of that which it gave to Alger Hiss.

No; we are going to get rid of them, lock, stock and barrel. Half of the job will be done next November and the other half in November of 1952.

The highest skills of the tens of thousands of public-relations men and thought-controllers on the public payroll put there to make sour notes sound sweet, will not be able to begin, to commence, to start, to hoax the people into the notion that the gang in power is indispensable for running this Government, either in war or in peace.

Now let us establish the Republican position in these matters. Please let it never be forgotten that what was done at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam was done in secret without the knowledge of the Republican Party or any of its leaders. We were not invited to attend.

From the first time that we learned what had gone on there, we denounced it and we actively supported the policy finally established of no further appeasement; of resistance by all Atlantic Union nations to aggression against any one of them.

From the moment we learned of the appeasements intended to bring communism into the Government of Nationalist China we voiced our opposition. We knew that there was corruption among Chinese officials; we knew that there was inefficiency, but we preferred to have our Pacific flank guarded by a friendly nation rather than a murderous enemy.

But nevertheless, the appeasement process continued and China was taken by communism.

The Republicans opposed the policy of excluding Korea and Formosa from our defense area in the Pacific—which policy made those countries ripe plums for Communist picking. We demanded the reversal of those policies. But nothing happened until those harmless agrarians of North Korea put into motion their ferocious aggression against South Korea.

Then the administration in power did a complete flip-flop, thus admitting that we were right from the beginning. For that we may be grateful.

One of the great issues of this campaign can be put this way: Will the people give their confidence to those who have been right from the beginning, the Republicans of Congress, or to those who have been wrong from the beginning and whose blunders are spelled out for all to see in South Korea?

I have no doubt of the outcome of this issue. The angry voice of a disillusioned and outraged people is swelling all over the land, is swelling all over the State of Colorado.

The peope now know that members of the Republican Party have stood alone in their battle to drive Communists and lovers of communism out of our Government. They know that the gang in power has obstructed our efforts, has praised the guilty and has attempted to divert their pursuit.

The Republican campaign will not be embarrassed by communism. Unlike our opponents, we are not divided on that subject. We do not depend upon Communist support to win. We are not plagued with the problem of getting Communists out of our party, of hiding their presence within it, or of defending them. They never have been, and they never will be, in the Republican Party.

This is a campaign of redemption. There will never be a more inspiring campaign.

We are fighting against those who are pilfering your earnings to feed their hoggish appetite for more and more squandering and more and more usurpation of what remains of your freedom to make your own pocketbook decisions.

We are fighting to save the Nation from the destruction of class warfare with its corrosive hatreds which are burning away good will among men and the vital unity of our people.

We are fighting to save for the people, their wages, savings, interest, rentals, dividends, pensions, annuities, everything of material value from debasement by a government which smiles on debts and deficits and which abhors solvency.

We are fighting to save our young people from an administration which measures prosperity by the size of the debt which it can load on them.

We are fighting the tariff policies of the administration in power.

Already these policies have killed off our Colorado fur industry and most of our Colorado mines.

How long will it take us to learn that we must never cease trying to be self-sufficient in the production of strategic minerals?

We did not learn that in World War I. We did not learn that in World War II. And here we are once more in deep trouble and again find ourselves dependent on foreign-produced minerals, the supply of which is always at the mercy of the enemy, to get our planes off of the ground, to munition all arms of the services, to produce atomic weapons, and to run a high-speed wartime economy.

The administration now in power believes in keeping in operation only the richest and most profitable of our mines. It thinks that the others, those now shut down, can be put into or out of production with the ease of turning on or off an electric light switch whenever there is need for their production.

Those interested in our Colorado mines, including our idle metal miners, will give the administration some much-needed instruction next November.

Our fur farmers, agricultural, and livestock interests, threatened by these tariff policies, will also have something to say on the subject at the same time.

We are fighting to banish Pendergastism from our Government, to restore a moral basis for Government policy.

In a word, we are fighting to save the United States of America.

The Korean situation has deferred some of our Republican programs but it is even more necessary than before to have our party in control of the Congress and later to have a Republican in the White House so that we may return to these programs and complete them at the earliest possible moment.

Taxes will be increased, but the point is, the opposition wants to keep them increased for war and then for peacetime. The Republicans, on the other hand, will decrease taxes as soon as consistent with the maintenance of our security.

This assurance may be accepted with complete confidence on the basis of our past performance. We promised to decrease taxes and we did decrease them over President Truman's veto when we controlled the Eightieth Congress.

Perhaps the budget will be unbalanced until we can end hostilities and have better assurance of peace. But the opposition believes in unbalanced budgets; believes in unbalanced budgets in peacetime and in wartime. They cannot carry out their wasteful spending policies except with unbalanced budgets.

We will balance the budget at the earliest possible moment after we get out of this terrible mess into which we have been plunged by the opposition's stupidity and immoral policies.

Again the people may accept this assurance with complete confidence on the basis of past performance. We promised to balance the budget and during the Eightieth Congress we did balance the budget for the first time since the coming into office of the New Deal in 1933.

The Korean situation and its possible enlargements may require controls and allocations. The Republicans will fully support our military efforts. But we promise you we will get rid of wartime controls and allocations when the necessity for them has ceased to exist.

Again the people may accept this pledge with full confidence that it will be made good. And again on the basis of past performance. We said that we would remove the controls and allocations of World War II and we got rid of most of them during the Eightieth Congress.

But the administration in power to get ahead with its socialistic designs wants and must have these controls and allocations all the time—in peace and in war. In fact, they had their control and allocation bills ready. They had them introduced and they were pending in committees for processing and for use long prior to the developments in Korea.

A part of their program is socialized medicine; another part the Brannan plan. But I can assure you that these smelly vagrants from British socialism will never become law under a Republican-controlled Congress.

There are many other issues of great importance.

They will be fully developed during the campaign. And this will be a campaign.

Our message will be carried by dedicated workers to every citizen of the State and will carry winning conviction.

Reports which have come to me from all sections of Colorado, and this assembly attests their truth, show that there is more enthusiastic and energetic interest and determination to win among Republicans than during any election year for a long time back.

The men and women offering their candidacies for places on the State and local tickets have never been surpassed in character, ability, and in the qualities which persuade the confidence of the voters.

This is regarded all over the country as a crucial State in the battle which is coming to a rapid climax to determine this Nation's direction—whether toward the promotion of the welfare of all of the people with freedom, or whether welfare with freedom shall be destroyed by surrendering the direction of our affairs and by delegating the decisions of free men and women to a super, central socialistic authority at Washington.

The latter has been rapidly jelling into accomplished fact.

Just a little more expansion of the type of things already done.

Just a little more time in office by those who have done them, and there will be no turning back.

Here in Colorado, under the watchful eye of a disturbed Nation, the Republicans will have the honor of spearheading the reversal of the trend.

We ask you, and I am sure we will receive, the support of the independents for we are fighting for their independence.

We ask for, and I am sure that we will receive, the support of Democrats who can no longer support the gang in power which rides under the name of their party while debauching its cherished political principles.

We ask especially for the support of our young men and women, for they are inheriting this country—and the shape of what they will get and its influence on their ways of life, and the ways of life of their children, will be largely determined in this coming election.

I am sure we will receive their support, for they know that a useful and happy life cannot be built out of one war after another and a constant state of interim crisis.

They know that a happy and useful life cannot be built in a political environment established by the oppression of freedom and decent principles in the conduct of government.

This is it. Let us give this battle to save our country the best that is in us. Doing that, and I know that we will do it, victory will be ours.

[From the Rocky Mountain News of July 30, 1950]

A FIGHTING SPEECH

Senator MILLIKIN stepped in swinging when he led off his party's campaign at the Republican designating assembly.

He was eloquent, forceful, and above all, specific. He finally took command of Colorado Republicans who have long needed direct, active leadership.

His attack on the Truman policies was, of course, expected. Administration policies are always and properly the main issue in an off-year election, especially in a gravely critical period. Senator MILLIKIN specifically charged the administration with bringing about the present crisis by diplomatic blunders and inepitude and by failing to prepare against danger. Like the able lawyer he is, he carefully documented his case.

He did more. He pledged full Republican support of the war effort, including price-wage controls if the President asks for them. He called for a balanced budget as soon as the emergency is over.

His speech should help give new spirit to the Republican Party in Colorado, which badly needs new spirit after its defeat of 2 years ago.

For Senator MILLIKIN actually gave the Republican State platform.

Senator MILLIKIN really rose to the occasion.

He spoke not merely as a senatorial candidate but as a former chairman of the powerful Senate Finance Committee, as the ranking minority of that committee today, as the head of the Republican Policy Committee of the Senate, and as Colorado's top Republican.

Because of our strong belief in the two-party system, in which a vigorous opposition is essential, we are glad that Senator MILLIKIN has started to breathe new life into the Colorado GOP.

Public Employment Offices in Puerto Rico

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. FERNÓS-ISERN
RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM PUERTO RICO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. FERNÓS-ISERN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks and include extraneous materials in the Appendix of the RECORD, I submit a statement which I made Thursday, August 3, before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare in connection with S. 3546 which would have the effect of extending United States Employment Service to Puerto Rico:

TESTIMONY OF DR. FERNÓS-ISERN, RESIDENT COMMISSIONER OF PUERTO RICO, BEFORE A SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE (S. 3546)

The Wagner-Peyser Act (act of June 6, 1933) as amended, created a national system of public employment offices on a Federal-State cooperative basis. The act provided for grants-in-aid on a matching basis to States (defined as including Hawaii and Alaska) cooperating with the United States Employment Service in carrying out the purposes of the act.

S. 3546 would also extend the operation of the Wagner-Peyser Act to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. At present, by virtue of the provisions of title IV of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended, the United States Employment Service is authorized to maintain a public employment service in Puerto Rico for veterans only.

Since 1938 when the States commenced paying benefits under their unemployment insurance laws, the administration of the public employment offices has been closely associated with the administration of unemployment insurance. Claims for unemployment insurance benefits are filed in local employment offices where the claimants are also required to register for work.

The conferees of the Senate and House on the amendments to the Social Security Act, H. R. 6000, have agreed to provisions extending public assistance to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands under a matching formula. This includes old-age assistance, aid to the blind, and aid to dependent children. If the Congress adopts the recommendations made by the conference committee, this program will be instituted in Puerto Rico on October 1 of this year. Thus, under the present plan, Puerto Rico will participate in every provision of the Social Security Act with the exception of unemployment insurance. We hope, ultimately, to have the security of unemployment insurance in Puerto Rico, for the need is present and urgent. Bills to that effect are pending consideration in both Houses of Congress.

We realize that Rome was not built in a day and we are anxious to make a beginning in having in Puerto Rico the benefits of the Wagner-Peyser Act which created the national system of public employment offices. We are anxious for this program to get started as soon as possible, both as a preparatory step toward laying the ground work for the ultimate extension of unemployment insurance and because of the special need in Puerto Rico for employment services growing out of the large number of unemployed in the island. I regret to report that we have in Puerto Rico an average of 80,000 persons who are chronically unemployed. This ratio in our island's population makes the situation grimmer than was unemployment on the continent during the darkest days of the depression of the thirties. In addition to the unemployed, we have a similar situation existing as to those who are underemployed.

Let us be entirely realistic about these circumstances in Puerto Rico as they relate to the current national picture. Employment on the mainland is higher than at any time in this country's long history. The ratio of employed to the total number of employables is higher than ever before. This is how we find ourselves on the mainland on the eve of rearmament and all of the implications of rearmament. We are being called upon to expand industry, to provide defensive weapons for ourselves and the democratic world, to meet the threat of an aggressor. We must not only maintain pace with him, we must overtake him. At the same time, we are going to have to maintain enough industrial outflow to meet civilian needs both at home and abroad. This means, without a shadow of doubt, that we are going to be faced with a serious manpower shortage which will grow more and more acute as the months pass and we get into full-scale production.

During the last war, it was necessary to import a great deal of labor from foreign countries. This time, I hope and urge that any such importation of labor comes first from United States areas afflicted with unemployment. Puerto Rico for 50 years under the sovereignty of the United States, is chronically afflicted with unemployment. Puerto Ricans are American citizens and they are patriotic. They have a stake in the future of this country and they know it. They are wiry and they are used to hard work. Perhaps some of you have visited Puerto Rico and have watched the workers in the cane fields labor throughout the long day in the hot sun and wondered how they could do it on a mouthful of rice and beans. Not all Puerto Ricans are accustomed to working under factory conditions, but they can do that, too. The industrial development program in Puerto Rico has proved that Puerto Ricans are quick to learn and are particularly skillful in any occupation which requires manual dexterity.

If the United States Employment Service were to set up employment offices in Puerto Rico through which were channeled mainland requests for labor and labor skills, Puerto Rico could promptly furnish to the mainland a labor force of 80,000 persons. This would be no insignificant figure, and its effect would surely be noticed in the national production indexes. We all know that during wartime or during threat of war, the civilian production army is every bit as necessary as the armies at the front.

Parenthetically, here, I should like to say that in addition to the labor force of 80,000 persons which could be brought to the mainland from Puerto Rico, the island could provide a military force of at least 75,000 as it did during World War II. From my own observation when I was in Puerto Rico recently, I say that these 75,000 youths could be recruited without resort to the draft. They would volunteer.

Sometimes, our actions have chain results which ordinarily would be difficult to anticipate. I should like to point out that recruiting 80,000 persons in Puerto Rico through the establishment of United States Employment Service offices there, would leave just that many less in the island—that many less that might have to be taken care of in Puerto Rico in case of submarine warfare in the Caribbean. The type of situation to which I refer is the situation which developed during the months following the attack on Pearl Harbor. German submarines were numerous and active in the Caribbean and threatened cutting off shipments of food to Puerto Rico. Puerto Rico imports from the mainland more than 50 percent of the food it consumes. In case of another full-scale conflict, we might be faced with a similar emergency. Obviously, the fewer people who remained in Puerto Rico in such an event, the fewer would have to be attended to.

In my opinion, we should not wait any longer to embark on this program of recruiting labor among my people. We should start right now—immediately—as a national policy. It is just such a program as could be initiated by the extension of the United States Employment Service to Puerto Rico which could go far toward preventing a future emergency. Instead of being a liability to both the Government of the United States and the insular government of Puerto Rico, this army of unemployed manpower could become a real asset whose efforts could be felt all along the line from the housewife in the kitchen to the soldier at the front. Unfortunately, Puerto Rico has little money, but, fortunately, it has a wealth of manpower. Extension of the United States Employment Service would be the beginning of a place to put that wealth wisely to work.

Friendship With Spain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include the following editorial from the Washington Star. This article coincides with the judgment of my friend, Dr. (Father) Joseph F. Thorning, associate editor of World Affairs:

ONE HUNDRED MILLION DOLLAR LOAN FOR SPAIN

It looks as though the ugly but inescapable facts of life are about to force a revision of the policy—if it can be called a policy—which we have been following with respect to Spain.

The drive against Spain began with an attempt by some of the Communist stooges in the United Nations to indict Franco as a threat to peace. An investigation revealed the absurdity of that complaint, and it was abandoned. Nevertheless, the UN undertook to administer a diplomatic spanking to Spain by calling on its member states to withdraw their ambassadors from Madrid, and we went along with that ill-advised project. Since then we have been spending billions of dollars to check the spread of communism in Europe, while shunning what is probably the most anti-Communist country on the Continent.

When the Senate votes, 65 to 15, for a $100,000,000 loan to Spain, however, it looks as though a real change of attitude is in the making. This loan would link Spain to the Marshall-plan project, but the funds for it would not come from the ECA allotment. Secretary of State Acheson says he is still opposed to such a loan. But the reasons which he offers in support of that position are no more convincing now than they have ever been.

Senator TYDINGS, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, put his finger on the real heart of this issue when he said that Spain "is necessary to the defense of the United States." If that is true, the dictatorial character of Franco's government becomes of secondary importance. After all, in the name of security, we have done business with a variety of little dictators, and for 5 years after the war we did everything but give away the shirt on our back trying to appease the greatest dictator of them all. It is even sillier to argue, as some have done, that bringing Spain into the Marshall program might offend some other countries which have been getting millions of American dollars and cause them to be less than wholehearted in their cooperation.

It is high time for us to put first things first. If Spain is essential to the defense of the United States, then we should try to work out a mutually satisfactory arrangement with Spain. The fear that this might offend somebody may be real or it may be imaginary. But in either event it is a secondary consideration. The one clear fact is that if there is to be a war with Russia the burden of that war is going to fall on the United States, and we should be making preparations accordingly.

Chromite

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WESLEY A. D'EWART

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, I note with a great deal of satisfaction that the Senate on Friday adopted an amendment by Senator ECTON to the general appropriations bill to provide for the reacquisition of certain property and facilities at the chromite mines near Nye, Mont.

Members of the House will recall that these mines were opened for production during the last war, when our foreign sources of chromite had been cut off, at a cost to the Federal Government of approximately $25,000,000. After the war the buildings and facilities were dispersed through surplus sales.

Some of the property is still on the site, and the purchaser of this property has held it intact with the view that it would be needed by the Government in case of emergency. He is willing to deliver it back to the Government for the same amount he paid for it plus some charges, amounting to approximately $55,000, for property which cost us originally $1,500,000 to build and would cost far more than that to replace.

The Bureau of Mines has been interested in this reacquisition for some time not only because we would need the property in the event our foreign sources of chromite ore are cut off but also to aid in the current 3-year program the Bureau is conducting at the mines. The present program is an investigation of methods of extracting and processing the ore.

We are dependent now upon Russia and other foreign sources for this vital, strategic material. We cannot afford to continue this dependence. We should have started long ago to develop our domestic chromite resources. This acquisition is a necessary first step, and I sincerely hope that the conferees on the appropriation measure will accept this Senate amendment.

Nothing but Headaches

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFF CLEVENGER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials from the Chicago Sunday Tribune of August 6, 1950:

NOTHING BUT HEADACHES

The State Department is trying to unload a few of its dilemmas on the United Nations by proposing that UN create a permanent watchdog committee. One of the tasks of this group would be to decide what is to be done after the North Korean Reds are driven back over the thirty-eighth parallel, provided they are. Mr. Truman and Secretary of State Acheson hustled the United States into the war without thinking of the answer to that one. Now they want UN to read a few tea leaves and tell them what comes next.

This is a nice example of the New Deal habit of getting embroiled in a war without knowing what is to be accomplished or how to go about it. The Buffalo Evening News, in a long article by Victor Knox, a correspondent formerly with the American occupation in Korea, has just reviewed the blunders of the occupation. The article shows that the administration's trait of blundering into a job without clearly perceiving why it is taking the job on or what is to come of it is no new departure.

Mr. Knox recounts in depressing detail how we went into Korea after the defeat of Japan with no understanding of the country or the people, no knowledge of their capacity politically or economically, with no perception of the inevitable outcome of artificially splitting the country and installing Russia in control of half of it, and no idea of what we intended to accomplish. The Army did not prove either tactful or efficient in administration. Our civilian administrators, with some exceptions, were not much better.

Then, having denied to the army of South Korea the heavy weapons to withstand a Communist assault, we pulled out all of our soldiers. We professed to be shocked and surprised when the inevitable happened. Mr. Truman hastily improvised a war, in which we started with two strikes on us. What a mess.

Mr. Knox is indignant at the record, as well he may be. But there is no mystery about the business. Korea merely duplicates results that have attended our intervention in World War II everywhere. The whole world is a mess, and the United States, in security, in the regard of other peoples, and in internal strength, is far worse off than if it had never fought World War II.

The reason is that a war is sensible only if fought for sane political ends. Military triumph is meaningless unless the victor employs his military advantage to reach his political objective. Mr. Roosevelt neither knew nor cared what he intended to accomplish in World War II. Even as devoted an apologist as Prof. Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., of Harvard is constrained to admit that he "proceeded [with a] lack of specific content in his political objectives." In other words, he didn't know why he had committed the country to the war or what he expected to accomplish by it.

Korea is merely one of the proofs of this basic fact We were going to get Japan out. When we did, it seemed to trouble nobody in authority that we let Russia in. Starting out with no rational objective, how could it be expected that we could improvise one later after we had destroyed the basis of a rational settlement? After Japan was defeated—and, indeed, long before we got into Korea—the chances were 100 to 1 that we would make just the kind of mess we did.

Our Government has little experience in colonial administration and our people have known, since the Declaration of Independence, that only self-government is good government. Accordingly, only our hacks can be interested in playing proconsul—a fact that was particularly true after the military phases of the war ended and everybody was crazy to get home. If we wanted to run Korea right, we would have had to be imperialists, like the Russians.

Korea is another illustration of the essential phoniness of all of the tall talk that is used to get Americans into wars and make the wars seem noble. The tall talk in question included the Atlantic Charter, the "four freedoms," and the Cairo declaration that "in due course Korea shall become free and independent." Was it visualized when Mr. Roosevelt tossed off that pledge that American youth would have to die in a new war to redeem it only half-way, and that, after their slaughter on the new battlefields, Korea would still be only a house divided against itself?

No wonder the Truman administration now asks: Where do we go from here? It never knew, any more than the Roosevelt administration, where it proposed to go, and it has scarcely the intelligence even to know where it has been, or why.

CONTROL CRAZY

We constantly have it from the pro-New Deal columnists and commentators that the people are 'way ahead of Congress and the administration on what has to be done to win the Korean war. This statement is usually employed to suggest that the public is crying for rationing and price controls. Some Members of Congress, among them some deluded Republicans, have fallen for this guff, and to show that they are 'way ahead of Mr. Truman, are breaking their necks to bring back OPA.

Memories are short, indeed. It is only 4 years since we got rid of meat rationing, after beef had been reduced to a memory. The Congressmen seem to have some dim recollection of these events, for one of their first tax proposals is to slap a 10-percent tax on home freezers, which the foresighted, knowing what is coming if OPA returns, will use to stock up against the shortages which will be sure to develop under the system.

But if the Congressmen think that OPA solves anything, they have surely lost their senses. The central item of faith in the OPA creed was that if something was said on paper it was done. In fact, the commission of the regulation to paper was only the beginning of the process of multiplying perplexity, trouble, and, finally, inertia and shortage.

Have Congressmen forgotten how these regulations read? We will refresh their memories by citing a few examples:

"Unless the Office of Price Administration or an authorized representative thereof shall, by letter mailed to the applicant within 21 days from the date of filing the application, disapprove the maximum price as reported, such price shall be deemed to have been approved, subject to nonretroactive written disapproval or adjustment at any later time by the Office of Price Administration."

Or again:

"Ultimate consumer means a person or group of persons, generally constituting a domestic household, who purchase eggs generally at the individual stores of retailers or purchase and receive deliveries of eggs at the place of abode of the individual or domestic household from producers or retail route sellers who use such eggs for their consumption as food."

Another example:

"For any car sold after the 6 months period described in paragraph (a) (beginning on July 10, 1944, and ending on January 9, 1945) has expired, the seller must figure the maximum price as in paragraph (a), except that he must subtract from it 4 percent of the total of the base price and the equipment allowance, if any, for each half year after such 6 months period up to and including the half year containing the day of sale."

Give up? The bureaucrats hadn't:

"The maximum price for any second hand machine * * * shall be the higher of the following, but shall not exceed 80 percent of the new base price for such machine:

"(1) 55 percent of the new base price for such machine * * * or

"(2) the price determined in accordance with the depreciation method * * *."

Which, if it means anything, means that 55 percent shall never exceed 80 percent.

The planners had tens of thousands of these baffling examples of jargon to befuddle the manufacturer, the wholesaler, the retailer, the purchaser, and everybody else. The regulations are all ready to be plucked out of their resting place in the Federal Register and sicked onto the people again. Gov. Chester Bowles, the former OPA Administrator, has already called upon Mr. Truman to advise him on how to resurrect the whole smothering system.

And yet some Congressmen think the people are crying out for the return of all this, so that they may be badgered, harassed, threatened, and made to do without by the New Dealers.

Who's crazy now?

How To Make a Liberal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT RAINS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. RAINS. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Ed E. Reid, of Montgomery, Ala., the executive secretary of the Alabama League of Municipalities, has, perhaps, done more for municipal government in the State of Alabama than any other individual.

Recently, Grover C. Hall, Jr., editor of the Montgomery Advertiser, requested Mr. Reid to write a guest editorial, under the heading "The making of a down-to-earth liberal." Ed Reid has set out a most interesting description of an Alabama liberal. I commend it to your attention:

THE MAKING OF A DOWN-TO-EARTH LIBERAL

(By Ed E. Reid)

This effort does not stem from choice but from the following command of the editor of the Advertiser:

"I think you would write something of enduring interest if you would describe what political and economic viewpoints you started out with at the beginning of your career and which ones you have discarded or altered."

I would prefer to write something about the growth and improvement of municipal government in Alabama during the past quarter of a century but that subject has been reserved for another, so I am left to discuss a relatively dull subject—a young man's philosophy as his career opens.

Often we hear it said that environment and the times play a greater part in the shaping of man's point of view—his philosophy—than any and all other factors. This undoubtedly is true but events and circumstances also play an important role in the development of a lifetime point of view. My own case is but an average example.

I started out as a liberal—or what I considered to be a liberal. I still classify myself as such. Much of the reason for the development of a liberal point of view for myself was inevitable. I came up in a small town where everyone, even the financially well-to-do, were progressive thinkers. As a boy I heard the old-timers talk about their active support of B. B. Comer in his fight against railroads, and there were more copies of Tom Watson's "Watsonian" coming to rural box-holders in the vicinity of my hometown than there were copies of the county seat newspaper. The town had voted overwhelmingly in support of Richmond Pearson Hobson against Oscar W. Underwood for the Senate. Even earlier—during the days of Populism—the community had been strongly in favor of Reuben F. Kolb for governor. When William Jennings Bryan would come to Alabama to speak a good-sized delegation would board the train and travel to the scene of his oratorical demonstrations. I mention these facts to indicate that so far as environment was concerned it was almost impossible for a young man in my home town to grow up as anything but a liberal.

The times played a significant part, too, in the trend of thinking as far as my home town was concerned—especially during the days of my high school and college age. The farmers were talking about Federal aid under the terms of the then pending McNary-Haugen bill—aid that did not come until the Roosevelt administration. The folks in my town became enthusiastically interested in the development of public power—the development of Muscle Shoals and the great Tennessee River region—because their young Congressman, LISTER HILL, had taken up the cudgels in support of the idea. The Advertiser's good roads campaign had stirred the people to talking about replacing muddy, impassable roads with hard-surface thoroughfares. My town was interested in this movement but it did not favor the election of the Advertiser's candidate for governor—Charles S. McDowell, of Eufaula.

The great majority of people in my town were actively campaigning for Col. Bibb Graves. Colonel Graves came to my town and it was my first opportunity to see and meet a candidate for statewide political office. Quite naturally, I was manifestly impressed. My father let me go with him to a barbecue sponsored by local friends in honor of Colonel Graves. There the "Little Colonel" spoke in support of his campaign for governor. The political evangelism he spread and the sermon he preached stuck with me for years afterward.

He was the first great man I had had the pleasure of shaking hands with. I would doubtless have been just as awe-stricken and just as thrilled had the candidate been B. M. Miller or Frank M. Dixon, but I was at the age when the meeting of an important political figure by a young man interested in politics was more than a mere experience. I was inspired to follow the campaign of Colonel Graves and his progress down through the years. Needless to say, I became a Bibb Graves advocate—one of his strongest local "plumpers." Several times during the course of that campaign Colonel Graves came to my father's barbershop and there I heard him repeat to hometown leaders what he proposed to do for Alabama—for schools, roads, improvement of prison conditions and the development of a statewide public health service on a county unit basis. There was no doubt about it—I had seen and met the man who was to have the greatest political influence over my life.

Colonel Graves became governor. I graduated from high school the same year. Interestingly enough, my commencement speaker was another man who that year had just been elected for the first time to high political office—Senator Hugo L. Black. What could have provided a greater thrill for a liberal in the making than to have witnessed the election in the same year of Col. Bibb Graves as Governor and Hugo L. Black as United States Senator, and then in the same year to have the opportunity to sit at the feet of the illustrous Senator Black on commencement night?

Back in my home town there was a man interested in the welfare of all youngsters. He spent a lot of time interesting high-school boys in reading about current events and national and State political matters. That man was Herman Pride, editor of the Butler County News. Besides my parents, he was more interested than anyone else in helping me to launch upon a political career. All through my high-school days he insisted on my reading the daily issues of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. He would point out the pages embracing the debates of Senators George W. Norris and Robert M. La Follette on public power and Senator William E. Borah on the World Court plan. In other words, he was helping to develop my interest in national affairs. He knew that an abiding interest in State and local affairs was bound to follow. Editor Pride would drop by my father's place of business almost daily and argue with me about some of the things that he had suggested I read—anything to get my argumentative powers to functioning. He was a great teacher and was himself a solid liberal. Today he is the postmaster of my home town and still does much to stimulate ambition and study on the part of Georgiana's high-school boys and young men.

While Governor Graves was starting his humanitarian program for and on behalf of the people of Alabama, I went on to the university where I was privileged to affiliate with some of the State's future leaders—Congressman George Andrews, of the Third District; State Senator Albert Boutwell, of Jefferson; and Hugh Cardon, now deputy commissioner of internal revenue of Alabama. Hugh Cardon had more to do with developing young liberals on the university campus than any other man I have known. Under his direction many a youngster who attended the university became a useful and down-to-earth liberal.

By the time I had left college, and had spent a few years in the country newspaper field, Governor Graves was preparing to run for a second term as Alabama's Governor and Franklin Roosevelt was being boomed by Jim Farley and a well-organized group of New Yorkers as the 1932 nominee of the Democratic Party for President. Where could a young liberal have found more to appeal to his fancy than in these two campaigns? As the editor of a struggling weekly newspaper in Flomaton, I came out early in support of the pro-Roosevelt candidates for places in our delegation. I remember my friends twitting me about my political friend, Col. Bibb Graves, being for the election of an uninstructed delegation to Chicago instead of the pro-Roosevelt slate. This did not lessen my admiration of Colonel Graves but I labored hard in my community for votes for the Roosevelt slate.

In my enthusiasm for Graves and Roosevelt, I must confess that I built up inside me a feeling that the only good that big business served in this country was as something to be taxed and harangued. If I have discarded any part of my original philosophy it has been that part that caused me to feel that there was no place in this country for the liberal cause and prosperous business at one and the same time. I have learned that there is room for both—that a government can be an agency of help for those needing help and assistance and can at the same time be of great value in the encouragement of the free enterprise system.

The U. S. S. R. Scheme on Macedonia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. H. HEDRICK
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. HEDRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article written by Mr. Soterios Nicholson, entitled "The U. S. S. R. Scheme on Macedonia," as carried in the July 30, 1950, issue of the Atlantis. The article follows:

THE U. S. S. R. SCHEME ON MACEDONIA
(By Soterios Nicholson)

WASHINGTON.—The Macedonian question is a key to Balkan peace and its effect on the turn of the cold war cannot be underestimated. There is conclusive evidence to show that Russia, following its ascendancy to great power after World War II, embarked on an ambitious 5-year plan which embodied three major points. First, the country was to achieve economic stability by reconstruction. Second, Communist agitation in capitalist countries was to be intensified. And third, Greece was to be conquered by the Communists because of its commanding position in the Mediterranean. Paramount in the Soviet Union's plans was the status of Macedonia—that area was the door through which the U. S. S. R. hoped to pour its sympathizers and cohorts on the threshold of three areas of world conquest—Europe, Asia, and Africa. Th'3 strategic stroke would be accomplished by 1950 leaving communism unchallenged across the three continents.

Two phases were part of the Soviet scheme to upset the Greek Government and impose its way of life. The first of these concerned Macedonia. By aggression, the U. S. S. R. hoped to seize Greek Macedonia, which makes up one-third of modern Greece, and incorporate it into the so-called independent Macedonian state. This in turn would be combined into the Federal State of Yugoslavia assuring the Soviet Union an outlet to the Aegean Sea through the satellite nations. A second objective was no less calculating. This plan was to establish a Communist government in Athens in order to transform Greece minus its northern provinces, into a "people's republic." Such a move, the Cominform reasoned, would cut off Turkey from the western world and place the Soviet Union in its most strategic position attainable in the cold war. That this plan was aborted in its early stages is to the credit of heroic Greeks who resisted the aggressors, by fighting and shedding blood in defense of national independence and democratic liberties. From this resistance, the western world gained an insight into Soviet strategy and were able to bulwark their strength with promulgation of the Truman doctrine, the Marshall plan, and the Atlantic Pact—all direct or indirect results from this same decision to hold off the aggressor.

In order to gain introspect in this battle of the Balkans, it is necessary to dip into history. Macedonia covered a much larger territory in ancient times than does the area known by that name today. Romans who conquered the territory following the reign of Alexander the Great who had created it as an entity, had attached Albania to Macedonia. Nowadays, by Macedonia, it is generally meant the territory extending from the south of Mount Rhodope to the north of Mount Olympus and from Thessaly east of Pindus and of Char-Dagh, all of whose rivers flow into the Aegean Sea.

The Turks captured Macedonia in 1430 with the fall of Salonica. The Macedonian question did not again arise until the latter part of the nineteenth century when the flame of nationalism was rekindled by greedy neighbors who played on the mixture of races during the Ottoman occupation. In modern times, the territory of Macedonia was settled in a three-way split: Yugoslavia acquired the northwest, Greece the south, and Bulgaria the northeast. Greece's Aegean province totaled 34,602 square kilometers—the largest third. Turkish statistics compiled in 1905, showed a population division of Greeks 648,962; Bulgars, 557,734; Serbs, 167,601.

Further population shifts have occurred since then. By 1928, however, population figures reported in 1928 by the International Refugee Settlement Committee at the League of Nations showed the Greeks with 88.1 percent, or 1,237,000; Slavophones with 5.8 percent and others at 6.1 percent. The 1940 census shows a similar make-up. Thus, its ethnological question no problem, Greek Macedonia enjoyed relative peace and prosperity until World War II. These facts are important because Soviet propaganda in recent years has pointed up Aegean Macedonia as a country inhabited entirely by Slavs, who seek union with Slavophone brothers of Macedonia of the Vardar and the Pirin and for union in a single, all-encompassing state.

The so-called independence question was revived by the U. S. S. R. with the granting of autonomy to Servian Macedonia within the framework of a federal Yugoslavian state and by launching the Bulgaro-Yugoslav project. Other versions of this plan considered by the Cominform and satellite leaders was the creation of a new Macedonian state to which Greece, as a Communist state, would cede its richest provinces: Salonica, Florina, Serres, and Drama. These plans were abandoned, however, because they clashed with Serbian and Greek Communists' position of not wishing to cede territory. Also, the Bulgaro-Yugoslav federation project had to be put aside. It was then that Moscow became aware of Tito's nationalism.

But this did not deter the Moscow direction toward gobbling more land. By eliminating Markos of the Greek Communists who opposed the ceding of territory and replacing him with Johannides and other loyal Communists, the plan, while modified, still existed.

These newly inspired Communists in Greece were dealt their crushing defeat in 1949 and forced to seek refuge in Albania and Bulgaria. Because of Tito's opposition and the U. S. S. R.'s failure to liquidate him, the Bulgaro-Yugoslav project was replaced with a Slavo-Balkan federal republic plan to make Bulgaria the pivot for a Soviet offensive. After this shift in command of Greek Communists, the latter Communist Party became a docile and very sensitive needle point of Russian policy. This party alined itself to the Macedonian plan advanced by the Soviet. And it was here that the reason of this party was manifested. By supporting the theory that there are two distinct peoples, the Greek and the Macedonian, the Greek Communist Party has admitted conspiracy against the fatherland. It subscribes to the plan of first snatching Greek Macedonia away from Greece and then forcing the nation into the iron-curtain line-up.

Since 1945, when the Soviet Union agreed to set up a federation of southern Slavs, with Bulgaria and Yugoslavia as the key points, the mood has changed and the plan scuttled. Today's U. S. S. R. position is a renewed interest in a Balkan federation in which an independent Macedonia would play the leading part. This plan, to leaders in Yugoslavia intent on Tito nationalism, appears as a "demolition of New Yugoslavia," and thus a political threat against that country. That this plan would achieve to bring pressure against Tito there can be no doubt. But the more fundamental purpose of the project in Macedonia is to give Russia that access to the Mediterranean, the dream of Russia since the early days of Tsar imperialism. Such an operation, bypassing Turkey, would place the people of the steppes in the heart of the Balkan Peninsula and at the entrance of the eastern Mediterranean.

For this long-range plan—that envisions the eventual conquest of the world's peoples—the Russians would obliterate Greece. The country of ancient and modern heroes again was picked as the victim—a victim who repeated its valiant defense at a time of crisis.

One City's Stake in United States Foreign Trade Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT B. SCUDDER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. SCUDDER. Mr. Speaker, the city of Eureka, Calif., depends largely on two types of products for its very existence. These are the lumber from nearby forests of redwood and fir, and the fish and crabs from Humboldt Bay and the sea. Without these, Eureka could not have become the modern and thriving community it is today. Without these, the purchasing power of her 20,000 citizens and of her neighboring communities could not buy the products of the industrial East or of the farms of the Midwest, nor could it contribute its share to the growing industrialization of California itself.

Yet today we find the trade policies of the present administration striking deeply at the roots of Eureka's economy, and the economy of all of Humboldt, Del Norte, and adjoining counties.

I have here two clippings which point up this situation and what the workingmen of the north coast of California are doing about it. This is the action of union men, mind you—men whose bread and butter depend upon the prosperity of the industries by which they are employed.

Both clippings are from the Humboldt Standard of July 31. Here is the first:

RUSSIAN CRABS CLEARED FROM LOCAL STORES

Merchants in Eureka are being asked by the fishermen's division of the A. F. of L. butchers' union to clear their shelves of canned crab meat from Russia, Harold Pavey, union secretary, reported yesterday.

Pavey said several stores in Eureka were found with such stock on hand, bearing the tag of Russian importation on the label. He said the proprietors were being asked to send it back to its purchase point.

And here, Mr. Speaker, is the second clipping from the same edition of the Humboldt Standard:

FISH IMPORTS PROTESTED

A resolution protesting the importation of fish and fish products into this country as detrimental to the fishing industry and requesting a boycott of such products has been drawn up by the fishermen's branch of the local A. F. of L. butchers' union.

Harold Pavey, secretary of the local, said he submitted the proposal to the central council here and the resolution was initiated, approved and sent to all central councils in Oregon, Washington, and California for concurrence.

Pavey emphasized the measure as a protection need for the fishing industry locally and nationally.

Mr. Speaker, the men of the sea have stated their case. The men of the forest and the mill, too, are faced with threats from the importation of lumber and lumber products from cheap-labor areas. In addition, the plywood industry of the United States is seriously threatened by a proposed tariff reduction at a time when overseas markets are contracting due to the sale of plywood manufacturing machinery to many foreign nations.

The people of Eureka and of the north coast—and many areas from California to Maine, from Mexico to Canada—are looking to Congress for assistance or at least encouragement while their livelihoods are threatened. But all they are getting is the discouragement caused by the inexplicable foreign-trade policies of the Department of State.

Patriotic Americans Applaud Jailing of Harry Bridges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I am certain most of the Members of this House join me extending heartiest congratulations to Federal Judge George Harris, of San Francisco, and Special Assistant Attorney General F. Joseph Donohue in the revocation of the bond and the jailing of Harry Bridges, alien Communist and convicted perjurer.

I particularly want to congratulate F. Joseph (Jiggs) Donohue who prosecuted Bridges successfully and then moved deliberately to have his bond revoked so this Communist cannot be afforded any opportunity to carry on any subversive activities in these critical times.

This has been a job well done by Jiggs Donohue and his many friends on Capitol Hill applaud him. Being a veteran of two world wars and a Marine Reserve in peacetime, he is a patriotic American, sincere in his efforts to thwart an alien pledged to destroy our American system of government.

The incarceration of Harry Bridges, Mr. Speaker, is a ray of hope, but it is only one ray. What we need is many more such rays of hope that this administration is alert to the peril of these times.

Every Communist or fellow-traveler known to want Russia to take over should be interned until we are assured of peace. A householder would be tragically derelict if he allowed a rattlesnake, or a nest of rattlesnakes, to run unmolested about his house. Our Government is tragically derelict in permitting such men as Steve Nelson, Paul Robeson, Alger Hiss and all other Soviet-lovers to walk the streets and carry on their nefarious activities.

It is not necessary to engage in a witch hunt to protect ourselves against men and movements that would destroy us without giving us the warning a rattlesnake gives in most instances. The FBI knows who the Communists are. They should be rounded up, herded into concentrations camps and guarded so that they cannot be in a position to stab us in the back when the Soviet leaders begin to move.

No American sympathizer would live 10 minutes in Soviet Russia, and we all know it. Why should we permit these Soviet sympathizers to walk about the streets and either engage in sabotage or confuse and divide our people?

The 11 Communists convicted in New York several months ago wanted to sabotage our Government, but the Government moved in and beat them to the draw. The courts have held that it is perfectly legal for the Government to protect itself in a time of peril. If this is not a time of peril there never will be one. Let us finish the job that has so well been started.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, there are thousands of honest law-abiding citizens now idle because competitive imports have taken our domestic market from them. This is bad enough under the free-trade policies of the New Deal, but to open our market to the products produced by conscript or slave labor by enemy nations can serve only to strengthen the economy of those nations and at the same time weaken our own economy. Why should Red China or Red Russia enjoy our domestic market at the expense of American labor? Why should the New Deal administration continue to coddle these communistic nations by letting into our country competitive goods produced by slave labor while these same countries at this very minute are cutting the throats of our boys in Korea?

I notice that the New York Times for Sunday, August 6, carries the thought-provoking letter to the editor from a prominent Washington attorney, Mr. Edwin G. Martin, who was for many years general counsel of the United States Tariff Commission. I think this letter is well worth consideration by every Member of the House and accordingly include it as a part of my remarks.

Briefly, the subject matter is the importation of products of slave labor or, if you wish, call it forced labor. At any event millions of people behind the iron curtain are now being forced to engage in the production of goods for export to the United States. These goods compete here with the products of our free labor and as a result many of our workmen are out of jobs or alternatively working at jobs where their skills are not fully utilized.

Our present law is anomalous indeed. It provides for the prohibition of entry of goods produced by forced or slave labor. Countries who legitimately occupy a place in the family of nations, France, for example, permit inspection of their penal colonies and as a result we are able by discrimination to determine which of their products are produced by forced labor. On the other hand, countries behind the iron curtain do not permit inspection so that our enforcement officers are not able to determine whether the goods are actually produced by forced labor. Results such as this which penalize our friends for the benefit of our enemies should not be tolerated. I call on the Members of the House to examine their consciences and determine whether they want the present situation to continue or whether they will join with me in making appropriate modifications of the law.

Members should not need to be reminded that many products are now being imported from Russia and other iron curtain countries—furs and crab meat from Russia; shoes, glassware, pottery, and textile products from Czechoslovakia; tung oil from Red China; and so forth, and so forth. Some of these products are seriously undercutting domestic goods produced by free American labor. Is it not time that we took action to protect our own?

Under leave to extend, I am inserting the letter, which appeared in the New York Times on August 6, 1950, to which I have just referred:

PRODUCTS OF FORCED LABOR

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

In a period of growing concern about the problem of increasing competition from imported goods produced by forced labor, is it not reasonable to consider whether our laws are adequate?

I submit they are not, either in principle or in practical application. The Tariff Act of 1930 (sec. 307) prohibits entry of products of forced labor only if similar goods are produced in the United States in sufficient quantities to meet the consumptive demand. (This qualification is to protect domestic consumers.)

In the case of many articles (e. g., furs) domestic production is not adequate to meet domestic consumption. Imports are available, however, from several sources to supplement domestic supply. If one of these foreign sources uses forced labor, but supplies from other free labor countries are adequate, why should not our producers be protected from competition from the forced-labor countries?

The fact that such protection would also benefit the free labor products of other countries should not make it objectionable.

Should not the law be changed so that goods produced abroad by free labor would be added to the domestic supply for purposes of determining whether goods produced by forced labor are to be excluded?

Under present law the Secretary of the Treasury must determine that the particular goods were produced by forced labor as a condition precedent to their exclusion. But how can such a determination be made for goods produced behind the iron curtain?

Would it not be reasonable to add to the law a presumption that goods are produced by forced labor if they are from a country where forced labor is known to be employed, and if that country does not permit inspection by representatives of the United States, or possibly, the International Labor Organization?

There may be a better way of handling this pressing problem, and if so, let it be brought forward. However, unless some change is made in our law, the protection Congress extended to American labor by Sec. 307 is likely to be nullified, at least so far as the iron curtain is concerned.

State Department Record Calls for a Change in Command

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from Barron's National Business and Financial Weekly of July 31, 1950:

STATE DEPARTMENT RECORD CALLS FOR A CHANGE IN COMMAND

Back in 1940 when asked what Britain was fighting for, Winston Churchill replied: "If we stopped fighting you would soon find out." Fortunate would be this country if those in charge of its foreign policy could risk a similar abrupt answer.

In the showdown between nazism and civilization Churchill could stand on his record. In the developing showdown between communism and civilization in the Far East the United States State Department under the leadership of Mr. Acheson has no such record, and having none is compromised in facing and moulding the future.

Yet the future has to be faced if the heroic effort which the country is now making is to come to any fruition. The Korean War can obviously no longer be written off as a police action against bandits. It has involved bitter defeats. It is taking a mounting toll of American lives. It is the justification for a mobilization plan which if put into action will affect the American economy for years to come. On the President's own estimate Korea is only an episode in a continuous conflict calling for the best this country has to give in courage and statesmanship.

TIME FOR CONFIDENCE

In these circumstances confidence in those who are day by day making America's foreign policy is of the essence. Such confidence is lacking. The response of the United States to the President's commitment of American forces to Korea was astounding, and may well have surprised even Mr. Stalin. Its faith in General MacArthur and General Bradley is unbounded. Despite all the brickbats thrown at Defense Secretary Johnson his mistakes seem more of omission than of commission. But in the case of the State Department the cancerous suspicion remains—a suspicion voiced almost every day in Congress itself—that all is not well and cannot be made well without a clean sweep.

Why? The record is a familiar one and has been ably presented by such men as former President Hoover, Senators TAFT, KNOWLAND, and SMITH, and Congressman JUDD. It does not rest, be it noted, on the now faraway days of World War II, on the policies of the late Franklin D. Roosevelt, on the admitted tragedy of Yalta. The record rests strictly on the events of the year that preceded Korea, in which the United States State Department, while standing on the Truman Doctrine in Europe, appeased and opened the flood gates to communism in Asia.

The history of this fateful year already reads like some strange fantasy. In July 1949, the United States, having earlier agreed to the line of the thirty-eighth parallel, withdrew its forces from Korea. Such withdrawal opened the way for what has happened and was in conformity with the known views of such men as Owen Lattimore who said: "The thing to do, therefore, is to let South Korea fall—but not let it look as though we pushed it."

In August came a far more revealing and clear-cut diplomatic move—publication of the Department's famous white paper on China. That paper, sponsored by Mr. Acheson, placed the sole blame for the defeat of Nationalist China on the head of Chiang Kai-shek. It completely overlooked the fact that for almost 2 years the United States had kept Chiang's force immobilized through pressure to make him come to terms with Mao Tze-tung. It justified this policy of appeasement and error and in effect tried to write finis to the whole Nationalist cause.

INVITATION TO AGGRESSION

Fortunately for the United States, Chiang Kai-shek retired to Formosa and proceeded to carry on the war. Mr. Acheson opposed that effort and took responsibility for a directive to United States information agencies abroad that Formosa was of no strategic value and would soon fall. In late 1949 he took direct issue with the Defense Department, the Joint Chiefs of Staff and General MacArthur on sending military aid to Chiang.

In January he went further, openly declaring that the strategic line of America's defense in the western Pacific was Japan, Okinawa, and the Philippines. That line not only omitted Formosa but also Korea. It was an open invitation, if further invitation were needed, to the Communists to launch their Korean attack.

With that attack Mr. Truman reversed most of the Acheson line, and in the case of Formosa completely repudiated it. The United Nations was rallied to the defense of the Korean Republic. But even with the war on, the attitude of the State Department toward communism in China remained and remains peculiarly ambivalent.

Veterans of the Chinese Red army are heavily reinforcing North Korean forces. Yet in connection with the recent interchange of notes between Premier Nehru of India and the United States, the State Department again let it be known that it will not veto the admittance of Red China into the UN Security Council. This is apparently still a procedural matter even though Red China is to all intents and purposes at war with the UN. The policy perhaps explains why last week Russia decided to return Mr. Malik to the Council to manipulate it to its own purposes.

NATIONAL UNITY

What can be done with such a record? The answer seems to be that nothing can be done, and it is this which makes the present State Department regime a real liability to this country's war effort and its legitimate hope for a secure peace. The fruitless vendetta against Chiang Kai-shek apparently stands in the way of accepting the aid of 30,000 Chinese troops who are ready and willing to fight. As long as the flim-flam about letting the Chinese Communists into the UN continues, it is clearly impossible to reorganize that body in the interests of the free world. Finally, it is stretching the imagination to suppose that men who have blundered as badly as the leaders of the State Department have blundered in the Far East can be entrusted with deciding on the future of Korea, or any other related matter.

It is on these grounds that the case against the State Department rises above personality. Mr. Acheson has proved himself not only a brilliant but in many ways a devoted public servant. Yet, neither brilliance nor devotion can compensate for a year's record of ineptitude and wavering of the fundamental issue of whether this country is against communism in Asia or not.

The issue is as simple and as hard as that. The times call for national unity. Such unity will scarcely be promoted by overlooking the causes of national division.

Joint Action by Religious Leaders Against Signing Stockholm Petition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, it is encouraging, indeed, that the patriotic religious leaders in this country have taken direct action against the so-called Stockholm peace petition, which they so correctly describe as this spurious peace petition. Their warning to the people of the three major faiths in the United States should be most effective.

I sincerely hope that our Committee on Foreign Affairs will arrange soon for a hearing on this matter so that it can recommend House Concurrent Resolution 247, or some similar legislation, placing the Congress of the United States on clear record as to the nature of this petition and as to the proper alternatives for patriotic Americans sincerely seeking means of achieving peace in this world. In my judgment, such action by Congress is particularly important in view of the reported action of the Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R. endorsing the Stockholm peace petition.

The following article is from the New York Times of August 3, 1950:

THREE FAITHS DENOUNCE RED PEACE APPEAL—LEADERS OF JEWS, PROTESTANTS, AND CATHOLICS JOIN TO FIGHT AGGRESSION IN KOREA

Leaders of the Jewish, Protestant, and Roman Catholic faiths joined yesterday in a statement condemning Communist aggression in Korea as the greatest menace to world peace and denouncing the Stockholm appeal as spurious and deceptive.

The joint statement was the first on an international issue since the end of World War II to carry the signatures of spokesmen for the three major faiths in the United States. It was signed by officers of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, the National Catholic Welfare Conference, and the Synagogue Council of America.

It appeared to be prompted chiefly by the circulation of the Stockholm appeal by Communist and pro-Communist groups. Issued in March of this year by the Congress of Partisans of Peace, the appeal called for outlawing the atomic bomb, but did not condemn aggression with other weapons.

REAL PEACE EFFORTS FAVORED

In their joint statement the leaders of the three faiths said:

"We are heartily in sympathy with every genuine proposal in the pursuit of international peace. We warn the people of America, however, to be on guard lest they be misled by the so-called Stockholm appeal now being circulated by Communist and pro-Communist groups. This spurious peace petition, which has already deceived many well-meaning people here and abroad, is a camouflage designed to confuse the three societies and to conceal the aggressive policies revealed in the invasion of Korea. It is these aggressive policies and actual aggression which constitute the greatest menace to world peace.

"Genuine peace requires practical recognition of the fact that not only individuals but nations, states, and international society, are subject to the sovereignty of God and to the moral law which comes from God. Genuine peace requires of every people:

"1. Renunciation of the use of war or threats of force as an instrument of national policy.

"2. Loyal adherence to the solemn obligations of the United Nations Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security and the peaceful settlement of disputes.

"3. Respect for the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all.

"4. Participation in positive programs of the United Nations for the common welfare and better standards of life.

"5. Acceptance of international agreements for the effective reduction and regulation of armaments, including atomic weapons, by all nations, through a trustworthy system of international inspection and control.

"We urge men of good will to support these objectives of a genuine program for peace."

SIGNERS OF DECLARATION

Those signing the declaration were: Rabbi Bernard J. Bamberger, of New York, president of the Synagogue Council of America; the Reverend Dr. Samuel McCrea Cavert, of New York, general secretary of the Federal Council of Churches; Msgr. Frederick G. Hochwalt, of Washington, director of the Department of Education, National Catholic Welfare Conference; Rabbi Morris Kertzer, of New York, chairman of the Social Action Committee of the Synagogue Council of America; the Reverend Raymond A. McGowan, of Washington, director of the Social Action Department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference; and Bishop John S. Stamm, of Harrisburg, Pa., bishop of the Evangelical United Brethren Church and president of the Federal Council of Churches.

A Cabinet Shakeup Is Overdue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to insert my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include as a part of my remarks an editorial which appeared in the Buffalo Evening News of July 25, 1950:

A CABINET SHAKEUP IS OVERDUE

Ever since the Korean war exploded on our unsuspecting Government and caused an abrupt reversal of practically every major policy the administration had been pursuing, the great buck-passing game has been on.

The blame for our tragic unpreparedness has been passed back and forth from the State Department to the Pentagon, from the administration to Capitol Hill, from Washington to Tokyo, and from the Government to the people. But always it comes back to roost on the doorsteps of these three key officials:

1. Secretary of State Acheson, whose whole far-eastern appeasement policy was flatly reversed by events in Korea and by the President's decision to take an historic stand there.

2. Secretary of Defense Johnson, who, in the name of economy, drastically cut into the muscle as well as the fat of our defense establishment, hitting with particular force the very services and weapons most needed for this kind of war—tanks, naval aviation, Marines, ground-support aviation, etc.

3. President Truman himself, who has consistently refused to take the Communist challenge seriously, or to put the need for preparedness above the playing of domestic politics-as-usual, and who has repeatedly misled the public with soothing and confusing words to the effect that we were nearer peace than any time since 1946.

These are facts which the public cannot easily forget, as it is asked to rally behind this same administration for the tremendous mobilization job that lies ahead. It should be painfully clear by now that the crisis confronting us calls for the fullest public support of the Government, in a spirit of sacrifice and unity such as only a grave emergency can evoke. But it should be equally clear that the Government, in order to command that kind of support, must do everything possible to merit the public's confidence. And how can it do that except by getting rid of those officials whom the public identifies with the past disastrous policies that have just been so spectacularly reversed?

What we are suggesting, in short, is the need for an immediate shakeup in the administration's highest echelons. No one but the people can fire the President, and that question can't even arise for two more years. But the public can and must hold the President responsible for ridding his administration of the advisers in whom it has lost confidence.

We are not interested in scapegoats, and we are not out for scalps. But we submit that it is utterly incongruous to put an all-out rearmament program in the hands of those who have been so busy disarming us for the last year and a half, or to entrust the conduct of our new Asiatic policy to those whose policy until 1 month ago was the very opposite.

It is futile to quibble over whether Secretary Acheson is more or less to blame for our diplomatic and military unpreparedness than Secretary Johnson. Both are the archsymbols of policies that events have reversed at tremendous cost. Both, therefore, should have resigned or been dismissed before now. And with them should go the politics-as-usual advisers who have prevailed on the President to play down the Communist threat. What possible excuse could there be, moreover, for keeping a man like Secretary of the Navy Matthews, who willingly executed the Johnson decrees to whittle down the Navy and marines?

These are the officials whom the public identifies with the policies that the Korean crisis has shown to be so disastrously wrong. Already, too much precious time is being wasted on efforts within the administration to vindicate these past policies, to pass the buck from Pentagon to State Department and back again. The cleanest way to end this situation and to rally public confidence in the new policies so belatedly adopted is to clear away the symbols of appeasement and disarmament in the far Pacific and to bring in new men whose records of past performance need no apology.

This is no time for face-saving cover-ups or run-of-the-mill political appointments. It is time for national unity and for the rallying of public confidence, by getting rid of the architects of failure, and bringing into the Government the men who are most competent to run it, regardless of their politics. And certainly the most obvious vacancies needing to be filled as a result of the Korean affair are the offices of Secretary of State and Secretary of Defense. Messrs. Acheson and Johnson should be retired forthwith.

Republican Advance Gets Cold Reception

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include an article by Frank R. Kent, one of our most highly regarded political observers, which appeared in the Washington Star Sunday, August 6, 1950:

REPUBLICAN ADVANCE GETS COLD RECEPTION—WRITER SAYS GOP NEEDS NO SUCH RENOVATION

(By Frank R. Kent)

Politically observant persons must have noted that since the 1948 election, every few months there arises a new Republican movement sponsored by more or less well-known, but very seldom potent, party figures, the avowed purpose of which is to rehabilitate and reconstruct the Republican Party along modern lines.

This performance has been repeated so often as to have now reached the stage where only the most incurably credulous take it seriously. The most recent of these movements calls itself the Republican Advance and is promoted by a New York attorney named Henry Poor and Russell Davenport, once briefly in the public eye as an adviser of the late Wendell Willkie. Before that it was Governor Driscoll, of New Jersey, who called for a Republican reconstruction.

And before him there was a group which wanted to be to the Republican Party what the so-called Americans for Democratic Action are to the Democratic Party—an odd ambition, to say the least.

Every one of these movements differs somewhat from the others, but basically they are identical. Each is hotly denunciatory of the Old Guard and vehemently insistent upon the party gearing itself to the times and facing the future with a broader and more attractive appeal. Each makes lavish use of the shopworn and meaningless adjectives "liberal," "progressive," and "constructive." They are all strong on generalities and extremely foggy concerning specific facts.

In two other respects these efforts for Republican rehabilitation are exactly the same: (1) They seem to have an equally unstable existence. Some stay alive longer than others but soon or late they shrivel and fall off the vine. (2) Invariably, they secure rather important publicity for a short time. Certainly, a sure way for a Republican to get publicity is to proclaim himself a liberal and express discontent with the reactionary party leadership. He does not have to have a program. He does not even have to have an idea. All he has to do is beat his breast and strike the pose. At once, he is hailed by the left-wing and advanced thinkers among the columnists, commentators and press agents. They start in to make a hero of him. From that time on he is referred to in chorus as the hard-hitting, clear-thinking Senator So-and-So, or the able and independent Representative This-and-That.

And though, unless completely stone-headed, he must know that these journalistic greasers are unshakably New Deal, Fair Deal, and Welfare State Democrats, it becomes the main purpose of his life to have their commendation continue. One would think the intelligent among them would realize they are behaving like political saps, lending themselevs to Democratic propaganda about the desire of Republicans to return to the Harding and McKinley days.

Of course, this talk of reactionary leadership is the cheapest kind of clap-trap. The Republicans did not lose the last four elections because they were reactionary. They lost two of them because of the war and the other two because, in a silly effort to outbid and outpromise the Democrats, they gave the voters no choice between liberalism and conservatism. Twice there have been two neglected issues upon which there is strong reason to believe they could have won. One of these is the evil effect of an enormously expanded Federal machine, the weight of which tends to keep the administration in power and the tremendous cost of which has brought us close to economic chaos.

The other is the shameful subservience of the Democratic administration to the greedy labor bosses, whose reckless waves of strikes have at times endangered the economic life and health of the Nation. With these two issues and the right sort of candidate, the Republican Party can afford to disregard these boresome movements to renovate and redecorate it.

What About Russia?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by Hon. WILLIAM M. COLMER, of Mississippi, in the House of Representatives, Friday, August 2, 1946:

WHAT ABOUT RUSSIA?

(Speech of Hon. WILLIAM M. COLMER, of Mississippi, in the House of Representatives, Friday, August 2, 1946)

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, wars upset the fortunes of nations as well as men. This has always been true, and World War II has proved no exception. Out of this global struggle a new order of world political powers has resulted. No longer, for instance, does Britannia rule the waves. The new world power—America—has become the mistress of the seas. Meanwhile, other significant changes have taken place. Whether our English and French allies like it or not, they realize that a new giant has arisen from the debris of this the greatest of all wars—Russia. Proud of its accomplishments in battle, fully conscious of but not materially weakened by its enormous sacrifices, Russia is the dominating European power today, and no nation now or ever heretofore has been more conscious and proud of that new-found strength and position. In fact, it is obvious to even the most casual thinker that the future peace and opportunity of nations to survive in the new atomic age is largely, if not entirely, in the hands of the United States of America and the Soviet Republic.

Whether these statements are fully concurred in or not, it is certainly worth while to consider the question on the tongues of so many people throughout the world today: What about Russia? Will Russia cooperate with America and thus bring about the coveted goal of peace, or will the peoples of the Soviet Republic follow Stalin, even as others have followed Alexander, Napoleon, the Kaiser, and Hitler, on world conquest, assuming that Stalin has world conquest as his objective? Or do Stalin and his small group of commissars and advisers have in mind the construction of a great economic nation with much of the more abundant life for their millions of subjects? What about the Russian system as a whole? Is it something that the people of this Nation should adopt instead of the system of individual enterprise and freedom of the individual which has made it truly great? Was Mikoyan serious when, asked what exports Russia could make to the United States in the postwar period he said timber, furs, gold, and so forth, but not communism?

These and many other questions were raised in the minds of a subcommittee of the House Select Committee on Postwar Economic and Policy Planning, of which I have the honor to be chairman, as the result of our visit to Russia and 13 other European countries a few months ago. Congress authorized and financed the mission and the study in order that a first-hand knowledge of the European economic situation and its effect upon our own country might be gained. Although only 7—Representatives Zimmerman, Missouri; Wolverton, New Jersey; Hope, Kansas; Wolcott, Michigan; LeFevre, New York; Simpson, Illinois; and myself—of the 18 members of the committee who made the trip, our report to the Congress and the country on our conclusions and recommendations was unanimously adopted by the full committee of 10 Democrats and 8 Republicans; and I hope it may be stated with pardonable pride that this report—the committee's eighth—has been substantially followed in many instances by the administration in its dealings with the several countries visited.

Both the committee and I realize that as a result of such a short dipping into the stream of Russian life we would subject ourselves to the charge of being presumptuous to set ourselves up as authorities on the economic and political problems involved in dealing with the Soviet Republic. However, it will be borne in mind that we were the first and only congressional committee to visit with Generalissimo Stalin and to make anything like a comprehensive study of that situation.

I might also point out that the committee made thorough and adequate provision for its mission. We were accompanied by our staff director, Marion B. Folsom, and our special consultant, Dr. William Y. Elliott, of Harvard University.

In addition to free and sometimes bold conversations with Generalissimo Stalin and his commissars, our group, also with equal frankness, interviewed Prime Minister Atlee and other members of the British Labor Cabinet, as well as the leaders of all other countries visited in Europe and the Middle East. We also talked with our own military leaders and economic advisers throughout the countries visited, including Generals Eisenhower, Clay, and McNarney. Nevertheless, in the subject at hand and the impressions that follow I shall speak only for myself.

While the entire trip, despite its strenuous nature, was most interesting and profitable, I think we all felt that our greatest education on the trip came in the first-hand analysis of the Russian system at work, which was made possible by the intimate talks with the chief officials of the Government, including several members of the powerful Politburo of the Communist Party, in addition to the more formal conference with Stalin himself.

While the economic structure of the Soviet Government is the business of the Russian people, and others, especially Americans, who believe in the right of all peoples to govern themselves, should not question that system, it might be well to point out some of the elements of that system, especially as it concerns the economic and political freedom and rights of the individual. This might be particularly profitable now, in view of the growing tendency in this country by friends of the Russian system to try to sell it to American citizens, and particularly to our wage earners, who now enjoy the highest standard of living of any laboring people in the history of the world. We had ample opportunity to observe first hand the living conditions of the Russian people. The standard of living there apparently has not improved substantially since the days of the Russian czars. Surely the American people do not covet the standard of living under the Soviet system.

As guests of the Russian Government, our committee was given the privilege of visiting both a factory and a collective farm. We were informed, incidentally, by attachés of our Embassy that these particular institutions which we visited were the pride of the Soviets. They were the same institutions always shown to visiting foreigners. The manager of the Stalin auto works received us in the rather elaborate office suite of the factory. He, like all other important men in the party, was dressed in a uniform not dissimilar to that worn by the Generalissimo himself. There in this office, too, hung a large picture of Stalin and another of Lenin. This was a familiar scene, for we observed that all important buildings had these photographs or paintings prominently displayed, while in practically every square or in front of every important Government institution statues of Stalin and Lenin were found. It was our consensus of opinion that Lenin was the only competitor of Stalin in Russia—and he is dead.

Before we were shown through the factory we were thoroughly briefed by the manager, who took great pride in pointing out the productive capacity and other features of that enterprise, which we observed was largely copied after the assembly-line production of our own American factories. When I inquired of him—I confess somewhat naively—if he was bothered by strikes, he, with a smile, replied "No," and something to the effect that strikes were an American institution. When further pressed as to what happened if the workers became dissatisfied with either their working conditions or pay, he replied that such things never happened and that the workers were all satisfied. But pressed still further as to this, he replied, in answer to the question of what would happen if such complaints were made, that in such event the representative of the trade union and the representative of the factory would get together and iron everything out and everybody would be happy. He, of course, neglected to state that the representative of the trade union and the representative of the factory were both representatives of the Government and the party.

At the collective farm I inquired of the superintendent about the freedom of the workers on the farm to change from one farm to another. Again the answer was that nobody wanted to change; that everyone was satisfied with their working conditions and the fruits of their labor. On further investigation of this after we had returned to the embassy, we learned that these were the true conditions and that both the laborers in the factories and the workers on the farms were virtually frozen to the jobs assigned them. We were also advised that only some extraordinary service for the party would warrant any change in their status.

The NKVD still operates in Russia as effectively as the Gestapo did in Hitler's Germany. It all reminded me of a story that came out of World War I.

It seems that the American mother of a soldier of that war had not heard from him in many months. To her great joy, the long-awaited letter was finally brought by the postman. Nervously tearing it open, she read this:

"DEAR MOTHER: I know you have been muchly concerned about me, since you have not heard from me in several months. Don't worry any more. I was captured at the battle of Chateau-Thierry and am now imprisoned in this German prison camp.

"I was never better treated in my life. I receive three good meals a day, have no work to do, sleep on a feather bed, and am even given good books to read. So please don't worry.

"Your devoted son,

"JOHN."

Then this significant postscript caught her attention:

"P. S.—You remember Bill Grimes, who went into the service with me? He, too, was interned here. He was shot this morning at sunrise for complaining about the prison fare."

What is the system, itself, like? It is no secret, of course, that the control of Russia is in the hands of a smaller group of men than in any surviving world power. The 16 to 18 members of the Politburo may have some internal difficulties, but they are held together in the tightest oligarchic discipline by Stalin's domination of the party and by the necessity of keeping the great Red Army and the marshals in line after the Soviet successes of these years in the war. The internal measures of control mean keeping a very substantial part of the Russian population itself in concentration camps or under the discipline of forced labor in Siberia or in any part of the great area of Russia where they are needed. For that matter, labor's position seems to be one of complete subservience to the party control of the state.

It is a curious thing that we throw open all our industrial secrets, permit the downright appropriation of any copyrights and patents protected in all other states by the act of international copyright laws, allow well over a thousand Russians to be attached to various official capacities in the United States, and legions of Russian representatives who are, in the nature of things, necessarily agents, to explore every aspect of our country and engage in any type of propaganda that they see fit, while the bare thought of such activity on our part in any section of Russia or in the territories which Russia controls would throw the NKVD into convulsions.

The NKVD, by the way, is the group of initials that apply to the security branch of the army and the police who have incorporated the old CHEKA of the earlier Russian terror. Though they are not all in uniform and operate in some instances in plain clothes, the efforts of the NKVD have as pervasive a hold on the Russian system as the Himmler Gestapo and SS organizations had on the Nazi system. We were unable to learn any difference in methods; in fact, the Fascists and the Nazis both simply imitated the highly efficient Russian model.

It does not require a Solomon to figure out the importance of Russia in world economics, as well as world politics. Figures are sometimes produced to show that Russia in the prewar days accounted for an average of only 3 to 5 percent of the world's total international trade, but we are not dealing with that prewar Russia any longer. The rest of the world has changed as well as Russia. Britain is visibly hard pressed to build back an export trade from her own war economy that will put her once more in the sound position of being able to pay for her necessary imports. She has been in the past, and will probably remain, the largest single import market in the world for raw materials and food. France is recovering slowly and with great difficulty. Germany is shattered by war to a degree that can only be believed when seen in its cities and its transportation system, and is being stripped of its industries by the French and Russians directly in their own zones, and by reparation from the western zones for Russia, indirectly. Italy is in a state of prostration and seems unable to develop, in the aftermath of fascism, a broadly supported strong policy. The smaller countries like Greece need raw materials to get back to work, quite as much as the larger ones. Greece has itself probably suffered more in the war than any single country from starvation and deliberate looting of its resources. Only the Scandinavian countries and Belgium seem well on the way to a healthy recovery, though Holland gave promise of rapidly following, and Switzerland was an island of stability in the whole war-lashed sea of Europe. Eastern European countries were, of course, prostrate, subject to "Russian requisitioning" to a degree almost paralelling the stripping of Germany in some instances. The whole continent appeared to give little prospect of sound recovery until some basic political problems and greater freedom of movement and trade had been achieved.

On the other hand, Russia was already making very rapid strides toward reestablishing its industrial system by stripping the wrecked zones of the west and had developed, from all that we could find out, tremendous new strength behind the Urals and in Siberia. This was being supplemented by the importation of machinery, transportation in the form of automotive equipment and anything usable, both from the eastern and western zones of the war. We know now that Manchuria, delivered from the Japanese, was treated to systematic stripping of its industrial machinery in much the same way that eastern Europe and Germany have been. The Russians have a very simple theory about war booty and are not concerned about the niceties of ownership, either American or any other. Apparently in the agreements made at Potsdam, no effort had been made to protect American property and plants, in the zones controlled by Russia, from sharing the fate meted out to everything else that was movable and useful to the Russians. We learned of American factories in Berlin being loaded on trains and moved east, even though their products were primarily for peacetime uses. We also learned that the German skilled labor was being shipped to Russia along with the machinery.

But the real point is that Russia is able today to reach out and harness the resources of the productive capacity of almost one-half of Europe, to add to its own tremendous potential, and is building up the same sort of control in Korea and in Manchuria, adjoining her Siberian provinces in the Far East. It may be true that Russia will be preoccupied primarily with her own reconstruction for a long time to come. If she gets the loans that she hopes to raise she will become a great importer also from outside the region that she controls for several years at least, mainly from this country. If she does not raise these loans, she will have to force her exports as she did in the early thirties, even at the cost of starving a lot of Russians at that time in order to pay for the equipment that she needs and cannot take from territories under her control.

We got the total impression of desperate haste to build up a system so powerful that it could support the flood of the Red Army and pour it in any direction in the very near future. Stalin's speeches have themselves emphasized this point.

For a country that is posing as the source of true democracy and as a liberator of oppressed peoples, the record in eastern Europe alone would be disillusioning. No capitalist country, to whom Stalin has charged the inevitability of the last war, has ever possessed so complete monopoly capitalism as Russia or been so barefaced in its use of power. It can hardly be said, for instance, that Rumania and Hungary have had their economies liberated or an opportunity given them for an economic basis for reconstructing their shattered lives after domination by the Axis. Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia were treated more leniently but with an absolute enforcement of the priority of Russian demands on the controlled governments of those countries.

We got the same story everywhere of the steady lowering of American prestige in every region under Russian control by the refusal to afford adequate quarters to our diplomatic representatives or to let in an adequate staff, to say nothing of the black-out of any sort of news out of Russia except the most closely censored stuff from the few correspondents who had been permitted to penetrate the screen.

The whole system of education in which some of us were very much interested and which we discussed with several groups seems to be in for a thorough overhauling. The classics are coming back, the great heroes of Russia today are not just the products of the Marxian revolution. Indeed, one is tempted to say, and I believe truthfully, that Marx is pretty well dead or translated to a harmless heaven of pure theory so far as internal consumption is concerned. However, Marxian dogmas including the perpetual attacks on monopoly capitalism and encirclement from abroad make the Communist doctrines a useful article of export, in spite of all professions to the contrary. If the Comintern was buried, for understandable reasons, to placate the democracies during the struggle for life of the Russian system against Hitler, the Communist international was never dead. It was buried alive and is manifestly revived today in as crusading a form as it has ever enjoyed, so that Moscow can seek to change the head of the Communist Party in the United States via French Communists.

To the new Russian nationalism, the fatherland has once again become holy, and Stalin an object of universal veneration far beyond anything dreamed of by the czars. The use of the Communist Party abroad is ironical when considered in this light but it is still mighty useful in terms of national interest.

Nothing could be more impressive, and to a democrat, more alarming, than the apparently absolute power of propaganda to sway the Russian masses in any desired direction. The scale which has been developed in the use of this instrument is applied in every field from production to foreign affairs. Any current of opinion can be reversed so quickly as to leave the detached observer gasping; at one moment it may be the line to conceal, as apparently it was for a considerable part of the war, outside help from the United States on lend-lease. So completely successful was this effort that Russian soldiers, when they contacted our own, asked what we were doing with Russian-made jeeps, tanks, trucks, etc. Later on, in order to create a proper atmosphere for Tehran, Yalta, and the Potsdam agreements, Roosevelt became an object of great affection and along with this the acknowledgment of American aid, in general terms, was handsomely made by Stalin. The British have, however, been treated as imperialists from the beginning, and Churchill probably never enjoyed a real success in Russia as one of the Big Three, even before he became the "bogeyman" of imperialism that he now is.

Naturally, one of the high lights on the trip to Russia was our visit to the Kremlin and our conference with Generalissimo Stalin. We had heard so much and had read so much about the little man with the black mustache that he had become somewhat of a legendary figure in our minds. Both our curiosity and desire to secure information on these momentous questions had been whetted. Before we had left Washington on our 2 months' arduous task we had arranged this as well as most other meetings through the Department of State, whose blessings we seemed to enjoy as the result of previous work done by the committee. Our appointment with Stalin, like all other state appointments that he has, was at night. Our Embassy officials, in the days spent in Russia preceding the appointment, never lost the opportunity to impress upon us that we were the first American Congressmen to be received by the Generalissimo and that the occasion was a very important one.

On the appointed evening we proceeded to the Kremlin in three Embassy automobiles. At the gates we were stopped by the Kremlin guards, who first thoroughly satisfied themselves of the identity of our party and then permitted us to enter the grounds of the Kremlin. We observed as we drove through the several blocks before arriving at the appointed place for our interview, that the grounds were extremely well guarded by Russian soldiers. When we alighted from our automobiles there were still more guards who hastily passed us into the building itself. And there our party, although accompanied from the beginning by a representative of the Kremlin, was escorted down a series of long corridors—how many I do not recall, but it seems that there were at least three or four. At the end of each were more Russian guards. When we reached the end of these seemingly interminable corridors we were taken into a rather large reception room where we waited until our escort reappeared through two large sliding doors and announced our presence to the generalissimo and his commissars, Beryia and Vishinsky. As we proceeded into this second and larger reception room the man of mystery and legend, who was seated at the end of a long table at the far end of the room, got up and came forward to greet us. After introductions had been made all around we were asked to be seated on the opposite side of the table from Stalin's staff, while Stalin sat at our right at the end of the table.

It was agreed in advance that as chairman of the committee, I should do the talking and submit the questions which we desired to have answered. In a session of the group with representatives of the Embassy the line of questions was agreed upon. They were to be forthright and to the point without any superfluous or too fulsome praise of either the generalissimo himself or the accomplishments of his country as our ally in the late war.

No good purpose would be served by a lengthy report nor have we ever heretofore publicized our Stalin interview which was conducted through Stalin's interpreter and a Mr. Kennan of the Embassy staff, who served as our interpreter. After appropriate but brief courtesies had been exchanged I explained to Stalin on behalf of the committee that our mission was largely an economic one; that naturally economics and politics were inseparable and that the United States was interested in doing as much postwar trade as possible with the Soviet Republic. I stated that we had understood that to this end Russia had made some declaration of its desire to make a postwar loan of the United States. He replied that Russia had several months prior to our visit expressed a desire to borrow $6,000,000,000; that there had been some preliminary negotiations in which the question of the interest rate had been discussed; that America had apparently wanted something like 2 percent and Russia had wanted something less than 2 percent; and that nothing further had been heard from the negotiations. Naturally, we wanted to know several things: First, to what purpose Russia expected to use this money; second, how she expected to pay it back; third, what exports and imports there would be; and, fourth, what could America expect in return.

Without going into all of the details, the Russian leader said in substance that the money was desired to rehabilitate Russia, to increase its industrial capacity, and generally to raise the standard of living in Russia. To all questions his answers were on the whole responsive although at times we thought them evasive. Some of our questions were boldly frank. For instance, I, in more diplomatic language than it sounds, asked what he proposed to do with the millions of German and other war prisoners then within the boundaries of Russia. He came back with the answer that they would be returned to their countries as soon as conditions in Russia permitted. It was when I asked, in an ad lib fashion, how he expected to pay back the loan that he seemed a bit ruffled. With some show of spirit he replied that we were talking of great loans to China who had no resources with which to repay and seemed somewhat perturbed that we should question the ability of Russia to repay her loans with all of the natural resources which she has.

When all of our questions had been asked and answered, we arose, thanked the Generalissimo for the conference, all took a Russian cigarette which was proffered us, shook hands and bade the man of mystery and his advisers good night.

Everyone who visits Russia, and for that matter most other countries, must be impressed by the apparent desire of friendliness by the people in the main, insofar as contacts are permitted. But we were cautioned by the best sources, including our newspaper friends, that we would get anyone in serious trouble which might result in the loss of a bread card or the sudden removal of that person to less desirable parts of the country, possibly to the salt mines, if we tried to cultivate unofficial contacts. The alarm with which anyone in Russia receives the visit of a foreigner is unmistakable and damning.

It is this cloak of complete isolation and secrecy, which is the essence of the whole system, that troubles me most. When we had to fly back to Hamburg from Stockholm, rather than go directly over the American occupied zone to Berlin to see our own occupying forces there, and were seriously warned that we might be shot down if we ventured off the marked route, we had an indication of what distrust the Russians had of our alliance. The plane that we were using had been cleared for going into Russia. But as usual, at the last minute no clearance was given and we had to go in General Eisenhower's Sunflower II, a nice plush job, but one that left us stranded in Russia when it took Ambassador Harriman back to the conference of foreign secretaries in London. The Russians insist that none but their own planes traverse any of the territory under their control. Everyone seems to be regarded as a potential spy in Russia. No doubt the struggle for power and control, with the purges that have been necessary to establish Stalin in an unchallenged position of leadership, have left their marks. But it is a system that breeds tough and ruthless masters who feel that they alone can guide the destinies of their own people, and for that matter, that they alone have the key to world organization. This is, of course, an impression, but after all it is well supported by the record.

The Russians are certainly a great and talented nation, though their past history and their present system have conditioned them to quite different ways of looking at things than our own. Those who wish to get on with Russia at all costs are always reminding us that the Russian people are friendly to the United States and that war with them is unthinkable. For that matter, we have been told the same thing before about others.

But it is the totalitarian system of Russia, really governed by a handful of zealots, that we must deal with and not the Russian people. Unless the controls of that system can be relaxed we can never know what is going on in Russia, and the first principles of an exchange of real human contacts are impossible.

Moreover, we were convinced, possibly above everything else, that the policy of appeasement toward Russia, which had been begun during the war by the Allies with the possible justification of bringing the European war to a speedy conclusion and bringing Russia into the war against Japan, must cease. In fact, in a recent conversation which I had the privilege of having with the former Prime Minister of Great Britain, Winston Churchill, I was convinced that there was ample justification for that policy by both Roosevelt and Churchill. But I am also convinced that Stalin and his advisers understand but one language and that is force. There is nothing that they appreciate more than power and strength. They came to power by force and have since maintained their power in that manner. It is difficult for the average Russian to understand, for instance, why America would expend so many lives of its soldiers and so much of its natural resources to win a war, without also profiting on the theory that to the victor belongs the spoils. It is hard to make them believe that America's only objective is world peace. That just does not make sense to the Russian mind.

On our way back from Moscow to London we visited with both the leaders of such countries as Greece, Egypt, and Iran and our own military and Embassy officials in those countries. It was in these countries that we received our greatest disappointment. In none of these little countries—or, in fact, nowhere on our trip—did we hear the United Nations Organization mentioned. On the contrary, we found a genuine fear and abiding apprehension in all of these countries that it was only a question of time when the soldiers of the Soviet Republic would move in upon them. In fact, we had scarcely left Iran when that happened. In view of this the question was raised in our minds as to whether anybody outside of the United States really took the UNO seriously.

Upon our return to London in a conference with Secretary of State Byrnes, who was then attending the ill-fated Conference of Ministers there, I took occasion to point out these conditions which we had found, and emphasized to him the necessity of stiffening our collective backbone in dealing with the Soviet Republic. Again, upon our return to Washington when our committee made an oral report to President Truman we respectfully urged the same conclusion.

The general attitude of Russia toward her late allies; her strong evidence of acquisition of additional territory; her overt efforts toward the political and economic domination of not only her satellites of the late war, but her apparent objective in the same acquisition or domination of other smaller countries; her secretive and closed-door policies, plus her continuous evidences of unwillingness to fully, cooperate in the United Nations Organization, have all added up to a question in the minds of many Americans and citizens of other countries as to whether war with Russia is inveitable.

Without attempting to speak as an expert on the policy of this new giant of Europe, it is our considered opinion that Russia is no more anxious for such a conflict than America or Britain. While it is true that there has been no demobilization to speak of in the Russian military forces such as has occurred in this country, and while it is also true that Stalin is calling for an ever-increasing and more efficient military establishment, it is equally true that the Soviet Republic is suffering from both the heavy economic and military losses sustained at the hands of the Germans. Her transportation system, never too good, must be greatly improved, if not largely rebuilt. Any ideas of grandiose world expansion and imperialism entertained by Stalin and his party advisers must of necessity be considered as a distant objective. There must be new 5-year plans, not only envisioned but realized, before such an ambitious program could well be undertaken. Certainly in the absence of the secret of the atomic bomb no nation would dare provoke such a conflict. And with equal logic, that and other military secrets should not be shared by us with any additional nations until an executive organization with real control has been perfected by UNO.

In the meantime, there is nothing to be lost from the Russian point of view by both a strong economic and political program which will bring about as much such "security" as possible, short of war.

It must be apparent to all nations that we in America covet but one thing in this aftermath of the global war—to the winning of which we contributed so substantially—a stable and perpetual world peace. Surely America cannot be expected to make gargantuan loans to Russia or any other nation without some definite and conclusive assurances that that objective will be realized. So long as Russia maintains the closed-door policy and denies us and other nations, through both the press and other vehicles for exchange of ideas, the knowledge of what is going on in that country even as they now have every opportunity to observe what is going on here, it is unthinkable that we should make substantial contributions in the way of additional financial assistance from our already overburdened Treasury.

The hope of the peoples of the world depends upon the ability of Russia and the United States to cooperate. We all want one world; not one enforced by a crusading system that forces others to live by its pattern, but one where all powers are prepared to live and let live. No people desire cooperation to the end of cessation of warfare among mankind, especially in this atomic age, more than do the American people. But it must always be remembered that cooperation is not a one-way street.

Safeguarding Our American Heritage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting an address by Mr. Fred Brenckman which he delivered July 28, 1950, before the National Granges of Bucks County, Pa., at Plumsteadville, Pa.:

SAFEGUARDING OUR AMERICAN HERITAGE

(By Fred Brenckman)

No other people in the history of the world ever possessed a heritage as rich and precious as ours. It was bequeathed to us by the brave and hardy spirits who carved this Nation out of the wilderness and who laid the foundations of its freedom and greatness. In days long past it was considered a great honor to be a Roman citizen, but I know that I am voicing the sentiments of every thinking person in this audience when I say that it is a still greater honor to be a citizen of the United States of America.

Today we are faced with the stern responsibility of protecting and preserving our heritage against aggression from the ruthless forces of international communism on the one hand and against the dangerous drift toward statism, which is gradually undermining our traditional institutions of Government here at home.

A month ago the alarm bells rang throughout the civilized world when the sudden and unprovoked attack on the defenseless Republic of Korea was launched. This little republic of eastern Asia was established under the auspices of the United Nations following World War II, and the United Nations agreed to protect it against aggression.

Nobody is simple enough to believe that the attack against South Korea was made by the Communists of North Korea, acting on their own initintive. It was Soviet Russia that organized and equipped the army of North Korea, and it is Soviet Russia that is directing the whole undertaking.

AMERICAN HELP FORGOTTEN

When Hitler invaded Russia in 1941, Russia called out loudly for help. She pleaded for the establishment of a second front. She needed tanks and guns and other war equipment to defend herself. After we were drawn into the conflict we furnished Russia with equipment and food valued at billions of dollars, most of which was sent by way of the North Cape and the Arctic Ocean, through waters infested with German submarines, and with German bombers pursuing our ships. Under such perilous conditions we gave Russia the help without which she could not have survived.

One might think that all this would be remembered by Russia with a sense of gratitude. But gratitude is a word that cannot be found in the lexicon of the Communists, who pride themselves on deceit, treachery, and double dealing.

As soon as the shooting in the European theater of war had stopped, Stalin issued a public statement in which he spoke sneeringly about the capitalistic countries, and from that day to this Russia has thrown every impediment in the way of the establishment of peace. She has kept her own army on a war footing and has exerted every effort to increase her fighting strength, as well as arming her satellites, for the sole purpose of subduing the free nations of the world.

This is the situation with which the United States and the other free nations of the world are confronted today. Nothing is to be gained by ignoring it. The only argument that Russia respects is force, and the only safe thing to do is prepare to defend ourselves.

When the order of the United Nations to cease firing in Korea was ignored, we undertook, almost alone, to halt the drive of the Red army of North Korea. Lacking time to mobilize our manpower and equipment, we have encountered serious difficulties, from which we hope to extricate ourselves in due time.

Nevertheless, it was our duty to intervene in Korea. The League of Nations signed its own death warrant when it did nothing to stop Japanese aggression in Manchuria, or to halt Mussolini's attack on Ethiopia. To have done nothing about the invasion of Korea would have meant the death of the United Nations. But if the United Nations is to be anything more than a name or an international debating society, the United States alone should not be expected to carry all its duties and responsibilities.

ON THE HOME FRONT

But while we are making such great exertions and sacrifices to restore and maintain peace throughout the rest of the world, we must do all in our power to preserve the American heritage of freedom here at home.

Let us not forget that ours is not only a government of and for the people, but by the people. We will elect a new Congress this year, with one-third of the Members of the Senate to be chosen, too, together with State officials. Here in Pennsylvania a new Governor will be elected.

As the Pennsylvania State Grange said in a resolution adopted at our last annual meeting, it is both the right and the duty of every qualified elector to go to the polls and cast an honest ballot at primary and general elections. Slackerism at the polls has frequently reached scandalous proportions, with little more than half of the voters participating even in Presidential elections.

As the Grange resolution on this subject set forth, such a situation is a reproach to the civic virtue and intelligence of the people, frequently making it possible for well-organized minorities to elect to public office those who are pledged to serve some special interest or group, regardless of the general welfare. When that happens those who have disfranchised themselves by staying away from the polls have only themselves to blame when the wrong kind of people are elected to public office.

Roughly speaking, there were more than 93,000,000 potential voters in the United States in 1948. The actual vote cast for President was only 48,834,000. In other words, only a little more than 52 percent of the qualified electors took the trouble to vote. The number of stay-at-home voters aggregated about 44,000,000, a figure exceeding by about 13,000,000 the total population of the United States at the time of the Civil War.

The United States has the distinction of being the first country to establish manhood suffrage, and there was a time when the right to vote was more highly prized than it is today, which is to be deeply regretted. Is there not justification for saying that the future of democracy cannot be regarded with too much confidence when those who were once ready to die for the privilege of voting must be driven to the polls against their will?

Let us not forget that those who vote belong to the governing class, while those who fail to vote belong to the class that is governed. If that truth can be firmly driven home, perhaps we will have a smaller percentage of stay-at-home voters in the future.

THE DRIFT TOWARD STATISM

One of the most disquieting tendencies in our national life is the rapid drift toward statism or overcentralization of government. If our American heritage of freedom is to be preserved this tendency must be halted. It should be clearly kept in mind that there are two sovereignties in this country, the sovereignty of the Nation, and the sovereignty of the States. It was not the intention of the founding fathers of the Republic that the Federal Government should meddle in any unwarranted degree in the affairs of the States and their minor subdivisions.

If it had been otherwise, the Constitution of the United States could not have been adopted, because the people of that time were passionately attached to the freedoms and blessing that flow from local self-government.

It is often pleaded in attempting to justify the tendency toward centralization which has been so strongly in evidence during recent years that, with our improved facilities of transportation and communication, State lines and State rights no longer have any particular significance and should, therefore, be disregarded, leaving it to the Federal Government to look after things in a big way in the interest of greater efficiency.

A DELUSIVE DOCTRINE

This is both a delusive and a destructive doctrine. While it is true that science and invention have annihilated time and space, human nature is still the same as it was 160 years ago, or a thousand years, for that matter, and it is fatal to the workings of our free institutions to make the governmental unit so large as to destroy the local and individual sense of responsibility. This is particularly true in the expenditure of public moneys.

This Nation, with its wide domain, its diversified interests, and its teeming population, is too great to be wisely and democratically governed, down to the most minute details affecting the daily lives of the people, from the seat of the Federal Government at Washington.

Let us not forget that there is only one way in which the powers of the Federal Government can be expanded, and that is by contracting or restricting in a corresponding degree the rights of the States and of the individual. Woodrow Wilson gave utterance to a profound truth when he declared:

"The history of liberty is the history of the limitation of governmental power, not the increase of it. When we resist the concentration of power we are resisting the processes of death, because concentration of power is what always precedes the destruction of human liberties."

The Pennsylvania State Grange has always believed that we will get the best results if each unit of government, national, State, and local, will stay within its proper sphere, with each unit faithfully performing the duties and functions devolving upon it, and with none encroaching on the rights and prerogatives of the rest.

It is certainly true that in the same proportion that we deprive the people of the right of participation in the affairs of government, they lose all knowledge of government. Nothing could be more fatal to popular rule than that.

THE BRANNAN FARM PLAN

A good illustration of the drift toward overcentralization of government is the farm plan advocated by Secretary of Agriculture Brannan, which has the support of the President of the United States. Less than 20 years ago, no person holding a position of responsibility in our public life would have dared to bring forward such a plan, the adoption of which would be the longest step in the direction of state socialism that this country ever took.

Briefly stated, under the Brannan plan prices of most farm commodities would be allowed to find their own level in the market place, promising cheap food for the consumer, while the farmer would be guaranteed a good income through the use of Federal subsidies. But the farmer would be subjected to the strictest regimentation. To all practical intents and purposes he would become a mere ward of the state, and he would be subject to fines and jail sentences for violations of certain provisions of the act. The money needed to pay subsidies and to meet the heavy costs of administration would naturally have to be raised by taxation, placing heavy burdens on both the producer and the consumer.

While it is proper for the Government to assist agriculture in the solution of the manifold problems with which it is continually confronted, the grange and all the other national farm organizations of the country, with a single exception, are opposed to the adoption of the Brannan plan.

If we want to preserve our American heritage of freedom, we cannot afford to experiment with such crudely socialistic theories as that. There is only one plan under which any government can long endure. That is when the people support the Government. Any attempt to reverse this fundamental process, asking the government to support the people, cannot fail to result in disaster.

It was Patrick Henry, the flaming orator of the Revolution, who laid down the dictum:

"No free government, or the blessings of liberty, can be preserved to any people, but by a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, frugality, and virtue, and by a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles."

California Water Project Makes Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CECIL F. WHITE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Speaker, the records of the Department of Agriculture show that the San Joaquin Valley is the richest farming area of its size in the United States. However, this great farming area has been plagued with a serious water shortage during the last decade. The Department of the Interior long ago recognized the existence of this devastating water shortage and they accordingly conceived what is known as the Central Valley project, to bring water to the San Joaquin Valley from the Sacramento Valley to the north, where a water surplus exists.

The building of this great water project has been fraught with many difficulties over the years. Those of us who have fought for it have been up against what is perhaps the greatest and strongest lobby in this Nation, the private power trust and the Army engineers.

It is, therefore, with great pride, Mr. Speaker, that I insert in the RECORD today following my remarks, a news release from the Orange Cove irrigation district, one of the irrigation districts in my congressional district, outlining the great progress and accomplishments in the Orange Cove irrigation district, a part of the Central Valley water project.

Mr. Speaker, I hope when the appropriation bills come before this Congress for the continued work on the Central Valley project that the Members of this great body will recall this splendid report on the Orange Cove irrigation district and will vote generous appropriations to carry on this great project, which means so much to the supply of food and fibre for our country, not only in this wartime era, but in the normal peacetime era as well.

ORANGE COVE IRRIGATION DISTRICT NEWS RELEASE

Officials of the Orange Cove irrigation district today announced the completion of another pipeline unit of their water-distribution system. This unit, the fifth to be placed in operation this season, will service approximately 900 acres. Upon completion of a sixth unit now scheduled to start functioning soon, the total district acreage receiving water from the Friant-Kern canal will be approximately 7,000 acres.

Members of the board of directors point out that a year ago the Orange Cove irrigation district had no distribution system of any kind. They also note that water conditions in this area along the eastern edge of the San Joaquin Valley have been becoming steadily worse during the current dry period of years. The water made available to the district from the Friant-Kern canal has meant the difference between failure due to lack of water and a successful operation to many farmers.

During the 1949 season water was available only from July 10 until September 10, but during this period feverish efforts were made to utilize as much water as possible. Many owners reported that the water delivery beginning in mid-July came when their ground-water supplies had become insufficient to mature their crops.

The 1950 water season has been marked by a great increase in the amount of water diverted by the district. While water was available earlier, district users did not take delivery of water until early May and the demand increased until the maximum was reached in mid-July. While the current season is expected to end on September 1, the supply during May, June, July, and August has done much to alleviate the extreme water shortage. It is hoped that the cessation of ground-water pumping by the users of Central Valley project water will result in better pumping conditions for other water users in the district.

The Orange Cove irrigation district contains 25,450 acres of which approximately 8,300 acres lie in the zone above the Friant-Kern Canal. Of this land up hill from the canal, about 1,300 acres are now taking water through a series of concrete pipelines.

Construction costs have been held very low through the use of local equipment and facilities as far as possible. Contracts for pipe work have been let on the basis of competitive bidding among the pipe manufacturers in the area. The pipe systems are of low-head, nonreinforced concrete irrigation pipe which is used in conjunction with series of low-lift pumps. In this manner the water pressure on this type of pipe is held within allowable limits.

Operations have been surprisingly smooth in spite of the fact that economy dictated the elimination of costly automatic controls. In approximately 2 hours per day, one water tender has been able to regulate two pipe systems, each involving a total lift of approximately 85 feet through 2½ miles of pipelines with a total of 11 pumps at 9 lift stations.

In some cases where immediate water delivery was necessary to prevent crop losses, landowners agreed to allow temporary open ditches to be run through plantings and natural-drainage channels. These ditches have been relatively inexpensive to construct and have already paid for themselves many times over. In every instance the thought has been, let's cooperate and get the water where it is needed.

Completion of these units climaxes a year of planning. Beginning in July 1949, informal public meetings of landowners in the various areas were begun with the purpose of exploring the possibilities for systems which could be placed in early operation and financed locally. At these meetings, which were held at the Navelencia School, the irrigation district office, and the East Orosi School, committees of landowners were appointed to work on plans in conjunction with the district's engineer-manager. As definite plans were developed and proposed, additional meetings were held, at which landowners were free to express their wishes. Where improvement districts were desirable, the irrigation district prepared the necessary legal forms and assisted the landowners' committees wherever possible. Up to the present time, all costs have been met by voluntary assessments plus a small amount of warrants sold to local landowners. Following approval of plans and advance deposit of funds, bids were prepared and the jobs were started under contracts. The irrigation district's engineer-manager also directed the design and construction of the systems and all collections and disbursements were made through the district office.

As the systems and installations have been completed, many landowners have made immediate use of the water supply. Some have used the water to save permanent crops or to shift from single to double cropping on open lands, while others have preirrigated grain lands. Grain growers have reported as much as twice the yields from preirrigation as from their former dry-farming operations.

Most of the area in the Orange Cove irrigation district was formerly intensely developed, and it may be expected that with an adequate supply of water available, the area will return to its former high standing in the diversified-farming picture. The early maturing dates of crops in this area have been recognized and considerable emphasis is expected on garden and field crops:

The board of directors of the Orange Cove irrigation district is composed of M. N. Jensen, president; Harvey S. Chase; Fred H. Bear; Oscar Orlopp; and John Hudson. The district's engineer-manager is J. F. Sorenson, and the secretary-assessor-collector is A. J. Vortmann.

Unpreparedness for Korea Should Be Investigated

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I am inserting an article which recently appeared in the Buffalo Evening News of July 25, 1950:

UNPREPAREDNESS FOR KOREA SHOULD BE INVESTIGATED

(By David Lawrence)

WASHINGTON, July 25.—General MacArthur has dissassociated himself from responsibility for the defense of Korea prior to the aggression by the North Koreans.

This step is significant because it means that some day Congress will have to place the blame elsewhere for the failure of adequate United States forces to be in the far-eastern area. The exact words of General MacArthur are to be found in a message telegraphed to President Truman last week. The pertinent paragraph about responsibility for the unpreparedness of America in the Far East said:

"I do not believe that history records a comparable operation which excelled the speed and precision with which the Eighth Army, the Far East Air Force, and the Seventh Fleet have been deployed to a distant land for immediate commitment to major operations.

"This finds added emphasis in the fact that the Far East Command, until the President's great pronouncement to support the epochal action of the United Nations, had no responsibility for the defense of the Free Republic of Korea. With the President's decision, it assumed a completely new and added mission."

The foregoing second paragraph quoted could not have been inserted by the general without purpose. Whatever the reason, General MacArthur's statement opens up a new avenue of discussion. For if the Far Eastern Command wasn't responsible for military contingencies that might arise in Korea, who was responsible?

There was a time when weeks ahead of a crisis—the moment the newspapers began making mention of any possible trouble in areas where American interests were not far away—the Secretary of the Navy would walk over to the Secretary of State and ask if there would be any objection to sending a cruiser or a battleship to patrol somewhere near the area where there might be danger of friction.

Nowadays, however, under unification, the procedure is far more complicated and clumsy. The Secretary of the Navy doesn't go direct to the Secretary of State at all. He has to lay such a matter before the joint Chiefs of Staff. After they find out how much money the Secretary of Defense will allot to them, the chiefs have to decide what ships the Navy shall or shall not have in commission.

The matter of what areas shall or shall not be defended has to go before the National Security Council. It takes a persistent Secretary of the Navy to get anywhere. By this time the whole problem can be lost in a maze of red tape and complex unification machinery. In this instance nothing at all was done. Everybody's business was evidently nobody's business.

The question of why adequate naval forces and marines to handle a mission in Korea were not on hand either in the Philippines or at bases in Okinawa or even in waters near Japan is one that should soon be answered by a nonpartisan board of inquiry. Such an investigation is essential if America is to develop a system of command—civilian and military—which will be prepared for contingencies that can arise in fulfilling the new American responsibility of policing the seven seas.

Either new legislation or a sharper delineation of responsibility for command areas is needed to protect American interests against sudden outbreaks of aggression.

Let's Help People Quit Being Reds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FREDERIC R. COUDERT, JR.
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article by Mr. Morris Ernst, a distinguished New York lawyer, who has long studied the problem to which the article deals. He makes original and constructive suggestions that are well worth reading:

LET'S HELP PEOPLE QUIT BEING REDS

(By Morris Ernst)

An attractive, soft-spoken young scientist sat in my office recently and told me a story I had heard from half a dozen other young men during the previous year. His story began when he was in college. He had joined the Communist Party.

After graduation, he applied for a job. wherever he looked for work, whether with the United States Government or with one of the large corporations, he found on the application blank the inevitable question: "Have you ever been a member of the Communist Party?"

With its usual determination to leave as little as possible to the judgment and conscience of the individual, the Communist Party already had instructed him how to answer such a question. Ordinary standards of truth are unimportant in underground movements. The party's instructions to the young scientist were to answer the question "No."

My client told me, as the others had, that as soon as he wrote the word "No" on the application, he knew he was a prisoner for life. He knew that if he ever tried to leave the Communist Party, the party itself would send annonymous communications to his employer giving him information to prove that the scientist had been a member of the Communist Party at the time he had filled in his application.

Like thousands of others, this young man today is trapped. He is no longer in sympathy with Communist aims or methods. He would like to get out. But how can he? Would not he lose his job and be unable to get another? Wouldn't he be ostracized by all decent people?

MANY JOINED PARTY WHEN YOUNG, NOW KNOW BETTER

The predicament of the young scientist points up the stupidity of the way we have been handling communism to date. Our whole policy has been to ostracize and persecute and, in short, to drive the Communists underground. We have recognized the danger of communism and spent millions of dollars through Government and private agencies to come to grips with the movement. But the effects have been almost negligible. Communism today still thrives.

It is time for us to adopt new techniques, and start afresh with a new plan of action.

POSITIVE PROGRAM NEEDED

Our biggest objective in the future should be to drive the Communist Party out into the open. Some people have urged that we outlaw the party. But that would accomplish nothing; its members would simply bob up with a party bearing a different name. What we need is a positive program.

One of the best ways to start such a program would be to help young Communists quit the party. The blow to the movement would be tremendous. After a number of people like the young scientist had come to me with a similar problem, I talked with some former Communist leaders whom I now trust. I came to the conclusion that one-third to one-half of the people in the Communist Party under 30 years of age would get out if they knew where to go.

Many of the party's members are people who joined in their late teens or early twenties. Unlike the Democrats and Republicans, the Communists recognize that youngsters are aware of political and economic problems long before their twenty-first birthdays. And in many cases, the young people who succumb to the Communist appeal do so out of fundamentally decent motives.

This is vividly illustrated in the recently published book, the God That Failed, in which well-known people tell why they joined or worked for the Communist Party and why they left it.

The party appealed to Andre Gide, for instance, because he hated poverty, though he himself was not poor; Richard Wright became a member because of his genuine desire to help other colored people; Ignazio Silone embraced communism from a desire for pure Christianity.

But only part of the attraction of communism for young people can be attributed to its appeal to altruism. Adolescence at best is a period of uncertainty and insecurity. For those whose emotional background makes them fear the transition from protected childhood to responsible maturity, the Communist Party offers the warm safety of an intellectual womb. The movement fills up the lives of its people. It creates in the minds of its members a kind of dedication, a sense of belonging.

WHY MANY WANT TO QUIT

If we understand why people—especially young people—join the Communist Party, we can also see why so many want to get out.

Those who join for altruistic motives generally find that the same desires force them to break with the party. Thus, Gide was disillusioned after a trip to Russia. He realized that the existence of squalor side by side with wealth, which offended him in capitalistic countries, had been carried over into Communist society. The only change was in the personnel of the privileged classes. Wright broke away when he discovered that the Communists had no real concern for the problem of the Negro. Silone, seeking a more truly Christian society, was alienated by the Communists' ruthless disregard for principles of ethics and decency.

Similarly, those whose emotional instability leads them into communism do not always remain in a perpetual state of psychological adolescence. Maturity brings to many the willingness and ability to think and act as responsible, independent people. They find that they no longer need the crutch of communism. They begin to appraise the party, its aims and its methods, and find it wanting.

OSTRACISM HELPS REDS

Yet our attitude of ostracism merely plays into the hands of the Communists by keeping such people in the party even when they are ready to quit it and rejoin decent society.

To give these people a new chance, I propose that employers and labor unions get together to set up a special employment office. To run the office, one of J. Edgar Hoover's top screening officials should be hired on some kind of leave-of-absence basis. It could then be announced that people under 30 years old who are in the Communist Party and want to get out and get jobs as decent Americans could apply to that employment office.

To be sure, the party would try to plant some continuing Communists as applicants. There unquestionably would be some danger in that. But obviously we are facing greater danger if we continue with our present stupid strategies. Above all, we must have faith that we will be smart enough to catch the spies that the Communist Party will plant.

In any case, the office could not be used as a means to get Communists into strategic jobs. Under my plan, it would refer applicants only to nonsensitive jobs in private industry. Employment opportunities would still be plentiful, for 95 percent of our jobs don't concern national security. At the same time, the employer and the trade-union would be aware of the previous record of the applicant. I don't advocate secrecy, but the public's tendency to ostracize ex-Communists will probably require that applicants remain unidentified.

I am quite persuaded that such an operation, even conducted on a small scale to start with, at a cost of maybe $50,000 a year, would bear immediate fruit. Above all, it would throw consternation into the Communist ranks.

But more methods than that are needed to combat communism. If we agree that the best thing is to bring it into the open, there is one method that would really hurt.

PARTY HAS MANY FRONTS

As most people know, the Communist Party is not just an ordinary political party. In most States, it is not a political party at all and is not on the ballot. Its main effort, therefore, has been to sell ideas in the market place through innumerable front organizations. These are the organizations that express themselves in favor of decency and democracy, and generally sound good on the surface. In reality, of course, they merely serve the purposes of the Communists by creating confusion between what is progressive and what is communistic. So clever have they been that even eminent Americans like Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt and Henry Stimson, among others, have been tricked into letting their names be used by such organizations.

TO BEAT REDS, WE MUST EXPOSE, NOT SUPPRESS, THEM

To help beat the Communists, therefore, we need a plan to hit them here too. We should establish a reporting service on the lines of Dun & Bradstreet, the well-known business research organization. I should imagine it would not be difficult to get 50 Americans to contribute $500 apiece to set up such a service on a nonprofit basis. At most, there are only some 500 organizations that would have to be investigated. When files on these are complete, the current expense of examining new organizations would be small. To meet costs, a nominal fee could be charged.

How would the service work?

When a request for information came in, a full report would be made on the facts. The report would give information as to names of officials, directors, and other personnel of the group inquired about. It would give a brief history of the work done. And it would indicate whether or not the particular group published financial statements.

HOW REDS SPEND FUNDS

Whether or not financial statements are published should be of particular interest. The Communists, for instance, raised a million dollars for the Scottsboro case and spent only $60,000. What happened to the rest? More recently, the Communist Party has been planning to raise $2,000,000 for the appeal and defense of the 11 convicted Communist leaders. Of that amount, it is expected they will spend under $200,000 for such legal expenses.

The reporting service would draw no conclusions, however, about a suspect organization. It would not even, as Dun & Bradstreet does, offer a rating of the group. And it would not advise an inquirer whether or not he should support a particular organization. The function of the service would be to report all the information without screening. But it would, as the FBI does at times, appraise the trustworthiness of an anonymous source.

In brief, the service I have in mind would not be unlike the National Information Bureau, which provides information on charities. The NIB was set up some years ago because of the need for similar caution in the philanthropic fields. Now a prospective donor who does not have the time or the resources to make a personal investigation can get a full report on any charitable or educational group in which he is interested.

Similar reporting agencies, on a smaller scale, have already been established in a few other fields. For instance, Jewish groups and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People have been keeping complete files on anti-Semitic and anti-Negro organizations.

But there is no reporting agency to which inquirers may turn when they are approached to give money or support to, say, the Civil Rights Congress. Many people, I am sure, have given contributions to that organization under the impression that they were dealing with the thoroughly loyal American Civil Liberties Union. With a reporting bureau like the one I suggest, mistaken support of front organizations would be held to a minimum.

OTHER METHODS NEEDED

Such, then, are two effective ways we might begin the new campaign against communism we urgently need to undertake.

Other methods must also be worked out. But we should never forget the basic principle that the best weapons against deceit and stealth are full knowledge and disclosure, not suppression.

If we use them in every way possible against communism we will achieve what we have failed to do by ostracism and persecution.

In the light of day, decency and democracy will win out.

Authorization for Additional $5,000,000 Should Not Be Approved at This Time

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. REES
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the legislation providing for the authorization of a $5,000,000 so-called disaster fund. This is a fund that will be placed under the control of the President and to be used when he and his representatives feel it should be expended in the event of disaster. Of course it does not apply to military disasters, but to disasters of various kinds.

I would not be misunderstood. I am in favor of the Federal Government rendering such assistance as it should in the event of tornadoes, floods, and other kinds of disasters that come to the people of this country. It should share in taking care of damages resulting from destruction of property and the need for helping to take care of the expenses to alleviate human suffering.

This is a matter that Congress has always taken care of in a generous way since our country began. Whenever there were disasters where Congress believed assistance should be granted liberal contributions have always been made. Not in any case have such requests been turned down. The Federal Government through Congress has worked with the Red Cross and other agencies in taking care of these expenses.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation in substance provides a fund so that a group of people may make application to the President whenever an alleged disaster occurs, and it will be then for the President and not Congress to decide if and when such funds should be used. This is putting too much power in the hands of one man. Furthermore, it extends invitations to groups to make application for the use of funds to a Federal agency in place of submitting the request direct to Congress, where the question of allocation of funds can at least be examined.

Mr. Speaker, these are abnormal times. They are serious times. They are times when we should be extremely careful with regard to the expenditures and allocation of taxpayers' funds. I think it is for the best interests of our country not to adopt this legislation. We do not have any demands for the use of funds presently before us. When such requests are made, we can take care of them on their merits as presented.

Federal Assistance to States and Local Governments in Major Disasters

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH B. KEATING

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, facing as we do, necessary expenditures of stupendous magnitude to insure our survival, it seems to me that this is an ill-advised moment to bring before us a bill to set up this entirely new method of spending Federal funds. True, the limitation on the authorization here is $5,000,000, but it is the foot in the door. Next year, effort is likely to be made to double it, and the year after, to double it again. Soon it may be fifty million, and soon thereafter, one hundred million.

No one would quarrel with the proposition that in cases of extreme and sudden hardship, where local authorities are not able to cope with a disaster, the Congress should help out with the use of Federal funds. We have frequently done that, for instance in the case of the unprecedented storms in the West last winter. The Congress will do it again when disaster strikes and there is no other way of meeting it. But let us face each such situation as it arises. Let us not abdicate our responsibility and turn over a blank check to the President. The Congress has been all too ready in the past to follow that course. Now, more than ever, we need to husband our Federal resources and scrutinize with a critical eye the many requests for Federal assistance for this, that, or the other worthy project.

Under this bill, as now worded, the President alone, in his sole and absolute discretion, determines what shall constitute a major disaster to justify him in sending funds to a local community. Only two requirements are laid down. One is that the governor of a State must ask for the money and certify that it is needed. Two, the governor must give assurances that either the State or a local subdivision is going to spend "a reasonable amount" of its own funds to match the funds that come from the Federal Government. Now experience would dictate that we cannot rely upon the governors of the various States to exercise prudence or conservatism in asking for Federal funds. Nor does it seem to me consonant with our responsibility to leave with them to determine what is "a reasonable amount" for their State, in each instance, to contribute. Very naturally, they are going to try to get all the Federal money they can in order to relieve their State treasuries. This is intended as no criticism of them. It is simply an unquestioned fact which it is completely unrealistic not to face. It is our responsibility, not theirs, to protect the Federal purse.

It seems to me that inadequate consideration has been given to the possible implications of this legislation. Let us suppose there is a big fire in some community. While serious and disastrous, it is the type of catastrophe which has always in the past been handled by local authorities, possibly aided by the State, and by such private agencies as the Red Cross. If this bill passes, where will the people at once turn? If precedent can be relied upon, they will turn to the Federal Government. Multiply that situation many times all over the country in the case of flood, drought, fire, hurricane, storm, and other catastrophes and you have some conception of what this legislation might eventually entail. It is an open invitation to come to the Federal Government to solve what is essentially and primarily, in each instance, a local problem.

Then the next thing we will face will be that the Federal Government will say that it needs to have some supervision over the local agencies which are intended to control and prevent the occurrence of such disasters. That will be an excuse to set up another huge bureau in Washington to provide Federal stanards for fire and police protection and other preventive agencies throughout the country. The argument will be made with some plausibility that such action is necessary, to prevent the Federal expenditures from getting out of hand.

If we are going to retain the home rule principle of having local problems solved in each community, with recourse to the Federal Government only in extreme and individual cases, we should try to nip such proposals as this in the bud, before they flower into another gigantic Federal give-away program.

The President, each year, is given a large discretionary fund intended to meet just such situations as are envisioned in this legislation. This is simply, in effect, an effort to boost those funds by $5,000,000, without any showing of need. No community which can show to the Congress that it cannot meet a great disaster, need have any fear that the Congress will not respond promptly and generously. But the people look to us to pass upon such situations. They do not expect us to turn over money to the President to be passed out without any strings attached to it and with no adequate safeguards in the way of standards.

The very least that we should do is to recommit this bill and provide that the Congress, as well as the President, shall have a say in determining when a major disaster requires the expenditure of Federal funds. In my judgment, the passage of this measure without such protection as a very minimum, would represent a surrender of legislative responsibility.

Mobilization Production Board

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 1, 1950

Mr. JAVITS, Mr. Speaker, the appended editorial from the New York Herald Tribune bears out my contention that a central operating agency like the War Production Board of World War II is essential if we are really to do the job the present situation requires. This is the agency to be established under my bill, House Joint Resolution 511:

TOO MANY COOKS

Congress is coming to grips with the problem of deciding what kinds of control are needed to mobilize the economy, but it is paying too little attention to deciding where the power to exercise the controls should be assigned. Controls will not work automatically, they will have to be administered. When power to wield them is divided, the results inevitably include vague assignment of power among agencies, overlapping authority and blind spots in the control program. These weaknesses lead to interagency feuding, to lack of uniformity in control standards and to a shopping for favors by the economic groups under control. The harmful effects on the mobilization effort require no imagination to predict. Our experience in two world wars provides the answers: unnecessary bottlenecks in production, delays in the switch-over of men, materials and facilities from peace to war goods and profiteering which a single control authority could reduce.

The case against divided authority is so indisputable that the President's position on the question gives cause for serious concern. He has expressed his intention to have the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce and Interior supervise the allocation and priority powers requested in his message to Congress on economic mobilization. He has failed to designate any single authority to synchronize the mobilization program, whether it be limited or all-out. Although the National Security Resources Board is specifically charged with responsibility for designing a coordinated plan, Mr. Truman has not indicated any intention to call upon the board to perform the operating function.

The President appears to believe that a partial mobilization does not require single, coordinated execution. This is surely a mistaken view. Even the partial program would require synchronization of controls over industrial production with controls over credit and with manpower activities. If separate agencies operate in these fields or, worse still several agencies within a single field, hope for effective coordination may as well be given up; partial mobilization will be a failure.

We must be prepared to go to full mobilization in any case. How much more effectively we could accomplish it if we had already set up the single authority, made a good start on the coordination of all controls in use and avoided the conflicts, wastes, and production lags that inevitably accompany divided authority. The President has done a careful job in designing an industrial and taxation program that offers the chance of success. To improve that chance and to prepare for the contingency of full mobilization, we believe he should turn to the National Security Resources Board for the task of control execution. If any doubt exists as to the Board's legal mandate, Congress should be called upon to clarify it, giving the Board clear operating power for the coordination of all elements in the mobilization effort.

Controls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 1, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I commend to the attention of my colleagues the following editorials which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune and the New York Times on August 4, 1950:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of August 4, 1950]

GET ON WITH CONTROLS

While Washington engages in uncoordinated debate over economic controls, prices continue to climb. Public sentiment is mobilized to fight inflation, but Congress is not. It is understandable that Congressmen should be confused by the plethora of anti-inflation proposals coming from every quarter, but unless Congress gets on with the job of legislation, the toll of rampant inflation will be inexcusably high. The need of the moment is an order of priority for the anti-inflation and mobilization measures that have been thrown into the hopper.

First place on the agenda should be given to the increase in taxes requested by the President and approved by most Members of Congress. An increase of $5,000,000,000 is the minimum amount that offers any chance of safety. Unless the tax boost is effected without delay, there will be no point in debating partial economic controls; full controls will be necessary. In the absence of adequate taxation now, even full controls could not repair the inflationary damage that would be wrought by uncurbed purchasing power.

Immediately following the tax boost should come the passage of the limited economic controls set out in the President's message of June 19. Defense production must be stepped up and must flow without hindrance. Authority is needed to limit nonessential uses of scarce materials, to allocate them, to assure priority for military equipment, to requisition facilities where needed, and to curb inventory hoarding. Certainly, too, power to encourage military output should be added to the power to cut back nonessentials. Credit restrictions on consumer purchases, on private mortgages, and on commodity dealings are overdue. This is the skeleton kit of economic powers needed to expedite production and reinforce the tax brake on inflation.

Next should come passage of a bill giving the President stand-by authority to wield full economic controls and assigning him the responsibility to decide when they should be invoked. Any attempt to substitute a mechanical formula for the responsibility of the Chief Executive should be resisted. We are not content to wait for full controls until prices have risen another 7 or 10 percent; we want them before that much damage is done.

If full controls should be needed, they must be ready. Plans to fix prices and wages and to ration consumer goods should be completely blueprinted. Congress should state its intention that if the President invokes any of them, he invoke all of them. To fix prices without freezing wages, or vice versa, would be farcical, and to adopt price fixing without rationing would be no less so. Moreover, the interconnection between prices and wages should be extended (though not necessarily in the same bill) by a link with profits. An excess-profits tax, applicable no later than the fourth quarter of 1950, is urgently needed whether or not wages and prices have to be controlled. Fair treatment of taxpayers demands it, and so does the campaign against inflation and profiteering.

There would be no objection to coupling partial controls with fuller stand-by controls if the legislation could be approved quickly. It seems likely, however, that both could be speeded if they were separated. Neither should be delayed. The limited controls are necessary to meet the situation we are in. The stand-by powers have a double function. They provide insurance against being caught short if partial controls fail; and since they would incorporate authority to roll prices back, they would take much of the temptation out of present hoarding and speculation, thus helping to give partial controls a chance to be effective.

[From the New York Times of August 4, 1950]

HYSTERIA ON CAPITOL HILL

The House voted tentatively yesterday to go far beyond providing the President with stand-by controls over prices and wages in case of serious rearmament inflation. It passed by a voice vote an amendment to the pending Defense Production Act which would invoke such controls automatically when and if the Government's cost-of-living index reached a level 5 percent higher than that prevailing on June 15.

The fact that the House could approve such a proposal even tentatively reflects a lack of understanding of the problem before it and of the possible consequences of its action that are gravely disturbing. Only a few short weeks ago this same Congress was making plans for a sweeping reduction in excise taxes, although the Federal Government was then running in the red at a rate of more than $5,000,000,000 a year. This newspaper and many others warned more than once in recent months that the time was at hand to consider a reversal of the inflationary fiscal and monetary policies then being pursued; but until the Korean invasion such warnings fell for the most part on deaf ears.

Then the administration, acting with commendable intelligence and speed, moved toward disinflation with the Defense Production Act and a request for an increase of $5,000,000,000 in taxes. And now Congress, suddenly aroused from a deep slumber by the flurry of scare buying which has followed the outbreak of Korean hostilities, has given way to hysteria. Before a single one of the anti-inflation weapons proposed by the administration has even been tested, it is demanding that the country be plunged into the kind of regimented economy that would require a police state to enforce it. .

To propose a complete freeze of the domestic economy at this time, declared Leon H. Keyserling, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, would be fantastic. "For the next year," he added, "you'd do nothing else but throw out 90 percent of what you froze." The first mobilization task, declared the President's chief economic adviser, "is to figure out what your top problems are, and then clear them up. Those top problems are mandatory allocations of scarce materials, credit controls, and higher taxes."

Whatever may be said for an all-out freeze of the economy when war, as in 1942–45, was the almost exclusive business of the United States, and when the Government was running an average deficit of more than $54,000,000,000 a year, it is plain economic quackery to suggest that the same prescription is indicated when only 10 percent of the Nation's product is marked for defense, and when the administration has made it clear that it means to finance the defense effort on a pay-as-you-go basis.

Dr. Stanley Hornbeck

OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by George Sokolsky. The quotations from Stanley Hornbeck are deserving of the closest study. What a tough break for boys dying in Korea as a result of our Government's miscalculations that it was deprived after 1944 of the counsel of the real expert on Asia, through the successful efforts of the Acheson-Hiss crowd which drove him, along with Berle and others, out of the Department:

THESE DAYS

(By George Sokolsky)

Dr. Stanley Hornbeck used to be chief of the far eastern division of the State Department (1928–37). From 1937 to 1944, he was adviser on political relations of the State Department. Then he was kicked out to make room for the Alger Hiss crowd. He was made our Ambassador to the Netherlands, and then retired.

Hornbeck has been the leading far eastern expert of the United States since he went to the Versailles conference in 1918.

Those most familiar with China, Japan, Korea, the Philippines and such countries realize that Hornbeck's specialized knowledge is extensive, intimate, and important.

At the annual meeting of the American Society of International Law last April, Dr. Hornbeck delivered an address which has just become available to me, in which appears the following:

"The United States withheld recognition of the Soviet Government until a new administration here had become convinced that that government met most of the standard tests of what constitutes a recognizable government and that it would be reasonable and advantageous to accord it recognition.

"Then we laid down conditions; we asked and we were given pledges, and, even at that, we were deceived. The Russian Soviet Government has disregarded both its general legal obligations and its particular pledges, including those made then to us and those made before and since to us and to other countries.

"There is little if any warrant for an expectation that, with or without recognition and with or without pledges, the performance of the Communist regime in China will differ very greatly from the performance of the Communist regimes in Russia and in other Communist countries.

"All Communists are committed to the destruction of persons and peoples, institutions and agencies which stand in the way of world domination by communism. The Chinese Communists, whether they are or are not controlled by the Kremlin, are allies of the Kremlin. They imitate the Russian Soviet system, they use its methods and they follow the made-in-Moscow party line."

The particular purpose of Dr. Hornbeck's address was to discuss the recognition of Soviet China by the United States and the United Nations. Despite the war in Korea, this is not an academic question. Nehru, of India, is pushing Soviet Russia's demands for such recognition. Nehru is naturally scared of Russia which, moving out of China, Afghanistan, and Mongolia, can overrun Pakistan and India as Ghengis Khan did.

Nehru hopes that by playing the role of the honest broker, he might save India and even enhance its influence in international affairs. This has never succeeded with Soviet Russia. The best known example of the destroyed middleman is, of course, Jan Masaryk. It is generally forgotten that at the beginning of his career, Chiang Kai-shek played exactly that role in China.

Hornbeck brings this matter to a head in the following references:

"The Chinese Communist regime demands that it be admitted (in the United Nations) and the representation of the National Government be expelled. The Soviet Union supports those demands and is trying, with its walkout and boycott tactics, to blackmail the United Nations into compliance with that twofold demand.

"The United Nations, embarrassed first by the Chinese National Government's preferring of charges against the Soviet Union and embarrassed further now by the Chinese Communist government's demands and the pressure applied by the Soviet Government in support thereof, is greatly concerned about the menace to it of this Soviet pressure, more concerned, it would seem, than it has thus far appeared to be about the menace to the world of Soviet pressures of the past 5 years in China and against a government there which the Soviet Government had expressly pledged itself in special agreements to support.

"In and regarding this situation, the Government of the United States has taken an affirmative position toward sidetracking consideration of the Chinese Government's charges against the Soviet Union and has taken a negative position toward the question of representation of China in the United Nations. Its spokesmen have declared that its delegation will vote against recognition by the United Nations of the Communist regime but will not resort to a veto and will accept such verdict as may be arrived at by the votes of others."

How can the State Department justify not using the veto as long as we are actually at war with Soviet Russia and Soviet China and every Soviet country in Korea?

In Defense of a Dead Defender—Eisenhower Unavailable

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would be recreant to myself and disloyal to the memory of a friend did I not join with Stewart Alsop to say:

If Johnson had simply told the country that for economic reasons it was his policy to reduce American strength, he would have been tragically wrong, but at least he would have been honest. To attempt, as he has repeatedly done, to conceal what he has been doing under a cloak of bombast, is not honest. As for this most recent attempt, to identify the policies of the dead Forrestal with his own failures, that is positively indecent.

And to quote again for emphasis, may I say:

When the record of a great public servant, who is dead, is distorted in order to excuse the follies of his successor, it is time to set that record straight.

Loyalty to a friend is a commendable virtue so long as one does not make that loyalty an excuse or an alibi or puts such loyalty above loyalty to his country as did Secretary Acheson unnecessarily when he endorsed Alger Hiss or as does President Truman when he notifies the country that come what may to the people of the United States he will retain both Secretary Acheson and Secretary Johnson.

The President's alleged loyalty is a mistaken policy for the great majority of the American people have no confidence in either or both Secretaries. Since that is so, and it is so, the President defies the people. He bespeaks for himself the same lack of confidence had by the people in the Secretaries named.

The Secretaries should have the patriotism to submit their resignations before confidence in them is further shadowed by legislation to impeach them which has been threatened and is seriously contemplated.

EISENHOWER UNAVAILABLE

While I would agree with Senator TOBEY's suggestion that General Eisenhower be drafted to be Secretary of Defense, were such a thing possible, it is true the National Security Act of 1947, as amended, provides in effect that no person who has within 10 years been on active military duty may be eligible for appointment as Secretary of Defense.

Without legislation to repeal or to waive that act any attempt to make General Eisenhower Secretary of National Defense is a waste of effort.

However, Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent heretofore granted I include an article by Stewart Alsop in yesterday's Washington Post that reads as follows:

IN DEFENSE OF A DEAD DEFENDER

(By Stewart Alsop)

When the record of a great public servant who is dead is distorted in order to excuse the follies of his successor, it is time to set that record straight. It has been intended to avoid, as far as possible, mention of the name of Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson in this space. But when Johnson uses the words of James V. Forrestal to defend his own disastrous policies, this is no longer possible.

Johnson's recent elaborate defense of his record was squarely based on a statement by Forrestal before the Senate Armed Services Committee in March 1948. Forrestal then recommended an increase of $3,500,000,000 in defense spending, at the same time warning the committee that "as a military matter" a $9,000,000,000 increase was urgently needed. "In other words," Johnson says, "the dilemma presented by the competing military and economic considerations was resolved at the $13,500,000,000 level" by Forrestal.

Johnson then goes on to claim that the "substance of this decision"—to hold defense spending at this level—has been "repeatedly ratified," and slickly implies that he, Johnson, has thus only done what Forrestal wanted to do. As anyone reasonably well informed should know, this is simply untrue—grossly and demonstrably untrue.

The truth is that when Forrestal asked for the $3,500,000,000 increase in the spring of 1948, he knew that this was insufficient, and had so informed President Truman. Forrestal accepted the $14,000,000,000 defense limit—then imposed by Truman—under protest, and regarded it as temporary. The Soviet blockade of Berlin which soon followed was a clear signal that the Russians were willing to risk war, and confirmed Forrestal's judgment.

Forrestal accordingly asked the Joint Chiefs of Staff to prepare a new budget figure. That August the Joint Chiefs came up with an inflated estimate of more than $30,000,000,000. After many conferences with his old friend, Robert Lovett, then Under Secretary of State, Forrestal reduced this figure to $23,000,000,000, which he believed would permit a reasonable balance between the vast political commitments of the United States and American military strength.

TOO MUCH FOR TRUMAN

Early in October, Forrestal presented this new figure to Truman. Truman flatly refused to accept it. Forrestal went back to work, and in November, shortly after the election, he submitted to Truman a $17,000,000,000 defense budget, which he believed was an absolutely bedrock minimum for the security of the United States. But Truman, suffering from the euphoria which overcame him after his electoral victory, insisted on the Budget Bureau's wholly arbitrary $15,000,000,000 defense limit.

It was then that Forrestal, in long anxious conversations with his friend Lovett, discussed the question of whether he should resign in order to dramatize the danger. Perhaps wrongly, Lovett counselled his friend to stay on at least for a time. Forrestal did so, but the conviction that the weakness of the United States placed the country in jeopardy preyed on his mind like a cancer, and led soon to his tragic end.

This is the true record of Forrestal's position on defense. Obviously President Truman must bear a share of the responsibility for American weakness, but at least his $15,000,000,000 limit would have provided some of the strength we now so tragically lack. Since that time, the danger signals have multiplied—the Soviet atom bomb, the fall of China, the threat to all Asia and all Europe. And Johnson, with the President and the Congress all too ready to believe his boasts about increasing combat capabilities at less expense, but below the President's own limit, freezing money appropriated by Congress for defense, discharging combat troops, mothballing ships, slicing into aircraft and weapon procurement.

FIGURES TELL THE STORY

The facts and figures which make nonsense of Johnson's claim that over-all combat potential is higher than ever, have been reported repeatedly in this space, and they have not been denied. As for Johnson's claim that he has done only what Forrestal intended to do, a few figures on the strength planned under the Forrestal regime for June 30, 1949, and the actual strength provided under the Johnson regime on June 25, 1950, tell the story. Forrestal—nine infantry divisions at 94 percent strength; Johnson—seven such divisions at 75 percent strength. Forrestal—24 naval-air groups, 34 patrol squadrons, 31 marine squadrons; Johnson—9, 20, and 12 in the same categories. Forrestal—10,559 active Air Force planes; Johnson—7,967 active Air Force planes.

And so on. If Johnson had simply told the country that for economic reasons it was his policy to reduce American strength, he would have been tragically wrong, but at least he would have been honest. To attempt, as he has repeatedly done, to conceal what he has been doing under a cloak of bombast, is not honest. As for this most recent attempt, to identify the policies of the dead Forrestal with his own failures, that is positively indecent.

It is high time the people of the United States understood what is confronting them despite the attempts of those named to hide from them the awful fact that we were never so ill-prepared; never in so great danger; never so complacently led to slaughter as by those who have undertaken to do a job so far beyond their capacity and ability as at this moment.

In defiance of Congress the executive departments have refused to comply with its specific instructions.

If that is not both cause and ground for impeachment, it should be, in a democracy.

Personalities cease to be an issue. Alleged loyalty to consistent betrayers of the people is not a virtue. The President himself should act to rid himself of those who have ill-advised and misinformed him. To do otherwise is to approve their actions in the premises which the people will never forget nor condone. The responsibility for the situation which obtains rests squarely upon the President and his advisers who have repeatedly disregarded the explicit and specific acts of Congress, which is the people.

For the situation which confronts us, responsibility rests on Acheson and Johnson, and more largely on the latter.

Just ordinary common decency of consideration of the public demands should suggest to him that he insist upon his right to resign. He has established every reason why the President should accept such resignation.

Position of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce Relative to Mobilization, Controls, and War Financing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I am extending in the Appendix of the RECORD the statement of general principles adopted by the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce on pay-as-you-go taxes, controls, and mobilization. They are certainly worthy of consideration:

The board of directors of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce believes that every thinking American should call upon Congress to place the United States on a pay-as-we-go basis for the duration of the Korean crisis.

Since we demand our troops in the field display the greatest fortitude, it should be obvious to all that at least some measure of fortitude should be displayed on the home front.

By postponing the day of fiscal reckoning for costs of World War II, those of us who remained at home during that war have succeeded in transferring a share of the burden to the men and women who bore more than their fair share of the costs by fighting the war for us.

We should not permit this to happen again. If we have courage, we will embark on a pay-as-we-go policy and at the same time avoid needless controls by:

1. Immediately reducing all nondefense expenses. We are convinced we are wasting billions on nonessentials.

2. Immediately setting up substantial increases in taxes sufficient to pay for this new mobilization program. Let us acknowledge that national defense costs money. Let us start paying for it now.

We are now being threatened with dictatorial economic controls. These controls would erect mountainous road blocks of red tape at every strategic production intersection. They would regiment our daily life needlessly.

The basic arguments presented in favor of such new regimentation are that economic controls would prevent a runaway inflation and would assure availability of materials for military purposes.

First, let us point out that in existing laws the President already has all the powers he needs to assure military production. The Selective Service Act alone authorizes the President to mobilize the manpower, the factories, and the materials needed to fight a Korean war or pack some weight into "peace offensives" elsewhere.

Second, inflation cannot be prevented by controls. The evil effects of inflation are only postponed unless the causes are removed. These causes are not connected with controls. The primary cause is the creation of new credit by Government printing of money and issuing of bonds.

Inflation has followed every war in our history because we have not paid our way as we went. No matter how many controls we adopt, inflation will follow this mobilization if we follow the same easy path of deficit financing.

The point that escapes too many is this: There is no easy way to fight a war. Wars cost lives and money. Postponing payment of the costs has never made it easier to pay. We should have learned this lesson within the decade. Every American should insist that we pay as we go.

Let Us Act Before It Is Too Late

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, after 6 weeks of war against bloody Stalin in Korea we have about 30,000 poorly equipped troops there. At the same time Stalin has 58,000 spies and agents operating freely in the United States of America. They are well-financed, well-trained, and united. Day and night they plot and scheme against our boys who are dying in Korea. Nothing is seemingly done to stop them.

It is sickening that our Government even permits these traitors to use the radio, television, and even the mails to plot the betrayal of our country. Why in the name of decency should our boys die in Korea to stop communism when we cannot even stop their traitorous activities within our own shores. If this Congress continues to sleep, the people are not going to be patient much longer. Already groups are taking the law in their own hands and bodily throwing Communists out of factories, offices, and meetings. The people are confused and disgusted with our "Little Boy Blue" approach to stopping communism.

Immediately when we declared war in 1941, all Italian, Japanese, and German aliens in our country had to register and sign for all the possessions they owned, such as books, radios, and guns. We placed all Japanese in detention camps. Are the Communists a special kind of people who must never be molested? Are they alone to plot and scheme without limit? Where is our common sense?

I plead for positive action now. There was only 1 Communist for every 2,700 people in Russia when they took over. There are in the United States today 1 Communist for every 2,400 people. Are we blind to realities so that we will wait a little longer before we take action?

Without delay, let us pass here and now laws to do the following:

First. Outlaw the Communist Party—label it for what it is—a ring of spies and traitors.

Second. Freeze their bank accounts and safety deposit boxes and compel them to register all money in their possession.

Third. Compel all of them to register, including all their aliases with penalty of life imprisonment if they refuse.

Fourth. Inspect their offices and their places of meeting.

Fifth. Deny all radio, press and television facilities for their traitorous propaganda and lies.

Sixth. Prohibit the use of the United States mails to their traitorous cause.

Seventh. Place in detention camps any and all Communist spies and traitors—at least while our boys are dying to undo their traitorous work.

Unless we take action now we are not worthy of the trust the people placed in us.

Letter From Kelly Ingram Post, Veterans of Foreign Wars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAURIE C. BATTLE

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, the members of the Kelly Ingram Post, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Birmingham, Ala., are worried about publicity on our war activities that give aid and comfort to the enemy. I, too, have been deeply concerned about this particular problem. So under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I would like to include a resolution from my own VFW post condemning this practice and offering a suggested remedy:

KELLY INGRAM POST,
VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS,
Birmingham, Ala., July 28, 1950.

Whereas the United States of America is now involved in a major conflict with a Communist nation on foreign soil and many miles from our main base of supply; and

Whereas many news releases have been made in the last few weeks, telling of troop movements, equipment and supply movements to our operating centers and the type and capabilities of material used by our soldiers in battle; and

Whereas the indiscriminate broadcast of this information undoubtedly costs the lives of many American soldiers: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the members of Kelly Ingram Post 668 of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States of America in regular session strongly recommend to the Commander in Chief Harry S. Truman that he immediately set up an office of censorship to see that no information is published or broadcast that gives aid to our enemies and results in loss of life to our comrades; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Alabama congressional delegation, the commander of the department of Alabama of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Birmingham News, and the Birmingham Post-Herald.

JOHN A. JENKINS,
Commander, Kelly Ingram Post, Veterans of Foreign Wars.

Attest: WESLET A. WARMACK,
Adjutant.

Addresses by Hon. Francis J. Myers, of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the text of three addresses which I made.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY UNITED STATES SENATOR FRANCIS J. MYERS AT VETERANS' DAY CELEBRATION AT TOWANDA, BRADFORD COUNTY, PA.

I come before you at a critical hour in the tactical timetable of Communist aggression. I want to emphasize tactical as contrasted with a strategic timetable. The bloody battle developing on the southeastern corner of the Korean peninsula will not—whatever its outcome—decide ultimate victory in the Korean war for the red invaders.

The history of aggressive warfare is full to the point of overflowing with accounts of battles won by invaders who in the end lost the wars they had started. There is, as all of you know, a world of difference between a tactical victory in battle and the outcome of a war conceived on false strategic concepts. The Nazis achieved one tactical victory after another in overrunning Europe more than 10 years ago. The sneak attack on Pearl Harbor by the Japs was a brilliant tactical success for them that had been prompted without provocation and which relied heavily on surprise. But in the end, it was the failure of Nazi strategy and Jap strategy which lost the war for them. Both the Nazis and the Japs made the common error of underestimating the vigor, the resolution, resourcefulness, and the strength of free peoples.

Yet the Reds—in the face of those recent lessons in strategy—have now made the same blunder. For five postwar years, the Communist propaganda line has played the same tune—you've heard it—"Americans will talk big, but they won't do anything when the chips go down." Evidently, the Reds used this line so long that they began to believe it themselves.

I suppose, though, in fairness to the Kremlin strategists, it should be pointed out that the Reds have had some assistance from American isolationists in making their big mistake. If the Reds have read the record—as I'm sure they have—they have seen one of the two major political parties in this country vote 3- or 4- or 5-to-1 in the Congress against virtually every measure to strengthen the free world against communism.

The Reds have seen that the support of bipartisan foreign policy within the Republican membership of Congress is indeed narrowly confined. The small bloc of congressional Republicans, once ably led by Senator VANDENBERG, of Michigan, today has no effective leader as a result of Senator VANDENBERG's continuing serious illness. But most significant of all that the Reds have been able to observe is the fact that even at the high tide of Senator VANDENBERG's influence on Republican policy, he never once had the support of anything approaching a majority of the Republican congressional delegations—nor did he have a controlling voice in shaping the official Republican line that was to be followed by orthodox Republicans in Congress.

Instead, obedient majorities of three or four to one within the Republican delegations followed the isolationist "don't-help-any-free-peoples-anywhere" line laid down by the entrenched Republican leadership.

I think it is readily apparent that the Communists could be misled into the belief that the overwhelming Republican support for isolation represented the thinking of most Americans, and that this isolationist attitude would be embraced by a large enough group of our people to bankrupt any efforts which might be made to resist Red aggression if aggression was in fact decided upon.

Now while it is true you have never heard a Republican, or a Democrat either, say he had any love for communism, the overwhelming number of congressional Republicans have demonstrated a remarkable reluctance to do any more about communism than talk against it. The usual Republican approach to our programs to strengthen the free world can be summed up in one word: economy. They have been so obsessed by the desire to economize that they have gone to the extent of wanting to spare the water needed to put out a fire.

When you look at the record, you will see that most Republicans gave lip service to sending military assistance to Greece and Turkey, and they supported—so many of them said—the "principle" of the Marshall plan, the Atlantic Pact, the military-assistance program for other free nations, and point 4. But when it came down to a vote on the funds needed to make these programs effective at all, you could find only a tiny handful of Republicans who could understand that inadequately financed programs were as bad, or worse, than no programs at all. Obviously, if the programs were cut back to levels which would not permit them to do an effective job, what money we did spend for them would simply be wasted entirely.

So, year after year, since the end of World War II, we in Congress have witnessed the spectacle of vote after vote where we have barely squeaked through—or have at times failed to beat off—efforts to lop off funds designed to strengthen the free world. We have seen the Democrats vote 4 or 5 to 1 to sustain adequate funds for these all-important programs—and we have seen the Republicans vote 3 to 5 to 1 to cut the funds far below levels imperatively needed to make the programs successful.

I firmly believe that it was such votes as these which led the Reds into the fatal strategic mistake they made by pushing the button for the Korean attack.

Several weeks after the unprovoked aggression launched against the Republic of Korea, my Republican opponent who seeks election to the Senate this fall in my place announced that in his opinion our Nation had made commitments in the Korean War without having corresponding force to back them up. I want to ask you, if you will, to analyze that observation. I have thought about it a great deal, and frankly, it troubles me very much.

The observation is ambiguous—and so is the context from which it is drawn. It isn't at all clear just what he had in mind. By this, does he mean that we should have allowed the Reds to swallow up Korea without lifting a finger? Or does he think we should now pull out of the fray altogether? The Reds would have preferred to see us stay out of the Korean business—but I certainly don't believe the American people would have wanted us to stand idle while an aggressor walked all over a weak neighbor. The free world hasn't forgotten the lesson of Munich that quickly.

Or perhaps the remark means simply that he doesn't believe America has the wherewithal to carry through on our commitment to Korea and the United Nations. If that's what he had in mind, he has a lot less faith in America than do the rest of our people. The American fighting man understands the job he tackled. He knows—and he's demonstrated by his valiant actions in the past 6 weeks—that he's got to buy time, needed time, to get reinforcements and supplies to match the tremendous numerical strength that was gathered secretly and launched without warning on a tiny country armed only to the extent of downing border raids and keeping civil order.

Remarks that imply we haven't got what it takes to make good on our word are a flat sell-out of the brave men who are fighting the battle of freedom in Korea. Such statements as these accomplish nothing more than disunity among our own people and despair among our allies.

Now I have never been more serious in my life than I am in saying right now that the time has come to take stock of ourselves, our resources, and our policies. We need criticism—constructive criticism that mends our shortcomings, that promotes unity and strength among the free people the world over. But carping criticism that isn't clear as to its meaning, or criticism which disregards the facts, isn't constructive.

I opened my remarks to you today with the observation that Communists have made the same disastrous strategic mistake that the Nazis and Japs made before them—they underestimated the strength and resolution of the free democratic people.

More than any single event in the crucial postwar years, the Communist decision to undertake aggressive warfare has cleared the air and has revealed with crystal clarity what is required to halt Communist efforts to dominate the world. With a single stroke the Communist attack on South Korea has exposed to bright sunlight the fuzzy thinking, the irresponsible arguments, and the enormity of the error committed by the isolationists and their comrades in arms who in the name of economy have systematically sought to cut to the quick every anti-Communist program that has come before the Congress. In their penny-wisdom and pound-foolishness, they have screamed against the Communists and, at the same time, have turned thumbs down on every single proposal to operate our national and international programs at adequate levels.

Thus, the Korean attack has exposed the blind economy bloc and the isolationists as being the same breed of cat.

The thought occurs to me here that it is appropriate to say something about our spending for national defense since the close of World War II. The isolationists and their cohorts parading as economizers haven't been content to confine their attacks to the programs designed to strengthen other free nations. Even our own national defense has come in for its turn at their hands. Last year, for example, we were just barely able to beat down in the Senate, by a vote of 41 to 36, a move that would, if passed, have forced the President to cut back by as much as 10 percent of all Government spending, including defense.

But today the Monday-morning quarterbacks who have been exposed for their isolationist and false-economy moves at the expense of world freedom now demand to know what has happened to the sum of forty-eight and three-quarters billions of dollars which have been appropriated and spent for our own national defense during the past 4 years.

They now hope to shift the limelight from their own errors to an attack implying that most of the nearly $50,000,000,000 has been misspent or otherwise poured down a rathole without buying us military security.

Well, here's their answer—though they knew the answer before they began talking.

Approximately six out of every seven dollars spent for defense during the past 4 years went for necessary overhead. This included about $20,000,000,000 for military personnel—for their pay, food, and clothing. It included another $13,000,000,000 that was used for maintenance and operation of military equipment such as ships, aircraft, military installations. Another $5,000,000,000 was spent for such things as maintaining the civilian personnel who form such an important arm of the military, for retirement pay, for military public works, and industrialization programs. These three—provision for military personnel, for operation and maintenance of equipment, and the last item of $5,000,000,000 for such things as the civilian arm and retirement pay—reach a total of $38,000,000,000.

Of the balance of the $48,750,000,000 spent, there was $10,750,000,000 available for procurement of new equipment and for vital research. Two and a quarter billion went into research programs on such things as guided missiles, supersonic aircraft, radar, high-powered, recoil-less antitank guns, and other developments exclusive of atomic weapons.

The remaining $8,500,000,000 was devoted to procurement of new types of equipment, about three-fourths of which went for new types of aircraft, and the balance was used for ships, combat weapons, and vehicles.

The high percentage required for overhead—six out of every seven dollars as I have explained—is what we must regard as a fixed expense for operating our Military Establishment on a basis which will permit a ready expansion if and when needed. The fixed nature of this overhead is, I think, well illustrated by the fact that less than one dollar in twenty of the additional $10,500,000,000 requested recently by the President for additional defense must go to overhead. In other words, $10,000,000,000 of the $10,500,000,000 will go exclusively for purposes of increasing our combat strength.

Those who would seek to undermine our faith in our military defense by casting doubt in our minds are doing a grave thing indeed to the security of the free world.

As I indicated earlier, we do need criticism—constructive criticism. We need the kind which can strengthen us by pointing to specific examples of weakness and which suggests constructive ways of overcoming them. Irresponsible political attack, however, does not fall into that category.

Isolation has been exposed for what it is—and the false economy of seeking to economize on our security needs has also been exposed. The mistake which the Reds have made in attacking Korea has now swept away the phony argument of the isolationists and the false economists.

Those who have been completely consistent in standing by the programs such as aid to Greece and Turkey, the Marshall plan, the Atlantic Pact, a full-fledged program for military assistance to the free nations, point 4, and an adequate national-defense system are the ones who have been true to our efforts to halt communism and preserve world peace.

With the phony arguments now demolished by Red aggression, we are going forward with full-scale plans to strengthen the free world quickly enough that the Reds will not again dare to tamper with the peace. We are going forward as a united people, and we are going forward with the friendship, encouragement, and support of free peoples all over the world who, though poorer and weaker than we, are doing everything which is in their power to further our common goal of bringing about lasting peace in a free world.

More than ever before, it is now clear that the real effort against communism cannot be fought with mere unsubstantiated charges and attacks upon the loyalty and capability of our civic leaders. Those who feel that the complete answer to communism can be found by shaking our fists in supposed anger—while at the same time cutting down to nothing our help to our free neighbors or refusing to help them when they are attacked—are completely discredited by the march of events.

Americans—the overwhelming majority of Americans—know that actions speak louder than words, and as we've done throughout the postwar era, we are acting in defense of world freedom—acting faster now than before, because the isolationists and the blind, penny-pinching internationalists have been revealed for what they are.

We are not committed in Korea beyond our power. We are not committed to stand by the free world without the ability to carry out our commitments. Anyone who suggests that has underestimated the American people as completely as the Kremlin has.

TEXT OF TRANSCRIPTION BY UNITED STATES SENATOR FRANCIS J. MYERS OVER PENNSYLVANIA RADIO STATIONS, WEEK END OF AUGUST 4-6, INCLUSIVE

A tremendous amount of my mail recently has dealt with questions of controls over our domestic economy, and of mobilization for defense.

I'd like to use this particular radio report to the people of Pennsylvania as an opportunity to summarize the questions that have been asked me about controls, and to answer as many of those questions as time on a 15-minute broadcast will permit.

Here, then, is a picture of the sentiments expressed by the overwhelming majority of the people who have written me recently about controls:

Prices on a great many commodities have sky-rocketed. In some instances, goods that are ordinarily available in abundance can no longer be found at any price. Several reasons appear to be responsible for the higher prices and the shortages. For one thing, there has been a great deal of scare buying and hoarding. For another, some merchants have stepped up their buying in the hope of piling up big inventories that can be unloaded later at higher prices.

Curiously, many of our present shortages are artificial. You might find it hard to believe after looking at the shelves in your grocery this week, but the truth is that we have more sugar than we know what to do with. Store shelves are bare simply because people have been buying far more sugar than they usually do, just to have some extra on hand. This extra purchasing has overtaxed the packaging and distribution facilities with the result that artificial shortages have occurred.

Thus many of the shortages and high prices have been artificially created by hoarding and by some unscrupulous merchants who have tried to profiteer. We have seen, too, I regret to say, the occasional use of sharp practices by merchants who have tried to pawn off shoddy, second-rate goods by starting rumors of scarcity, of plants about to be converted, or what have you.

My mail makes it abundantly clear that our people want controls imposed on prices and wages. They want rationing as a means of protecting fair-minded people who are not trying to hoard or profiteer. They want these controls imposed not only to protect our home-front economy, but also because they are aware that the selfish practices of hoarding and profiteering are downright unpatriotic and unfair to the brave Americans who are fighting the Red invaders, unfair to the men who are being drafted, unfair to the Reserves who are being called up, and in fact, unfair to free people the world over who realize fully that our primary task is to halt Communist aggression.

Now let me tell you something of the developments presently shaping up in Congress.

In the past several weeks, we have heard the testimony of dozens of military and civilian experts who have discussed various phases of our defense mobilization needs. There have been, as you know, sharp but honest disagreement among them as to what is needed at the present time. But of these experts, none has commanded the attention and respect accorded to our great elder statesman, Bernard M. Baruch.

Rather than tell you what Mr. Baruch said, however, I would prefer to have you hear him summarize, in his own words, the recommendations he made for our mobilization needs. The Honorable Bernard M. Baruch:

"One, organize America for all-out mobilization, with a general ceiling over the entire economy to prevent further inflation and an all-embracing system of priorities to strengthen our defenses and minimize dislocations.

"Two, the very least that must be done is to amend this priorities legislation to provide for effective price and wage control and rationing authority. To do less is to invite cruel suffering and possible disaster.

"Three, taxes high enough to eliminate profiteering and to cover all defense costs. These taxes should take effect for at least the second half of this year.

"Four, continued rent controls with provision for clearly justifiable increases.

"Five, prompt creation of an over-all mobilizing agency to synchronize all our efforts.

"Six, postpone less essential expenditures. As an aid to that, a capital issues committee should be established under the Secretary of the Treasury to review all capital issues, public and private, deferring less essential projects to make sure housing, schools, hospitals, and other more essential needs are met first.

"Seven, strengthen the United Nations by coordinating our efforts with it in common defense of peace.

"Eight, speedier assistance in rearming of those nations ready to resist aggression, along with the expansion of our own defense forces.

"Nearly 3 years ago, I clipped an item from a newspaper which seems ominously prophetic today. It told of a boast made by a Soviet general. This general boasted that the western democracies were bound to be defeated by the Soviet Union because they would not make the sacrifices necessary to arm themselves. They prized their standards of living too highly. They would not be willing to accept the disciplines to put guns over butter.

"In Russia, though, this general boasted, the people were inured to hardship. The Soviet Government would force the sacrifices to mobilize. A lean and hungry, but mobilized Russia, would overrun a Western World which could not bring itself to mobilize in time.

"That is the test which confronts us—not only this country, but all of the free peoples of the world. It is the choice of peace or butter, of mobilizing our strength now, while peace can still be saved, or of clinging to petty wants and petty profits, imperiling our freedom and our civilization.

"No outside enemy can defeat us. We can defeat ourselves. Gentlemen, yours is the decision. Which shall it be—discomfort or defeat?"

This is Senator MYERS again. You have just heard our great elder statesman, the Honorable Bernard M. Baruch summarize the recommendations he recently made to Congress for undertaking our expanded defense program.

As might be expected, the Baruch proposals were attacked by those who—though they fully support drafting men and calling up Reserves to meet the new Red threats—nonetheless feel there is no need for comprehensive controls on our economy. These critics seem willing to send men off to fight and die in defense of freedom, but they are unwilling to curb the profiteer and stay the hand of the hoarder.

I believe the critics are dead wrong.

I have weighed carefully the various recommendations which have been made, and I have read the arguments posed by the critics. As I see it, this is the situation which confronts us:

There is some belt-tightening ahead for all of us if we are to meet our responsibilities fully.

I believe the President should be given comprehensive powers to impose controls. I believe they should be available on a stand-by basis. Not all of them are needed at once. Some may not be needed at all unless the international situation worsens greatly.

The use of comprehensive stand-by powers has the great advantage that they may be imposed without delay if and when needed. These powers must be broad enough to permit a roll-back of prices to sane levels. They must permit the control of wages, the assignment of priorities, and powers of allocation to assure adequate supplies for defense needs, and to guarantee the maximum production of essential consumer goods.

It is obvious to all but a few die-hards that the very existence of stand-by powers will act as a big deterrent against price increases and hoarding. The only ones who have cause to fear controls are those who would seek to boost prices out of line, or to hoard. The fact that controls are standing by, ready to be used if necessary, will make any potential bad actors think twice before misbehaving.

Heaven knows, no one likes controls for controls' sake, and we certainly won't use any more of them than are absolutely necessary. Controls—though most people appear to want them now—won't be popular once they are in effect. The American people have never liked controls, and they know full well that however carefully the controls are administered, they inevitably impose greater hardship on some than on others.

But little as we like controls, they must be readied for use. We Americans will not be satisfied to set up one standard for men in the armed services, and another standard for the selfish few who would profiteer or take more than their fair share of what we have to go around.

Inflation can be our worst enemy. You will recall that our industrial production was running close to peak levels when the Korean attack occurred. Now we plan to add perhaps $15,000,000,000 worth of new defense spending to that already loaded output.

In terms of our economy, the $15,000,000,000 expansion would mean an increase of about 6 or 7 percent in our total industrial output—a figure small enough that it would not cause serious disruption of our economy. When you consider, however, that hoarding buyers and businessmen seeking to build up their inventories are also adding new burdens to our output, it is obvious that the total effects of stepped-up defense activity and increased consumer demand would gravely overtax our industrial capacity.

Controls such as suggested by the Baruch proposals will halt the hoarding and inventory stockpiling. We will also reduce the inflationary effect of our defense program by making severe cut-backs in Government spending for nondefense programs, so that the net increase in the Federal budget as now planned will be far below the $15,000,000,000 level.

As Mr. Baruch pointed out, we should seek to pay for our new defense program as we go. This can be done—and we can curb inflation at the same time—by the combination of higher taxes, reduced Federal spending for nondefense work, and by tighter controls on consumer credit.

I believe our new tax program should be designed to curb profiteering and to close the inflationary gap. We should be able to accomplish this without imposing new tax burdens on families with low fixed incomes who are always the worst victims of high prices.

Credit buying has a tremendous inflationary effect—and today, Americans already owe the record amount of nearly $20,000,000,000 for consumer goods they are purchasing on credit. The inflationary effect of credit can be offset to a large extent by requiring larger down payments.

The steps I have indicated are necessary in light of what we can now foresee. We are not on a total war footing, far from it. While all of us pray that total war does not lie ahead, it is nevertheless a contingency we must keep in mind.

Our actual needs are for limited war, not the full-dress, all-out affair. As I say, we must in our planning keep in mind the possibility of total war, and be fully prepared should the present, localized version of war spread out into the real thing.

Our present task is merely to speed up the job that has been under way throughout the postwar period, that is, the task of building up our defenses and those of the free world.

The present situation does not call for total war mobilization, and although a sudden change in the international picture might shift us into complete mobilization, our present plans do not contemplate a big curtailment of production of basic consumer goods.

But it is unthinkable that we should not accelerate our defense plans at this time. Aggression, whenever and wherever it appears, must be stamped out. To do otherwise would lead us through a series of Munichs, and cause a gradual eating away in the strength of the free world as the Communists picked off independent nations one at a time.

Our opposition to Communist expansion has been the focal point of our foreign policy, and for the present, we're all in for some belt-tightening to see the job through.

ADDRESS BY UNITED STATES SENATOR FRANCIS J. MYERS, DEMOCRAT, OF PENNSYLVANIA, BEFORE MEMBERS AND GUESTS OF THE PENNSYLVANIA AMVETS, FORT STANWIX HOTEL, JOHNSTOWN, PA., JULY 29, 1950

I am doubly glad to be with you tonight. For one thing, I've always enjoyed other AMVET gatherings in the past, and I've looked forward to joining you this evening.

But I'm also pleased to be here because this provides me—as one of your two United States Senators—with the opportunity to bring you a report from the Senate and elsewhere in Washington on some of developments which are shaping up now on the international front.

Without question, the international question is the issue of the day. It's uppermost in everyone's mind—and it is imperative that all our people should have the facts on what is taking place. A fully informed public in times of this sort is all-important.

A great many of you in this room, I am sure, know at first hand the enormous complexity of any military operation. You are familiar with the great initial advantage gained by any military force which brings a surprise attack. You know, too, the vast supplies which must be secretly marshalled before a surprise attack can be launched. And I am sure you recognize the unprovoked Red attack on South Korea as one which had been carefully planned long in advance and the attack was put into motion on a split-second time table.

Any of you—and I'm sure this applies to most of you—who have followed carefully the Communist tactics in the postwar era are fully aware that the Communist attack might have been launched against West Germany, or Yugoslavia, or Greece, or Turkey, or Iran, or India, or Indochina—instead of against South Korea. In your mind's eye, you can see the vast half-circle of the iron curtain as it hangs across eastern Europe, and runs across the continent of Asia to the east, and thence north to Siberia on the Pacific Ocean opposite Alaska. The uninhabited, frozen wastes of the polar cap complete the circle of iron curtain back at its beginning in northeastern Europe.

The essential thing to recognize here is that the Communists have sought incessantly to push the iron curtain ever outward into larger and larger circle, within which new millions of oppressed people could be swallowed up and subjugated by Communist masters.

The free nations which rim the border of the iron curtain found themselves—almost without exception—terribly weakened by the total impact upon them of World War II—and from the end of the war forward, it was obvious that the Soviet grand design for world conquest visualized a capture, one at a time, of the weaker neighbors who lived on the free side of the curtain.

The Communists, who at the end of World War II were in no shape to undertake another one, sought to carry out their conquest of individual free nations largely by subversive, internal means. They tried to capitalize on the economic chaos in Europe by fomenting strikes and insinuating themselves into the political life of countries like France, Italy, Germany, and so forth. The Marshall plan, which has already cost America over $8,000,000,000, came just in time to stop cold the Communist efforts to capture the countries of western Europe from within. The postwar starvation in western Europe is a thing of the past—thanks to the Marshall plan—and the free nations of the west are gradually getting back on their economic feet.

Economic recovery in western Europe has been a bitter pill for the Communists to swallow, because it has completely thwarted the Communist efforts to control Europe the cheap way by means of internal overthrow of the free governments.

In Greece, the Communists stirred up a guerrilla war in the hope of undoing the results of free elections in that country. American aid made it possible for the people of Greece to suppress the guerrillas completely, and there, as in Turkey as well, internal Communists subversion was a failure.

When the Reds tried to freeze us out of Berlin, the airlift, manned by American and British pilots, supplied that city, the size of Philadelphia, completely by air for almost a year—and once more Red pressure was abandoned in the face of determined opposition.

All of these Communist measures I've discussed up to now relied, as I have pointed out, primarily on internal political and economic means, rather than on techniques which would involve outright aggression or war. And it is quite evident that those efforts have ended in failure for the Communists.

You will recall that our expenditures for military purposes since the close of World War II have been substantially above the levels we have ever maintained in a so-called period of peace. On the other hand, there have been a number of Members of Congress, who were either outright isolationists, or who were so anxious for economy that they were willing to cut anything and everything in order to save money, have opposed our defense spending.

Just last fall, for example, the isolationist and economy blocs ganged up in an effort to order a 5 to 10 percent across-the-board cut in all appropriations, including the military. That effort was beaten back in the Senate, but the vote of 41 to 36 was a little close for comfort.

Our defense program since 1945 has managed to achieve a unified defense force, bringing into balance the Army, the Air Force, the Navy—and, of course, the Marines. That was a huge job that still isn't finally settled, but the understandable jockeying for position and squabbling among the forces that broke out last year has, from all reports, been settled peaceably, and we now have a single striking power of all the forces, organized, cooperating and acting as a team.

A steady increase in defense spending has taken place in the past several years as a result of the growing possibility that the Communists would dare to risk an act of aggression if they continued to fail in the use of internal tactics. The Soviets have continued to build up their own forces, and today have the largest standing army in the world.

American foreign policy, which has received some bipartisan support in Congress, has developed along the lines that defense of the United States cannot be confined merely to arming ourselves alone. It was perfectly obvious—or obvious at least to everyone but a noisy handful of isolationists, many of them in Congress—that our freedom depended upon the freedom and independence of the other democracies in the United Nations.

Many of the free countries who were fellow members of the United Nations were economically weak, and unable to develop adequate military forces with their limited resources. These same free governments did, however, see the Communist menace clearly, and they turned to America for economic support and assistance in the form of military equipment which would enable them to build up their resistance to Communist threats.

When you consider that the Communists, with a growing military machine being assembled behind the iron curtain, were in a position to concentrate their forces at any point along the iron curtain, and strike suddenly with great strength, it at once becomes apparent that the free world could not create overnight a solid military barrier around the entire periphery of the iron curtain strong enough at every point to overcome at once any attack in force which might be brought to bear.

It was a matter of building up the entire border of the curtain—and building at the same time, reserve forces which could be moved in to beat back the attack wherever the Communists might decide to launch it. The defense forces around the edge of the iron curtain would, until the reserve help could be brought into the fight, be forced to buy time and to delay in every way possible the aggressor's time table for conquest until sufficient enforcement arrived.

Needless to say, the free countries—and this certainly includes America—hoped very much that the Communists would not be so insane as to indulge in rank, raw aggression against a free world. And it has been the announced policy of all the free countries that aggressive action against any one of them would not be tolerated.

The Atlantic Pact, initiated by the United States last year, informed any would-be aggressor that the nations who signed the pact would stand fast against any aggressive act. And to back up the Atlantic Pact, we inaugurated the military assistance program late last year—once more over violent isolationist objection—to give more than a billion dollars' worth of military assistance to nations which would join in the common purpose of resisting aggression by any other nation.

Under the terms of the military assistance program, any nation wishing to participate in it had to sit down with military officials of the other allied nations and work out a common defense program—evidently a matter which took a great deal of planning, and necessarily quite a bit of time. When the common defense program was mapped out, it was necessary to list the equipment which would be needed to carry it out.

We had some of the needed equipment on hand in America as surplus, but much of it was not available as surplus, and orders and plans were needed to get it into production.

The military assistance program, first enacted into law late last summer, has come in for some criticism recently—and I might add here that the criticism has come largely from the very Members of Congress who actually voted against military assistance last year—but their criticism quite obviously represents a complete misunderstanding of what the military aid program involved. This isn't too surprising, because in their votes against it last year, they clearly failed to understand it at the time.

In criticizing the very program they voted against last year, they have apparently assumed the funds they opposed could be converted overnight into military equipment which had not even been manufactured when the bill passed. And apparently they expected, too, that the equipment once made, could be transported on some sort of magic carpet—at the speed of light—to countries all over the world.

The Korean Reds weren't this blind. They saw the American forces hand over to the South Koreans more than $100,000,000 worth of ground force equipment in 1949 when our troops were withdrawn under instructions of the United Nations. And the Korean Reds saw that before long, last year's military assistance program would have progressed to the point that finished equipment would start arriving after a 5,000-mile journey from America.

For them, aggression was now, or never. Neither the United States nor the free countries of the United Nations which assisted in establishing the Republic of Korea south of the thirty-eighth parallel, intended to build up a South Korean fighting force designed to launch aggressive warfare. The $110,000,000 worth of American equipment furnished the South Koreans last year consisted of infantry equipment such as rifles, bazookas, mortars, howitzers and some 60 or 70 small naval patrol vessels. This equipment, altogether, was enough to supply some 50,000 ground forces adequately to meet the needs for internal security of the country in putting down border raids and suppressing Communist-inspired uprisings.

The Korean Reds were also able to see what American economic assistance had been able to do in rebuilding the economy of South Korea. Over $400,000,000 worth of economic assistance has reached South Korea since the end of World War II, and these funds were being put to work in raising the economic levels of the country. The economic progress helped further to make it clear to the Reds that they would have nothing to offer the South Koreans.

When the decision was made to attack south of the thirty-eighth parallel, the Reds brought with them a huge force that clearly had been designed to overrun the country in a matter of hours so that the job could be finished before the stunned free world could do any more than protest what had happened.

But the decisive political action of the United Nations and the immediate follow-up by President Truman must have come as a big surprise to the Reds. Despite the advances the Reds have continued to make, the decision of the free nations to stand together against Communist aggression had an electric effect in strengthening the opposition to the Red drive. We sent what forces we could spare immediately without endangering other key points in our Pacific defenses, and steadily since that time nation after nation has accumulated what forces it has to offer and is getting them off on the long journey to that distant trouble spot in Asia.

As this time ground forces from countries of Latin America and western Europe are already en route or about to go. Additional American forces are moving, along with more supplies, across the 5,000-mile pipeline to Korea.

The bravery and resourcefulness of the United Nations forces in buying the needed time to get divisions of men in to replace the battalions that are now slowing down the Red divisions are deserving of the highest honors in the annals of warfare.

General MacArthur said this well in his first report to the United Nations Security Council last Tuesday when he observed:

"But the issue of battle is now fully joined and will proceed along lines of action in which we will not be without choice. Our hold upon the southern part of Korea represents a secure base. Our casualties, despite overwhelming odds, have been relatively light.

"Our strength will continually increase while that of the enemy will relatively decrease.

"His supply line in insecure. He has had his great chance but failed to exploit it. We are now in Korea in force, and with God's help, we are there to stay until the constitutional authority of the Republic is fully restored."

Thus, General MacArthur summarized the Korean situation a few days ago.

In the meanwhile, plans are being shaped rapidly to make certain of General MacArthur's success. Men and equipment are en route across the Pacific as rapidly as they can be dispatched.

Other plans are shaping up to prepare a more rapid strengthening of all the free nations. Congress is now working out the details of the projected $10,000,000,000 increase in military spending which the President recommended. The Draft Act will provide for the early call of 100,000 men without previous military service, and specially trained Reserve units will be activated to meet particular needs in Korea and elsewhere that potential trouble might be expected.

The defense program, as it is projected for the present situation, is clearly not designed for Korea alone. We readily recognize that other efforts may be made by the Reds to find soft spots in the defenses around the iron curtain, and we are moving ahead to strengthen ourselves and the other free nations who, under the United Nations, have denounced aggression.

It terms of the American home front, some belt tightening is ahead. As plans stand at the moment, it will not be severe. Both the Senate and the House are readying legislation which will provide for rationing and price controls with provisions for price rollbacks. I regret to say that the need for consumer controls has been brought about primarily because of scare buying on the part of a relatively few businessmen and consumers who, either because they have to build up inventories with the hope of profiteering, or because they want to accumulate a hoard of things they don't presently need, have succeeded in creating artificial scarcities and pushing up prices on goods we have in abundance.

Sugar is a good illustration. The surpluses of sugar have haunted us in the past year. We still have more than we know what to do with. But in store after store, the prices have jumped and the shelves are bare, simply because unfounded rumors have sent the packaged stocks off into basement hoards.

We need stand-by controls for rationing and prices now—and if prices do not settle back as they should, the controls will have to go on.

Some materials, notably steel, will be short, because our steel industry was operating at peak levels prior to the Korean invasion. While our present defense needs will not make serious inroads into the production of basic consumer goods, a system of priorities and allocations is being fashioned which will assure the flow of adequate quantities of critical materials into our defense effort. But, as I say, the $10,000,000,000 defense expansion presently contemplated will not seriously disrupt our economy or living standard. If the Korean business is settled without other difficulties arising, our industrial capacity can quickly absorb the new load, and by curtailing Government spending on many nondefense activities, we are easing the pressure on our industrial machinery.

The interim $5,000,000,000 tax bill is being drawn now, and as a member of the Senate Finance Committee, which is handling the matter, I want to see the new taxes act primarily as a curb on profiteering and against inflation. I have no intention of seeing it applied in a fashion that will work harm on families with lower, fixed incomes who are always the first victims of high prices.

These, in brief, are the recent developments. Where we go from here, no man can say with certainty. We fervently hope, of course, that the concerted resistance to aggression in Korea will serve to convince the Reds that we mean business when we say aggression will not be tolerated. However, as we have done throughout the postwar period, our national policy will continue to be built on the proposition that we will work hand in hand with the free peoples of the world to protect the individual dignity of peoples and nations. To do so, we must continue, as we have in the past, to be prepared for eventualities which might confront us.

While I pray that Korea will go down in the books of history as one more failure of Soviet expansion short of war—as has been the case in Berlin, and Greece, and Turkey, and in all of western Europe—we can be certain that the free nations will not stand by watching their fellow nations swallowed up one at a time. And to meet that grave obligation to world freedom, we all have a task to perform. But with moral right on our side, and with our abiding faith in the future of free men, we will succeed.

Why We Need a New Secretary of Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, attempts on the part of Secretary of Defense Johnson to make it appear that efforts to expose his inefficiency are prompted by political partisanship are boomerangs.

For him to charge that Congress is responsible for the awful lack of adequate military preparedness for either attack or defense; for him to boastingly state there was no question as to our security and to intimate we could repel any attacker in hours—these things and many more are the measure of his egocentric incompetency for the job he persists to retain.

His continuance in office impedes national security for that Congress distrusts him, rightfully doubts that money it may appropriate for defense will be expended by him as directed by it; resents his previous willful disregard of their express directions, their being ample ground for that conclusion.

Mr. Speaker, other reasons why we should have a different Secretary of National Defense too numerous to mention are to some extent set forth in the following editorial to be found in Business Week—the issue of August 5—which, for the convenience of all, I include under unanimous consent as an extension of my remarks:

THE TREND—WHY WE NEED A NEW SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

It has been said of Louis Arthur Johnson, Secretary of Defense of the United States of America, that he hoped for the best without preparing for the worst.

The brutal facts from Korea bear tragic witness to the awful truth of this estimate of the man.

Even if a Dunkerque can be averted and our offensive can be mounted from South Korea instead of Japan, a horrible failure here at home must be accounted for. The time is now to ask the question why so few had to face so many with so little.

Who is to blame for the Korean tragedy? Who left us hopelessly unprepared to meet this murderous Communist aggression? Who lulled the Nation into a sense of false security by boasting of our growing military might under reduced military budgets?

The blame must be shared by every American, not least by the President and the Secretary of State. But the chief blame belongs where the chief responsibility is—with the Secretary of Defense.

Louis Johnson should resign. If he fails to show that sense of public duty, the country should make it plain to him.

THREE FAILURES

The Secretaryship of Defense is a high office of public trust that should seek out the man who is to fill it. No such narrow view, however, trammeled the ambitions of its present occupant. From as far back as 1940, when FDR had to back away from an earlier promise to make him Secretary of War, Louis Johnson campaigned to be this country's top military civilian.

His chance—a long one—came in the summer of 1948 when Democratic candidate Truman was apparently prepared to promise anything to anyone who could replenish the bankrupt party treasury. Johnson took over, according to widely accepted reports, on the condition that he become Secretary of Defense. He did a miraculous job of political money-raising, the President was reelected, the bargain was kept, and in March 1949, Louis Johnson succeeded the late, great James Forrestal.

His administration of the Defense Department has been stormy—perhaps unavoidably so. He inherited the whole stubborn unification mess. He has done good work on the administrative side in making unification work. And he has brought about some legitimate, badly needed economies.

It is a pity that his good works pale into obscurity alongside his calamitous failures.

First, Johnson has had no adequate conception of the defense policy needed to match the foreign policy of this country, wobbly as that has been. To be sure, the blame here extends beyond him to his Commander in Chief, the President, and to the Secretary of State as well. But his was the responsibility to lay before Congress a military program equal to our commitments. He failed to do so.

Second, Johnson's department failed to provide the kind of military strength that Korea shows we need. There has been a consuming preoccupation with intercontinental atomic war and inadequate preparation for the satellite cat's-paw type of war that Russia chose to use in Korea and may use elsewhere. The result is that our men have only a few light, outgunned tanks to oppose the Red monsters thrown against them We must rely on jet fighters to do work they were never designed to do in support of ground operations. The new weapons about which so much was heard last spring seem still to be on order.

Third, Johnson's repeated assertions that his economies and budget cutting have resulted in a stronger defense are revealed as tragically false. Before Korea, he prated that we're in grand shape, that if Russia starts something at 4 o'clock in the morning we would go into action by 5, and that we were prepared to lick the hell out of Joe Stalin if he started anything.

He told the country that his smaller budgets would merely cut out fat and convert fat into muscle. After holding defense obligations below the $13,900,000,000 authorized for fiscal year 1949 50, he submitted a $13,000,000,000 budget for 1950–51. This compared with the $18,000,000,000 figure Forrestal regarded in 1948 as the minimum for meeting our responsibilities around the world. We are now hastily—and wastefully—in 1 year trying to expand the defense budget by twice that $5,000,000,000 saving.

Johnson's budgeting went far beyond cutting off fat. It cut down Army ground force strength, almost decimated the marines, shrank Navy fighting power, held back the 70-group air force, reduced aircraft replacement programs, ignored glaring weak spots in tanks and tactical aircraft, and retarded research and development.

CUTTING THE MUSCLE

On the floor of the House of Representatives on April 4 last, Chairman CARL VINSON of the House Armed Services Committee challenged Johnson's propaganda. Said VINSON, "I want to state emphatically that, in my judgment, Mr. Johnson's economy scalpel has not only carved away some service fat but has cut—deeply in some areas—into the sinew and muscle of the armed services."

An example, tragically documented in Korea, is what happened to Forrestal's tank-modernization program. The plan was to take our medium tanks, rearmor, and regun them so they could at least handle their Russian opposite numbers. GI's in Korea today could hardly be expected to agree that Johnson's economy in budgeting that program out of existence was only cutting off fat.

Louis Johnson's record does not qualify him to continue as the civilian leader of our great new military effort. Nothing he has done in office would so become him as the leaving of it.

Laws or Morality?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, an editorial appearing in the Altoona (Pa.) Mirror of August 5, 1950, discusses a frequently used expression, "There ought to be a law." The editorial is as follows:

LAWS OR MORALITY?

"There ought to be a law." How often do we hear that expression or repeat it? As humans we always want the law to restrict some other fellow, of course. Few if any of us want a law passed that will restrict our own freedom of action or our right to do what we think is proper and to our own advantage.

Right now a great many people are saying, "There ought to be a law," about a great variety of subjects. Most of the concern over a new law relates to our war and preparedness efforts. Congress is being pressed by a number of groups as well as by individuals to pass a hopper full of bills restricting the other fellows.

If they pass one-fourth of the bills proposed, our war effort will be bogged down under the extreme weight of a lot of useless red tape. Many people who now are very much in favor of restrictive laws will be very much disappointed when they find some law restricting them.

There is one law that could cover most of the subjects now being proposed as a basis for innumerable new laws. It is a simple law given to man many generations ago by the Great Teacher.

Simple in language, easy to interpret, it could relieve the modern world of many of its heartaches. That law, which we know as the Golden Rule says, "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law of the prophets."

The last war produced its full crop of war profiteers, despite the many and complex laws that hindered many honest men in the performance of their daily tasks. Its aftermath was less liberty for all of us; freedom and wealth for most of the 5-percenters and additional grants and wealth for those offenders who had the good will of powerful politicians on their side.

History records the downfall of many great nations. Quite often the downfall of those nations was brought about by a complexity of laws that worked injustices on larger and larger portions of their population. Our own Nation was brought into being by a revolt against unjust laws. We must be ever vigilant lest we wreck this one last bulwark of free people by a maze of laws in which every man needs a legal guide.

Americans are the great revolutionists of the modern age. They revolted against the authority of kings, and of unwise laws. They revolted against the stupidity of the Dark Ages. Their active minds and vigorous bodies led them to revolt against things as they were; and brought about things as they are. They revolted against unnecessary hard manual labor and created the greatest quantity of labor-saving devices in the annals of history.

They revolted against human slavery. Having freed the body of man, they set about to free his mind and his imagination. Their inventions have freed the housewife of a multitude of chores, they have freed the masses of much back-breaking labor.

Revolting against time and space, this Nation's inventors came forth with the steamboat, the locomotive, the automobile and the airplane. We built the greatest railroad system on earth, we still are perfecting it. Our miles of highways are equal to the total mileage of the rest of the world, and we are adding to it.

Our great transportation system is equaled by our great system of communications. Our industrial know-how is the marvel of all other nations.

Will we, the great revolutionaries of the ages, now surrender these things that free men with free minds and bodies achieved, to those who thirst for power? Will we first be fettered by needless laws and then chained to the chariots of the enslavers because we have forgotten the moral laws on which a great Nation was built? Will we pass from a Nation governed by law to a Nation confused by law and eventually to a Nation governed not by law but by men?

The German people in the despair of the twenties called out for a leader. They gave up their liberty for the intoxication of great power in the hands of a few. They almost destroyed the world as we know it. They did destroy Germany. Were they guiltless? Did their pleas of innocence because of poor leadership impress you?

Shall we delegate the great power and responsibility imposed upon us as American citizens to a few, or shall we as free men and women, proud citizens of the greatest Nation on earth, shoulder our responsibility and obey the primary moral laws, making other laws unnecessary?

Boykin Defends Johnson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, I last week told you all of the innumerable telephone calls, letters, and telegrams which I received subsequent to the several talks made with respect to Louis Johnson, who, I repeat, is to my mind the greatest Secretary of War, or should I say of Defense to which the peace and the security of this Nation has ever been entrusted.

Mr. Speaker, experienced in administration, a great executive, a public official who does the right as he sees the right, Louis Johnson is a man who gets things done. The hundreds of thousands who work under him, believe in him because they know him. They know also that when he issues an order, he wants it carried out at once.

It is said that on more than one occasion he has told his subordinates:

Have no fear of the consequences of what you do under orders. * * * I will take all blame * * * and I am taking this off your backs in order that you can get the job done as it should be done—economically with precision and with dispatch.

I did not have to read in the daily press that President Truman was behind his Secretary of Defense, Louis Johnson—"come hell or high water"—because I knew that the President and Americans everywhere are conscious of and appreciate the work he is doing as Secretary of Defense and are behind him to a man.

Mr. Speaker, I was particularly pleased yesterday to receive a copy of an editorial published in the Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser headed "BOYKIN defends Johnson," and which editorial truly exhibits the basic problems which confront this country. That our people are generally becoming more aware of these problems is made clearer each succeeding day.

So far as the strength of our armed services is concerned, the United States now has two separate and distinct defense problems. The first is the continental defense of the United States themselves and second to that is the defense of all countries represented in the United Nations whose independence we, as well as all signatory nations, are pledged to support.

It is generally conceded that the strategic warfare—one of the missions charged to the United States Air Force and which invokes the use of the atom bomb and the Air Force long-range, intercontinental bomber, the B-36—is the solution to the problem of our continental defenses.

There is general agreement, moreover, that what the editor of the Montgomery Advertiser called "the black fury of the A-bomb," plus the Air Force's ability to deliver it represents the most powerful reason why Russia has not as yet started and hesitates to start a war against us.

I am in hearty agreement with what General Vandenberg, Chief of Staff, Air Force, once stated when he declared, "The only war you can really win today is the war that never starts." I do not believe that there is a person in this House who will dispute the fact that the one thing that has contained Russia and made her fearful to launch an attack either against any of the weak countries of Europe, or this country itself has been the existence of the atom bomb, the Air Force B-36 long-range bomber and the ability of the United States Air Force to deliver the bomb.

The second problem confronting the Nation is to formulate a policy of peace or a method of defense participated in by all of the 59 countries in the United Nations Assembly, this in order to prevent the Russian satellite nations from engaging us in a war on a half a dozen or more fronts, all of which are at great distance not alone from the United States, but from one potential theater of war to the other.

Mr. Speaker, everyone reading the article will find a wholly factual, impartial, disinterested, and brilliantly keen analysis and expression of opinion exhibited in the editorial as clipped from the Montgomery Advertiser.

Knowing of its interest to the membership of this House, I am asking unanimous consent to extend my remarks and place the same in the RECORD of our proceedings.

The article reads as follows:

[From the Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser of July 28, 1950]

BOYKIN DEFENDS JOHNSON

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD it is seen that Congressman FRANK BOYKIN, of Alabama, has made a spirited defense of Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson. BOYKIN considers that Johnson is being made the fall guy for disasters that are not of his making. BOYKIN makes the points about Johnson:

1. Never at the beginning of any war have we possessed so powerful a Navy as now.

2. On January 1 the Army, due to Johnson's reorganization moves, had 4,000 more men in combat units than it had in such units 6 months before.

3. "I was myself in attendance at the Pentagon when Louis Johnson told us of the economies and improved efficiencies that he planned to effect, and it was patent there that he was encouraged to make all possible economies, and by every Member of this House that was present, provided, however, that he made them in some other fellow's congressiona' district or at some other Congressman's expense. Do you not remember his thundering response—

"'If Congress expects me to make the Defense Department a Federal WPA relief project merely to provide jobs, I will quit this job right now.'"

4. The gathering reverses in Korea have had the effect of discrediting Johnson's oncevaunted economies. There is a disposition to blame Korea on these economies. What is not understood is that some of the economies are as desirable now as then. Among them was firing 177,000 civilian employees in the armed services set-up. The Hoover Commission and all the rest of us, including this newspaper, roared approval.

5. It is easy to forget that a year and a half ago the country was impatient with Johnson's predecessor, James Forrestal, because he was too soft to effect unification. This, Johnson accomplished.

Congressman BOYKIN offers some praise of Johnson that appears extravagant to us, but certainly Johnson's performance has not been lacking in merit in some directions. Early last year the State Department—not Johnson—wrote off Korea as not being worth American blood.

But even here there is an extenuating circumstance. Prior to Korea we were all thinking of armed conflict entirely in terms of a slugging match between the United States and Russia.

Had we been at war with Russia since June 25, we would have been able, as we are not in Korea, to employ our mightiest resource—the "black fury" of atomic warfare.

The millions we have spent on B-36's are not in action now. But in any war with Russia, the greatest air force on earth would have struck crippling blows. A-bombs can't win a war, but until Russia provokes war, we may conclude that they can prevent wars.

We undoubtedly have been reckless in the limited scale of our preparations for war, but neither have we been entirely improvident. Never at any time in our history have we been as well prepared with weapons and millions of trained veterans as now.

We have proven leadership in Bradley, Sherman, Collins, and Vandenberg.

It is singular to us that our vast reservoir of seasoned soldiers, out of uniform for less than 5 years, has not been a more widely discussed asset than it has. Some 15,000,000 men and women passed through our armed services in the course of World War II. Of these, millions could, with brief training, resume their service. How essentially different from 1941 when this country took up arms against the battle-seasoned hordes of Germany and Japan. Those 1941 servicemen didn't know a PX from a M-1.

A very grave time is upon us. For the indefinite future we are going to live in times that will make the last 5 years seem like the tranquillity of the Coolidge era. But the indications still are that Russia simply doesn't want our A-bombs. Otherwise, she would have taken Berlin last year. Churchill has always made that point all the time, and so far events bear him out—as they usually do.

Freedom Is in Jeopardy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, one of the great industries in my district is the Freeman Shoe Co., of Beloit, Wis. Its President is Mr. H. T. Cary, and recently in Freeman Unlimited, a factory publication, he offered words of wisdom which justify a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I include them as part of my remarks and commend his message to all Members:

Everything I am about to say undoubtedly has been said many times, by many people but, in these anxious days, it might be refreshing to repeat them. No one in America, official or otherwise, should be a master, and, likewise, no one in America should be a slave. This is my idea of democracy, to the extent that any nation differs from this to that extent it is not a democracy; if, in fact, it remains one at all. The purpose of government is primarily that of furnishing machinery to protect the property of its citizens from destruction or seizure by another, so that, when the other accumulates property, it will likewise be safe. The protection should also embrace the principle that an individual's property should be safe from its own government, which more recently has been taking the property of private citizens through confiscatory taxes.

Government has few positive virtues, if, in fact, any. Therefore, it is best when it governs least. It should be a servant of the people and never its master.

The American people, I am sure, consider their freedom too precious to ever permit it to perish, unless it is destroyed by the implement of its own government. Therefore, it is disturbing to observe that for many years now, American Government has not been compatible with traditional American freedom, as the greatest freedom of all is freedom from Government encroachment, but Government encroachment has been progressing for the last 20 years.

In Russia the politicians preach freedom, but they do not practice freedom. On the contrary, they desire to enslave the earth and the people. In more recent years, the pattern of our own Government is following theirs too closely for comfort, and it is time that all Americans be alert to the sign of creeping socialism by way of Government interference with business and its citizens' activities. All Americans should be aware of concentration of power and abuse on the part of its Government, because, frankly, freedom here is already in grave peril. Our Government's financial policies are no longer consistent with traditional American freedom. It has abandoned the traditional gold standard and has cheapened the value of our currency. It has, therefore, partly confiscated the value of our insurance policies and has decreased the quantity of food, clothing, and housing that our dollars will buy. A continuation of deficit financing, which is the implement by which the value of dollars is cheapened, will eventually impoverish the entire Nation.

Another war will greatly increase the national debt as no economy can be looked for if we are to wage world war III, with which we are now threatened. While victory must be won, it will not finally be achieved unless the people are free to achieve it and the advantages of victory will be conspicuously absent if, while fighting, we permit the Government to become more concentrated, dictatorial, and abusive. Therefore, we must remember that, while fighting for freedom on the battlefield, we must fight equally as hard for it at home, and win both battles, for one without the other will indeed be a hollow victory.

It seems to me that a victory on the homefront battle to keep our freedom can only be won by a constitutional amendment which will prohibit our Government from levying confiscatory taxes and the continuation of deficit financing. It seems to me that our situation now is not that the budget alone is out of control, but, rather, that the Government is out of control. That is to say, the people no longer control the Government. They have not controlled it for some time, and if a third war is to come it will be the direct result of complete lack of statesmanship on the part of our Government. Ninety percent of the people knew that America should not have allied herself with Russia in the last war. That act, in my opinion, will go down as one of the greatest disasters in American history. And even worse than this was the fact that, by giving comfort, aid, and assistance—which permitted Russia to emerge from the last was as a powerful, aggressor nation—our Government substantially provided the necessity of world war III.

Wars are usually won—even by a free people—because of the inspirational genius of great statesmen. Today it is obvious such genius is sadly lacking, and while the American people will again bear arms and sacrifice their sons and daughters, if necessary, their hearts will not be in it. Three disastrous wars in one generation can only be the result of diplomatic bungling.

Regulation of Commodity Exchanges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1950

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I am inserting a statement by Mr. Perry E. Moore, president of the New York Cotton Exchange, before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee and which deals specifically with subtitle B of S. 3936:

On behalf of the Exchange, I would like to make two recommendations to this committee. We urge:

1. That subtitle B of S. 3936, the Maybank bill, be stricken from S. 3936.

2. If the committee deems this inadvisable, we recommend that the consideration of subtitle B be transferred to the Senate Committee on Agriculture, which is familiar with this entire subject, for consideration.

We recognize the situation this country confronts and realize the necessity of some legislation to give the Government power to deal with the crisis resulting from the international situation.

We strongly feel, however, that subtitle B, section 411, which gives the President broad powers to fix margins and promulgate regulations to deal with trading in commodities on the exchanges will not do what it is intended to do.

We feel, for reasons which I shall state briefly, that the proposed legislation is likely to raise cotton prices, instead of lowering them and to be a strong factor in forcing price controls over the entire economy.

In this connection let me tell you briefly how the New York Cotton Exchange functions and the service it gives the cotton industry.

As their name indicates, the New York and New Orleans Cotton Exchanges are cotton markets not only for the United States but for the world. As a matter of fact, the New York and the New Orleans Cotton Exchanges are the only world cotton markets left today. For one reason or another, the other markets are closed or function under such handicaps that they are not world markets.

The primary function of the cotton exchanges in this country is, of course, to serve the cotton industry, including the farmer. I think it is generally agreed, even by some of the proponents of subtitle B of S. 3936 that the cotton exchanges do serve a useful purpose. We want to continue to serve a useful purpose and that is why we are urging the elimination of sections 411 and 412 of subtitle B.

Let me briefly state some of the services which the exchanges furnish the cotton industry:

1. They provide a market where cotton can always be bought or sold. Without marts where buyers and sellers are always available, there is a question whether the producers would at all times be able to dispose of their cotton. History shows that when futures markets were closed there was chaos in the cotton spot markets and farmers had difficulty in disposing of their cotton.

2. The exchanges furnish, through hedging operations, price insurance for the shippers and manufacturers of cotton which enables them to buy and sell cotton freely throughout the year. This not only results in a better price to the producer—it decreases costs to the consumer.

3. The exchanges are a valuable source of price and other information about cotton.

To illustrate how hedging furnishes price insurance, the following is an example: A cotton merchant buys cotton in order to have an ample stock on hand to fill orders for his cotton-mill customers. He may buy several thousand bales when he has no immediate outlet for them. Let me emphasize that almost every bale of cotton is bought by merchants and others the moment the farmer is ready to sell. Someone will take the cotton. The operations of the cotton futures markets enable the farmer to sell his cotton when he wants to sell it. Obviously, a merchant who buys several thousand bales without an immediate outlet for them at the mills runs the risk that the market may decline sharply before he can resell his cotton. Consequently, he sells on the exchanges cotton for future delivery in a quantity approximating the amount he has bought. When the merchant sells the actual cotton he has on hand, he disposes of the future hedges. If the price has advanced, what he loses on his futures sale will be made up on his spot cotton. Conversely, if the price declines, his loss in the sale of spot cotton is compensated by a similar profit on his futures contracts. This is the standard method used by mills and merchants for protection against price fluctuations. A hedge, in reality, is price insurance. Banks demand more collateral on cotton that is not hedged.

There are many ramifications to hedging. There is always some risk involved. But the risk is greatly lessened by hedging, which is nothing more or less, as I stated, than a form of price insurance.

If a cotton merchant had to buy cotton and could not hedge, he would have to charge more for his service than he charges today. The risk and cost would be so great that he would have to pass these along in the form of higher prices to the mills. Similarly the mills, if they could not hedge, would have to pass along their risk and costs in the form of higher prices to the consumer. It is generally agreed that hedging in the commodity markets performs a useful and vital function, and I might add, an indispensable function unless the Government is to take over the cotton market and fix prices all the way from the producer to the ultimate consumer. If this were done, it would, of course, mean the end of the free-enterprise system so far as cotton is concerned, and none of us want to see that.

The exchanges have always cooperated fully with the Government in the past with regard to margins and propose to cooperate fully in the future. The Secretary of Agriculture testified in 1947 before a congressional committee that "throughout the war the exchanges were extremely cooperative and did about what the Government requested."

Cotton margins, as administered by the exchange, have been on a sliding scale for years and are periodically reviewed to meet changing conditions. The cotton exchanges can always act quicker and in a manner more responsive to market conditions than can the Government. Our procedures are simpler and we have more information at our command.

Present margins required by the exchange equal the cents per pound by which cotton is now selling above parity. However, this should not be forgotten. The exchanges have the responsibility to see to it that there is enough activity in the markets to enable them to perform their primary function of price insurance. If the only trading in the cotton futures markets consists of actual hedging operations, there will not be enough activity in the market to enable them to be carried out successfully.

We strongly feel that section 411 of subtitle B of S. 3936 will do more harm than good. We feel that it is likely to intensify price fluctuations in cotton rather than to minimize them.

If section 411 is enacted as it is now and the present international situation continues, undoubtedly the Government is likely to raise margins substantially in almost all commodities. Our experience is that power in the hands of the Government is likely to be used. If the margin required for futures cotton trading is high enough to drive speculation out of the market, the only ones in the market are likely to be those who wish to hedge, and possibly a few well-financed speculators. If there is any substantial quantity of cotton to be hedged, the speculative interest probably will not be sufficient to absorb it. If this situation comes to pass, the cotton exchanges will have lost the primary reason for their existence and their usefulness will be nullified—to the detriment of the entire cotton industry, including the cotton farmer.

I would like to point out that the cotton exchanges continued to function throughout World War II and that there was no governmental interference until the war actually was over.

The cotton exchanges were closed July 31, 1914, after the outbreak of World War I and remained closed until November 16, 1914. The lesson which this taught us should not be forgotten. The farmers were trying to market their cotton but there was no market for the big crop. Some of you will remember the "please buy a bale" movement. Something like chaos prevailed in the market. Adequate or reliable information on the demand for cotton was lacking. Prices varied several cents even in local areas of the belt. The price of cotton was depressed, the bulk of the crop was offered around 6 cents. The next spring the price of cotton rose to around 12 cents but this was after the cotton had left the farmers' hands. The consumers got little benefit. The farmers lost millions of dollars.

There was speculation in cotton, lots of it, while the exchanges were closed, but the speculation was in actual cotton. The closing of the exchanges did not prevent the speculation but it did cause confusion and misunderstanding which injured the producers. The exchanges were reopened and have never been closed since with the exception of several days during the bank holiday in 1933 when similar conditions prevailed.

You are well aware of the fact that the President, under the proposed bill, has the power to fix margins at 100 percent of the purchase price of cotton, or at any other figure he may determine. Any substantial increase in margins will impair the usefulness of the market, and easily could put the exchanges out of business for lack of trading. In that case, we would have 1914 all over again.

In April 1946, OPA stepped in and did raise the margins required for futures trading in cotton. It is generally admitted, I believe, that the effect of this action was to impair the usefulness of the cotton exchanges as a price-insurance medium. The action did not lower cotton prices but, as a matter of record, cotton prices continued to rise, proving our oft-repeated contention that margins do not regulate prices. With the expiration of OPA in June 1946 the exchanges again resumed their function of regulating margins and have performed that function, I feel, satisfactorily.

The recent sharp rises in cotton prices are not due to speculative trading in cotton. The speculative interest in cotton today is less than it was last October, at the height of the cotton-marketing season. Speculative interest on July 21, 1950, was over 11½ percent less than it was on October 14, 1949.

The price increases in cotton are due in large part to:

1. The shock to all commodity markets and the inflationary forces generated by the war in Korea and subsequent developments.

2. An unexpectedly low cotton acreage report. As a result of acreage restriction by the Government, the 1950 acreage is one of the lowest on record. With the exception of 1945 and 1946, it is the lowest since 1887.

3. The fact that the Government did not offer its stocks of cotton, approximating 3,300,000 bales for sale, until the cotton market had passed by several cents the figure at which the Commodity Credit Corporation is permitted to sell cotton. The CCC is permitted to sell its cotton stocks at around 34 cents a pound. It did not offer them for sale until the market was around 37 cents and then actual sales were restricted and handled in such a way that a further inflationary force was added.

Over any period of time, speculation is not a decisive factor in the cotton market, or other commodity markets. The market reflects the general opinion of supply and demand factors. Let me emphasize that speculation does not control the market and is a factor for only short periods.

In previous years, the cotton exchanges have been blamed both for price increases and price declines. In instance after instance, there have been thorough investigations of the operations of the exchanges and in every instance the verdict has been that speculation has not been the real reason for the increases, or declines.

If the Government raises the margins to the point that the speculative interest in cotton is not sufficient to absorb legitimate hedging operations, the situation can result in an alarming inflationary spiral.

By way of illustration, let us say that there is no speculative interest of any consequence in the futures market and that someone enters that market—seeking to buy large quantities of cotton either to hedge, or speculate. If there is no one to sell this cotton the market could be driven up sharply and quickly. It would be comparatively easy to drive the market up, for, with speculative offerings absent from the market because of excessive margins, the purchases would have much more effect than if the market were a broad one.

We know very well that the very word "speculation" has a bad connotation. But let me point out that speculation is not confined to the commodity markets. It enters into hundreds and thousands of business operations every day. There is speculation in every field. It is a part of our economic process and simply reflects the opinion of business, industry, and the public on what is likely to happen in the various fields of our varied economic life.

I would like to point out that this proposal—section 411—is not new. If you will examine the Barkley bill to regulate the exchanges which was introduced in the Congress in 1948 you will find it almost identical with section 411. The only change is that the power in the Barkley bill would have been given to the Secretary of Agriculture. Now it would be given to the President.

The Barkley bill, and similar measures, have been carefully considered by the Senate Agriculture and House Agriculture Committees and they failed to approve these bills. Now, under the guise of a wartime emergency, this authority is sought again. In our opinion, it reflects the attempt on the part of certain forces to extend Government power over our economic system. It is not needed and will do little to check any inflationary forces that are present in our economy.

I might remind you also that the Congressional Joint Committee on the Economic Report considered in 1947 the proposal to extend Government power over the commodity exchanges and failed to recommend the passage of such proposals. In this connection, I would like to read you a paragraph from the 1947 report of the joint committee:

"The committee and two of its subcommittees have heard considerable testimony on speculative trading in commodity futures. Experienced and responsible witnesses, including representatives of the administration, the grain trade, and the mining industry, agree on the importance of maintaining efficiently functioning hedging markets, and on the fact that commodity speculators as a body perform a useful economic service in this connection."

The Commodity Credit Corporation of USDA has almost 4,500,000 bales of cotton available for sale on the market at 105 percent of the current Government support price, plus reasonable carrying charges. With the crop beginning to move to market, this stock of cotton constitutes the real brake against inflation in the cotton market if the selling policies of the CCC are wisely used. The power asked in S. 3936 is not needed, but, once the Government acquires the additional powers over the exchanges, we fear this power will be continued. That would be a big step toward the elimination of the exchanges and the socialization of the marketing machinery for agricultural commodities.

We favor also the elimination of section 412 of subtitle B of the bill before you. It is clear that the operations of this section would result in a ceiling price on cotton at a figure below parity price and, as all of you know, that parity has been the objective of most of the agricultural legislation enacted since 1932.

Summarizing, we believe that all subtitle B should be taken out of the measure you are now considering. The proposed authority to regulate margins for trading on the exchanges is not needed, would not halt prices, or curb inflation, and easily could result in unwarranted price increases for agricultural commodities. It represents an unnecessary interference with the functioning of free enterprise. Such steps should never be taken unless they are imperative and then only after due consideration. We recommend that section 411 be referred to the Senate Agriculture Committee if it is not to be abandoned altogether. The Agriculture Committee is familiar with such proposals and we would be willing to trust its judgment.

We have stated briefly our reasons for proposing the elimination of section 412. We feel there is no justification for this section.

We have not addressed ourselves to the many other sections of this measure, leaving them to be discussed by others more familiar with their import than we are on such short notice.

Austin Rebukes Soviet

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein the following editorial which appeared in the Evening Tribune, Lawrence, Mass., Saturday, August 5, 1950:

AUSTIN REBUKES SOVIET

Warren R. Austin, American chief delegate to the UN, expressed a noble sentiment when he causically repudiated a suggestion that peace could be bought in Korea for the price of recognition of Red China. In ringing words, he said that "so long as men are dying on the battlefield in defense of the United Nations, this council will not wish to cheapen their suffering or sully their heroism by seeming to engage in the consideration of deals." "Deal," in this context, has a hatefully cynical connotation which embraces all the wickedness of artful power politics. By rejecting the proposal as contemptuously as he did, Mr. Austin was truly the spokesman for American opinion, which sees Korea in the isolation of what it is costing a handful of GI's, not as an expendable pawn on the international chessboard.

At every turn of the road, by their consistent ignoring of human values, Soviet leaders make it all too plain that their concern is dynasty—the perpetuation of their dogma at whatever cost to the people it is supposed to emancipate. The difference between old monarchical tyranny and this new enlightened kind is that the former pretended no interest in the common welfare, while the latter promises redemption from misery at some future—always future—date, asking only that the masses patiently endure their exalted serfdom until the day of millennium cometh. The old tyranny was really more benevolent in that it did not impose the condition that it be loved and respected; it made it apparent that it didn't care a whit what people thought, and thus left the door unlatched for the assassins. The new tyranny, with devilish cunning, leaves the door unlatched, too, but to disarm the assassins by letting them catch a glimpse of the luxury their children's children may partake of—if all goes well. The trouble is that the stomach is not sustained for long by dreams of delightful victuals, although the promise of a deferred utopia can be sufficiently enticing to hold revolt in check for long enough to see a cheated generation to the grave.

Although it would, of course, save American lives to come to terms with the Russians over Korea by yielding to their demands, it would be yielding too much. It would be yielding too much of that nebulous thing called freedom—that happy state we enjoy and can't adequately define because it has a thousand meanings. Life is not supposed to be grim; it is not immoral, not a bit, to want to enjoy some of its fruits while you still have all your teeth. This Government of ours, even as now constituted, criticism to the contrary notwithstanding, permits us to enjoy hot from the griddle some of the richness we help create. It doesn't snatch it all away from us, like a stern parent, and lock it up for consumption at a time which may never come. Austerity, which is always building for the future, makes lean citizens, and glum, but it does not make joyous ones. This fact alone is one of the best weapons in our armory.

Preparedness by Ansul

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. BYRNES
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, one of our critical problems of today is civil defense, and it is readily apparent that our local communities must lead the way in the absence of leadership from Washington. How one of the industrial concerns in Marinette, Wis., a thriving city in my district, has taken the lead in disaster preparedness is told graphically in a recent issue of the magazine Pathfinder. As a fine example of American resourcefulness and independence, I include it as part of my remarks and commend it to the membership of the House:

PREPAREDNESS BY ANSUL

"We won't have our civil defense forces ready until 1952," Paul J. Larsen, director of civilian mobilization of the National Security Resources Board, told a reporter. "We are taking a calculated risk that Russia won't feel able to launch a 'winning war' until then."

Last week, as worried industrialists wondered whether Stalin would abide by Larsen's schedule, it fell to individual towns and businesses, acting on their own, to prepare for air raids which might liquidate much of the United States industry on the first day of total war. Among the most enterprising: the small (300-man) Ansul Chemical Co., Marinette, Wis.

Ansul, which produces synthetic rubber ingredients, lies on the path of Detroit-and-Milwaukee-bound Russian bombers. A single bomb plopped on one of its storage tanks might blow up half the town. "I was really worried," said Ansul safety director Joseph J. Banuch, last week. "We weren't prepared for a disaster."

THE FIXINGS

But Banuch, a rugged, 36-year-old ex-cop, had known one thing Ansul could do right away: form a disaster rescue team. Three years ago, he secured from company officials a promise of anything he needed—workers' time, training quarters, even $3,000 worth of first-aid kits, asbestos suits, tools, and a combination inhalator-aspirator-resuscitator.

Banuch quickly picked 15 plant workers of the type wanted: athletic, public-spirited, willing to serve without pay. Two were former Army hospital corpsmen.

Three hours a week, for 21 weeks, they studied Red Cross first aid. Then after studying the inhalator-training pamphlets, they answered emergency calls for a week with the Milwaukee Fire Department's rescue squad. Ansul's team came back convinced that plant rescue work was only a part of what they could do. Since Marinette and its Michigan sister community, Menominee (combined populations 30,000), could not support paid rescuers, why not serve the entire area?

Today, Ansul's team handles emergencies ranging from near-drownings to hands caught in car doors. It revived two men knocked out by a power line atop a four-story building and, last month, evacuated and treated survivors of a dry-cleaning plant explosion.

"If war comes now," Banuch proudly predicts, "we know just how to relieve the shortage of doctors, maintain order, and pull out the entrapped."

Give the Ground Forces Their Own Support

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACK Z. ANDERSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, the following thought-provoking editorial written by Allen Griffin, publisher of the Monterey Peninsular Herald, deserves the attention of every Member of Congress and our military leaders as well.

I have heard the same sentiments expressed many times by our colleagues in the House who fought with the Infantry during World War II:

GIVE THE GROUND FORCES THEIR OWN SUPPORT

The men responsible for the national defense, inclusive of high rank and the politicians, may as well get down to brass tacks now and not later. The Army must be authorized without delay to organize its own air force for the excluusive purpose of close support of ground forces.

What we learned by experience in the Second World War we are today being taught by a far more bitter experience and by humiliation that is hard to take. One factor in that situation is the inability of the Air Force to give ground troops close support. The United States Air Force, as it is composed and as it should be composed, is neither equipped, trained, nor prepared to give this type of support, and we should recognize that that is not its mission.

This is not a criticism, therefore, of the Air Force. Its gallant young men are making every possible effort to save the forlorn situation on the ground in Korea, but they have neither the planes nor the training to do the job. The whole show in this respect is, on their part, an improvisation. Their lack of success in the intimate field of close teamwork was inevitable, just as other failures for which they were not responsible were inevitable.

When the Department of Defense, with the consent of Congress, was emasculating the Marine Corps, with some great minds prepared even to abolish this proven and tried arm of the service in the name of unification, the Marine Corps went into a desperate and obstinate defensive action to retain its own air arm. The ranks of the Marines were decimated and its air units ruthlessly depleted, but the principle was retained—and the understrength Marine division that is now en route to Korea is going there with its own Marine air support, thanks to those stubborn and unreasonable Marine and Navy officers who refused to be unified out of usefulness.

It should not be necessary for the Army to be transferred to the Marine Corps in order to have equal support and training, which can be accomplished only by close association and unity prior to conflict.

What the Army needs and must have now is well-armored, slow (175 miles an hour is sufficient) and uncomplicated planes operated by pilots thoroughly trained with ground forces, capable of dive and glide bombing and accurate, prolonged strafing.

This type of operation requires a high degree of specialization, thorough understanding of ground force tactics, and consistent training with ground troops. It is what the Germans had to break resistance to their infantry-tank teams in the first 2 years of the war in Europe; and it is something that the Russians had at the end of the war and have today.

The relative safety of such air supporting planes lies in hedge hopping and evasive tactics and in the Air Force proper keeping the skies cleared of the enemy.

If the Army's ground forces cannot get such an arm to support their operations, that belongs to them completely and that is fully coordinated on the ground, then there isn't going to be any close support.

There are two primary missions of the Air Force and one secondary mission, and nothing more should be expected, because nothing is more practical and economical. The primary missions are (1) interception and destruction of enemy aircraft, whether bombers or fighters, and the control of the air, and (2) strategic bombing. The secondary mission is support of ground forces, a tactical operation, but not close support. It is improper, wasteful, and furthermore, ineffective to expect of the Air Force more than the fulfillment of these, its proper missions.

The high ranks in the top drawer of the Army ground forces are not likely to stick their necks out on this issue and earn the enmity of the autocracy that demands a closed mouth unless it opens to say "yes." Therefore the pressure to create for the Army a small close support air arm under complete Army control must originate with the public and its representatives in Congress. Ground force leaders can then follow it up. The decision, however, should not be postponed. The Air Force should be relieved of a requirement that it should not be called upon to fill. The Army must be equipped for infantry-tank-air close teamwork. The morale factor involved is of the highest importance. Moreover, it will be economy of the first order—of men, equipment, and planes.

New England Prepared?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein the following article which appeared in the Boston Sunday Herald, Boston, Mass., Sunday, August 6, 1950:

NEW ENGLAND PREPARED?

One of the great uncertainties in the present war crisis is the extent to which industry will be called upon to convert to military production. Only time will tell, because it depends on the kind of struggle in which we ultimately find ourselves, and there is little in the over-all that the individual can do to prepare.

There is, however, a certain mental preparedness which we in New England might well cultivate.

This highly industrialized area will doubtless do its part as it has in all past emergencies. During World War II the six-State region filled approximately 9 percent of the Nation's war contracts, although it has but 6 percent of the Nation's population and 2.1 percent of its area.

What is worth considering, in the breather before this new crisis, is whether our potential is not for something greater than that, whether, with initiative and drive, we cannot do better both for the country and for ourselves when the chips are again down.

New England did an extraordinary production job during the last war, largely with existing plant. When the big production drive came this region was already tooled up, owing to earlier overseas orders, and it went to work with what it had. Most of the heavy Government expenditure for new plant went elsewhere, and so did the later contracts when the plants were built.

There was a reason for this at the time. New England was already heavily industrialized. There was concern over plant dispersal for defense purposes, and there was also need to find areas where the labor supply was not already preempted. But times have changed. In this air age New England is no more vulnerable to long-range attack than some of our still-booming centers in the Midwest and West. Also, it now has what many experts consider a chronic oversupply of labor. One of its chief needs is for plant modernization.

The several committees and agencies which are now studying New England's long-term economic situation will almost certainly recommend that, in the event of a new war effort, this region make a bid for major Federal aid in the form of new plant construction. They should also urge individual companies to use any windfalls from a war boom for complete plant modernization.

War, if it comes, will do great injury to this area, as well as to all others. But we must be alert to pluck every chance we can to improve our immediate and long-term productivity. And all-out production for war can provide many such chances, if we are ready and willing to grasp them.

Truman Performance in Switzer Case Is Dismal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. R. GROSS
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial written by Mr. W. Earl Hall, managing editor of the Mason City (Iowa) Globe-

Gazette, and published in the August 4, 1950, issue of that newspaper:

TRUMAN PERFORMANCE IN SWITZER CASE IS DISMAL

The story of the evolution of a little man named Harry Truman is contained in the history of the Carroll O. Switzer case.

Once—in his humbler days—Mr. Truman would have come to his former Senate colleague and asked:

"Who do you think would make a competent judge for the southern Iowa Federal district?"

But after becoming seized by his indispensable-man complex—this was spawned in connection with the last Presidential election—his whole approach changed.

Then, despite his acquaintance with the time-honored custom of consulting majority party Senators, he sought to bull through an appointment on a strictly political basis.

The action was taken in the face of an alternate of nominations by Iowa's Senator GILLETTE, nominations based on a bar referendum in the interested judicial district.

Senator GILLETTE from the start let it be known that he would oppose Switzer's appointment, that he considered it an affront by one who owed him decent consideration.

It wasn't surprising therefore that the Senate Judiciary Committee should reject the Switzer nomination even though he is now serving an interim appointment—another bit of presidential gall.

Nor will it be surprising if in the very early future the matter is brought up on the floor of the Senate for a test which almost certainly will be unfavorable to Mr. Switzer.

The reflection is on the President, not on Mr. Switzer. He's a likable young man of perhaps average competence as a lawyer.

That he made the sacrifice of seeking the governorship 2 years ago with no chance of success could not be reasonably considered as a legitimate qualification for serving on the Federal bench.

When the question was: "What lawyer would make the best judge?" it's significant that Mr. Switzer received not even the slightest consideration from his professional brothers.

History will record that he didn't come into the picture until the President began tossing some of the political curves he learned from old Tom Pendergast, his first political mentor.

Who Runs the Air Force?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. DAVIES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. DAVIES of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial from the Rome (N. Y.) Sentinel of May 16, 1950:

WHO RUNS THE AIR FORCE?

The chamber of commerce in Red Bank, N. J., is protesting to Congress the interference by the Rome Chamber of Commerce in the Watson Laboratories transfer.

We suggest to the Red Bank organization it look into its own backyard if it wants to find interference with plans for national defense.

The Air Force makes a thorough 4-year study of its ground electronics research and development program. It decides it must, for national safety, move Watson Laboratories from its exposed position at Eatontown, N. J.

It studies five possible new sites. It selects the $66,000,000 Griffiss Air Force base at Rome, ideally suited as an electronics installation and, most important, more secure from enemy attack.

The transfer is scheduled. Civilian employees at Watson Laboratories raise so much fuss a political storm arises in New Jersey and spreads to Washington.

This inteference by Air Force employees, channeled into political pressure, suspends the transfer and costs the Nation heavily in precious research work.

One electronics laboratory's work practically comes to a halt. Part of its personnel and equipment are in Rome, the balance in Eatontown. Planning and work that should go ahead with all speed are in a state of suspense.

The Rome Chamber of Commerce's interference consists of reminding Congress no group of private citizens can be permitted to jeopardize national safety by dictating to the Air Force; that the Air Force is in a better position to know its own needs for research and development than employees of Watson Laboratories.

Can the Red Bank Chamber of Commerce dispute this?

Is the day here when its civilian employees can tell the Air Force what it can or cannot do?

The inteference in this situation came from Red Bank and Eatontown. It is dangerous to the welfare of the country.

Interior Department Would Build Unsound Projects Under the Guise of Wartime Necessity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I regret to report that an agency of this Government assertedly is planning to deceive the Congress and take advantage of the war emergency with total disregard for the Nation's general welfare and for the men who are fighting in foreign fields.

According to information I have received, the Department of Interior, and specifically the Reclamation Bureau, will call upon Congress to build a number of large, costly, and totally unnecessary projects under the false assertion these projects are vital to the war effort.

No one knows better than we in Congress the importance of separating the sheep from the goats in a perilous time like this, yet agents of the Interior Department are now making pat speeches—secretly, of course—to Congressmen under the title "How To Get Your Project Built—Call It a War Project."

Here we have a discreditable display of sinister bureaucracy by men who place their own selfish schemes above the needs of men who are dying in conflict. Here we see officials of our Government plotting to take advantage of the Nation's profound desire to do everything possible to win the war. Here we see men of position and power attempting to wrap in the American flag projects they could not get approved in peacetime, and which have no value whatever in our struggle for victory against an unscrupulous and cruel aggressor.

A few days ago, on July 25, I recommended to the Congress that all costly and unnecessary reclamation projects be put in moth balls for the duration. At that time I anticipated precisely what is happening now. I feared that the Bureau of Reclamation, with no regard for the terrible financial burden now increasing on the American taxpayers, would attempt to get some of its fantastic projects approved under the false guise of wartime requirements.

I am informed that the Bureau of Reclamation has now cooked up what they describe as a package deal. That is, lumping together some of the sounder proposed projects with some completely unsound projects that could not pass in Congress at any time. Why? Because the Bureau of Reclamation wants to keep new projects going regardless of the national emergency. It wants to keep its great payroll intact, and the officials want to keep their personal power.

Let me cite a specific example. The Bureau of Reclamation has failed thus far to get even committee approval for the proposed central Arizona project, that would cost the taxpayers more than $2,000,000,000, which would never be recovered. It is the nefarious plan of the Reclamation Bureau to include the central Arizona project in the package deal. Representatives of the Bureau have told the Arizona proponents to term the proposed project a wartime necessity. The scheme involves building a gigantic dam on the Colorado River, allegedly for hydroelectric power to serve the war. At this time, the Arizona supporters would not request an appropriation for the irrigation features of the bill. Yet, the truth is the Colorado River Dam is the main feature of the whole central Arizona project. The scheme is to get the dam built as a war measure, and then, of course, the irrigation features would be requested.

Let me illustrate how deceitful is this plot. The building of this dam could not be started in less than a year if approval was given today. Secretary Chapman has estimated it would take at least 7 years to build the dam and power plant. I think it more likely that 10 years would be required, for this is a gigantic structure in a remote area of the West.

So at least 8 or 9 years would pass before the dam could supply power.

If power is needed for the war emergency it would be much better to construct steam-generating plants and use coal as a fuel. These steam plants could be constructed in a comparatively short time.

It is not the intention of the Arizona proponents to build this dam at Bridge Canyon on the Colorado River without regard for the irrigation features. It is the intention of the Arizona proponents to use the cry of patriotism to get the main feature of their fantastic irrigation project built.

What about essential materials that would be required for such a project at a time when we may face serious shortages? Let me tell you some of the things such a dam would require. The dam site is in a wilderness, far from any city or sizable town. There is no highway and no railroad anywhere near it. A highway 25 miles long would have to be constructed for the hauling of material alone, and a railroad at least 14 miles long would have to be built. Even then the railroad would not reach the dam site, for a railroad could not be built into the great canyon or even up to it.

Here is a scheme to spend almost half a billion dollars to get a power plant in an isolated area; a plant that would require vast amounts of vital material and an enormous supply of manpower in a place where there is no manpower at all; a plant that could not deliver 1 kilowatt of energy for at least 8 years.

But I have not yet revealed all there is to this disreputable plan hidden behind the false whiskers of wartime necessity. The proposed dam at Bridge Canyon, if built, would be virtually useless within 20 years. Why would it be useless in that time? Because, without another great dam farther upstream, the Bridge Canyon Dam Reservoir would be filled with silt in 20 years and power production would cease.

The Bureau of Reclamation knows that, and is planning to build another dam above Bridge Canyon. Yet they would come into Congress crying Bridge Dam is needed for the war, and say nothing now about the second great dam above that must be built to protect Bridge Dam.

Now, in the face of the war emergency, there is no telling when the upstream dam would be authorized to protect Bridge Dam. It would be a wicked waste of a great natural resource to build Bridge Dam at this time; it would be deceiving the people of this country; it would be double-crossing the fighting men; and it would be undermining the war effort.

If we were to open the door to such a scheme, we would find a rush of other proposals from the Bureau of Reclamation for other gigantic projects which could contribute nothing to the emergency and would only serve to sap our financial and material strength when it is most needed.

Milk Market Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. DAVIES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. DAVIES of New York. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to inform the Members of the House of the outcome of conferences between Secretary of Agriculture Brannan, Senator LEHMAN and myself concerning the recent administrative order affecting the 37 milk market administrations throughout the Nation.

Two different orders were to have been issued in the last few months which would have disputed the efficient operation of the New York milk market administrator's office. One of these was an announcement by the Civil Service Commission that the milk market administrators and their staffs would be included under Federal civil-service regulations and retirement. This was done because many administrators had requested that they and their staffs be eligible for Federal retirement system being open to them.

The second order was from within the Department of Agriculture itself and contained regulations and restrictions for market administrators which would have, in effect, abolished the independent status which these administrators have enjoyed for so many years. It would also destroy the Federal-State cooperation which has marked the operation of the New York milkshed for so long.

There may be some market administrator's offices which need to come under these two orders, but the New York office is not one of them. In regard to the Civil Service Commission order, the administrator and staff of the New York milkshed are already eligible for retirement benefits under the New York State retirement system.

The executive order of the Department of Agriculture regarding regulations and restrictions to be placed on the milk market administrators was not only unnecessary, but might well have broken down the smooth-functioning character of the New York office. That office has functioned as a semiautonomous unit for many years, and its operation has been punctuated by excellent Federal-State relations as well as the complete confidence of milk producers, marketers, and buyers.

Realizing that these orders should not be applied to the New York milk market administrator's office if there was any way to avoid it, I conferred with Senator HERBERT H. LEHMAN, with officials of the Department of Agriculture, and with Secretary of Agriculture Charles F. Brannan. I explained my reasons for believing that the New York milkshed should not be included, and suggested that, as a member of the House Agriculture Committee, I requested Chairman COOLEY to appoint a special subcommittee to investigate the situation. This committee would have studied each administrator's office and made individual recommendations concerning them. Senator LEHMAN also conferred with the Secretary and presented his arguments.

At the termination of these conferences, Secretary Brannan announced that the relationship between the New York milk market administrator and the Federal Government would remain unchanged. He also agreed not to press for the inclusion of the New York administrator under the Federal retirement plan, pending a review by the Civil Service Commission.

In short, New York milk producers can be assured that there will be no change in the status of the marketing administrator's office or in the organization and regulation of that office.

I wish to publicly commend Secretary Brannan for his willingness to work out an agreement acceptable to all sides; it is the mark of an exceptionally able public servant.

GI Gratitude

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACK Z. ANDERSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I take pleasure in including the following self-explanatory letter from a former GI. It is indeed inspiring to receive this type of communication from a young man who is sincerely grateful for the assistance he has received from his Government.

REDWOOD CITY, CALIF., July 5, 1950.
Congressman JACK Z. ANDERSON,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I recently graduated from San Jose State College. During this period of 4 years, I was enrolled under the GI bill and this cost the American people several thousands of their dollars. The purpose of this letter is to thank them, through you, one of their chosen representatives. I sincerely hope that with this education, which the Government and the people have given to me, that I can repay my debt, at least in part, by being a better American and therefore be of greater service to our country, which, by the way, I feel is one of the main purposes of an education.

Thank you again and if you should care to relay this note of thanks to any of your colleagues in Congress it will be appreciated.

Sincerely yours,
GERALD A. SHOEMAKER.

Discouraged But Not Quitting

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 27, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, appalled by the situation which confronts us abroad, it is discouraging to see the Congress doing business as usual. Every tax dollar which we can dig out of the people, every dollar which we can borrow, is needed to carry on the war to which, at the request of the Security Council of the United Nations, President Harry S. Truman has committed us.

August 4, the Senate put through a bill calling for $34,237,000,000. The House will shortly approve an appropriation of an additional $4,000,000,000 for foreign military aid. A request coming up within a few days will call for an additional $16,640,000,000. There will be requests for additional billions. Where they are to come from I do not know. Yet the Congress is authorizing and appropriating—and there will be spent—additional billions to aid the people of other nations to live more comfortably at less cost to themselves.

On August 2 in the other body, the junior Senator from Michigan said that to bring this country up to its requirements for highways, flood control, hospitals, schools—for a domestic program, would require upwards of $180,000,000,000.

But I am not talking now about money to be spent here at home in war time on desirable but not absolutely necessary projects. I am talking about the money which it is proposed to spend abroad, not in a war effort, but just to help the people of other nations to live "more abundantly."

Here are some of the overseas development projects—not military—which were either approved or under consideration in May of this year.

For the United Kingdom, to be spent on local nonmilitary projects in her colonies for agriculture in Cyprus, roads in northern Rhodesia, roads in north Borneo, roads in British Honduras, roads in Sarawak, food production in Uganda, cotton and food development in Tanganyika, rice in Tanganyika, soil conservation in Tanganyika, water development in Tanganyika, road development in Tanganyika, cottonseed in Uganda, roads in Uganda, roads in Nigeria, $3,807,072.

To France for her colonies for road development in French West Africa, iron ore in Conakry, soil erosion in Algeria, rice cultivation in Morocco, road development in Cameroons, roads in French Equatorial Africa, $3,948,932.

To Belgium for her colonies for soil conservation in Belgian Congo, navigation aids in Belgian Congo, roads in Belgian Congo, $9,046,000.

The June 30 report of ECA stated:

Hundreds of miles of roads opening up isolated areas of Africa and the British East Indies will be constructed with the help of Marshall plan (your) dollars, the Economic Cooperation Administration announced today.

Nearly 1,000,000 ECA dollars will buy United States equipment to be used in road development projects in seven British territories. The funds are coming from the special reserve fund set aside by ECA to help the development of overseas territories of Marshall plan countries, both for their own economic well-being and their contributions to the economic stability of the mother countries.

Other illustrations might be cited, but the foregoing is enough to justify the asking of this question.

What can be said for an administration and a Congress which, when we have a national debt of more than $256,000,000,000, on which there is an annual interest charge of more than $6,000,000,000 while we are fighting world war III which calls for every dollar we can raise or borrow, not only does "business as usual" here at home, but continues to send billions upon billions of dollars abroad to build up the colonial possessions of European nations?

With Mr. Truman right now calling for $54,877,000,000, is there any reason why we should not cut the additional $11,600,000,000 which he asks for purely domestic activities here at home by at least $5,200,000,000? That would still leave, for the home front, $6,400,000,000, which was the amount spent in 1948, when a Republican Congress balanced the budget for the first time in many years.

Do you wonder that I am discouraged, that when I think of Korea I grow more angry and determined, if that is possible, to do everything within my power to end the foolish, ruinous policies which, if continued, can destroy us?

No, I am not giving up. I am not even weakening. I'm sticking to that old slogan of Teddy Roosevelt, which is, "We never quit 'til the hearse comes 'round."

For Your Welfare and Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, during my entire term in Congress it has been my policy to appear in every city, village, and township in the Tenth District in person to give a report of my work. Each year it has been my policy to give every person in the district a chance to see me personally and discuss their problems with me personally. I never asked the Government to set up an office for me in various parts of the district which I could have done. I paid all expenses of office rent, office supplies, and secretarial help, as well as telephone and telegram expense out of my own pocket. All travel and hotel expenses likewise were paid by me personally. These frequent contacts with the people did not cost the taxpayers a penny.

It is my hope to come into every community again this fall. But with the war on I may be compelled to stay in Washington. That is what the people would want me to do. They expect me to stay on the job and they know I will be on the job. They know that in time of need and worry they can always call on me to help them. For that reason I may not be able to appear personally in every community as I would like to do.

People of the district expect some report from me. For that reason at my own expense I am printing and sending to the people this report. I am sending it out as an official report just in case I am not able to see them personally as I have in the past.

SAVED THOUSANDS BY REFUSING FREE MAILING

As a Member of Congress I am entitled to send out an average of 25,000 official reports or documents each month without cost to me. This right was established long before I came to Congress. I have never abused this right. In fact, I have hardly used it at all. I have not even used 5 percent of my allotment during my term in Congress.

As a Member of Congress I could have made several trips around the world at Government expense. I never abused that right. In fact, in my 8 years in Congress I have not used it at all. I have yet to make my first trip anywhere at Government expense.

The savings to the people on these two items alone on my part has more than paid my salary. When it is known that in addition each year I pay out of my own pocket an average of $2,000 per year for extra help when flooded with mail and telephone calls and telegrams, it can be realized how anxious I am to do my job with very little cost to the taxpayers.

THIS REPORT NOT COSTING THE TAXPAYERS A CENT

So if there are those who have nothing else to say who will shout that I am abusing my right to mail, simply tell them that the printing and paper cost as well as postage are paid by me personally and all the while I have been in Congress I have used less than 5 percent of my free mailing allotment. This written official report comes only because I believe the people want me to stick to my post here in Washington during wartime. From past experience the people know they can count on me for service and I will always be available when they want that service.

BEING ON THE JOB MEANS RESULTS

During my term in Congress I have not missed a single day on the job except for 7 days in 1946 when I had an operation. Outside of these 7 days I have never missed a full day's work. By a full day's work I mean from 12 to 16 hours a day. In my entire term in Congress I have been on the job every day of the week, except on Sunday morning. My record of service is known to more than 40,000 people who have called on me for help. Not one was ever turned down. For verification, all you need do is ask your friend or neighbor. I have not taken a vacation or trip during my entire term in Congress. I have always been available to the people of the district.

PROBLEMS SOLVED FOR 14,152 VETERANS

By being on the job and employing a capable staff my office is known for its efficiency and speed and willingness to help. Here is a summary of a job well done. Here, for example, is a rough summary of individual veterans' cases handled by my office to give you folks an idea of what it means to have somebody as your Congressman stay on the job:

VETERANS' CASES

Collection and adjudication of dependents' claims	4,946
Appeals for pensions	560
Veterans' loans	300
Veterans' training	495
Collection of veterans' pay	560
Insurance collections	320
Insurance records	203
Discharge cases and records	115
Information requests	2,650
GI-bill benefits	214
Location of veterans	100
Reenlistments	93
Appeal type of discharge	61
Collection of death benefits	240
Reinstatement of pensions	160
Veterans' hospitalization	116
Dependency discharges	160
Collection of pension pay	36
Retirement pension	20
Reemployment rights	114
Unemployment compensation	236
Arrangements for foreign wives to States	41
Arrangements for American wives to other countries	91
Civil-service employment	241
Collection of travel pay	94
Court-martial cases	31
War-surplus priorities	60
Insurance-premium refund	460
Farm training applications	290
Prisoner-of-war collections	60
Miscellaneous requests	950
Total veterans' cases handled during my term	14,152

BENEFITS RUN INTO MILLIONS OF DOLLARS

The benefits coming through as a result of my service ran into millions of dollars. I have not asked nor accepted a penny for any of these services. Every penny of it went directly and fully to the veterans and their dependents.

Veterans' cases always get top priority from me. No veteran can say he was let down when he asked me for help. During 1945 and 1946 when veterans' problems were acute I hired an extra secretary and paid her out of my own pocket to come to Washington and work in my office so that each request could be answered the same day it was received.

In 1944 I spent $800 of my own money to print and send a booklet to every family in the district—more than 80,000 copies—explaining what their rights and benefits were and how to contact me to receive those rights and benefits.

I am a high-ranking member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee by my own choice. There is not an office in existence where veterans can get better and more prompt and willing service than from my office. No matter what their problems might be every veteran who contacted me will verify he got action. Every case got immediate response and action.

My work for veterans is known to every national leader of the American Legion and Veterans of Foreign Wars and every service officer in the district. But the best proof is the veteran himself. Ask them and verify for yourself. Almost one out of every two veterans in the district has asked me for help in my term in Congress. There is not another office in existence that can point to such a record of faithful and prompt service to the veterans. To do the job right I have spent an average of $2,000 out of my own pocket for extra help and supplies to do the job as it should be done.

EVERY CITIZEN GOT SAME GOOD SERVICE

Since I have been in Congress more than 40,000 people of the district have written me or contacted me in some way for help and service. Not one was let down. They always got service by return mail.

These cases varied and dealt with every department of our Government. I have collected claims as old as 20 years in negotiation. If it dealt with the Federal Government, every one of the 40,000 are living proof of my devoted service to the folks back home.

I never said I was too busy. I never said to wait until the work let up. I never said, "Go see somebody else." I never passed the buck to anybody else.

I never said the Government does not give us enough help or materials and limits our work. If I could not do the work with the help and materials the Government gave me, I hired more help and bought more materials and paid for them out of my own pocket.

LETTERS FROM VETERANS' ORGANIZATIONS WHO KNOW

Read the following letters from outstanding veterans' organizations who know what is going on in Washington:

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS
OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., August 4, 1950.

Hon. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI,
Member of Congress,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR ALVIN: As final adjournment of the Eighty-first Congress draws near, I wish to express to you on behalf of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States our very high regard for you personally and our sincere appreciation for the splendid work you have performed as a member of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

Your votes on legislation relating to veterans and their dependents have been 100-percent favorable and your sympathetic and tireless efforts in behalf of veterans of all wars have been outstanding.

In our opinion, all veterans owe you "the debt immense of endless gratitude," and with warm personal regards and best wishes, I remain,

Sincerely,

OMAR B. KETCHUM,
Director.

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 15, 1950.

Hon. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN O'KONSKI: Thank you for your letter of the fourteenth in reply to mine of February 6 in reference to H. R. 7267 which you were good enough to introduce at our request.

I also appreciate your forwarding the additional copies.

Please be assured that we are deeply grateful to you for your courtesy and consideration in this and other matters.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Sincerely,

MILES D. KENNEDY,
Director.

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
DEPARTMENT OF WISCONSIN,
April 7, 1949.

Hon. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN O'KONSKI: We have followed with great interest and concern the tactics adopted on the floor of the House of Representatives by the opponents of the American Legion pension plan bill, H. R. 2681.

We have noted, however, with great satisfaction in the RECORD that you voted against adopting the motion to recommit the bill to the Veterans' Affairs Committee, and we wish to take this opportunity to extend to you our thanks for your stand in behalf of the veterans.

There are many occasions which prompt us to write to those who represent us only when we wish to register some complaint, and too often we forget to recognize their efforts in our behalf; therefore, may we again express our sincere appreciation to you for the position you had taken in the face of all opposition.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN F. O'MELIA,
Department Commander.

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS,
OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., June 8, 1949.

Hon. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI,
Member of Congress,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN O'KONSKI: In behalf of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, I wish to express to you our deep appreciation for your declared support of H. R. 4617, when it was brought up and passed by the House on June 1, 1949, and particularly for your vigorous objection to the unemployability requirement, which was a very important issue, as recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 1, 1949.

All veterans and their beneficiaries owe you a debt of gratitude for this concrete evidence of your determination to protect their best interests.

I take this opportunity also to extend to you my own personal thanks for your good work, and with continued good wishes, I am

Sincerely yours,

OMAR B. KETCHUM,
Director.

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS
OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., May 25, 1949.

Hon. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. O'KONSKI: Please accept our sincere appreciation for your forthright letter of May 21, 1949, in reply to my circular letter of May 17 with respect to H. R. 4617, a bill which would grant pensions, under certain conditions, to World War I and II veterans.

It is encouraging to note that you share our opinion with respect to the unemployability test which would be applied to veterans 65 years old or over.

Respectfully yours,

OMAR B. KETCHUM,
Director.

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS
OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., March 28, 1949.

Hon. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. O'KONSKI: This is to express the gratitude and appreciation of the national organization of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States for your steadfast loyalty and support of the traditional policy of pensions for aged and incapacitated war veterans during House consideration of the pension bill, H. R. 2681, on March 22–24, 1949. Although this bill was voted back to committee by a slender margin there is reason to believe another pension bill will be brought up for consideration in the near future.

Respectfully yours,

OMAR B. KETCHUM,
Director.

SPANISH-AMERICAN W R VETERANS

Spanish-American War veterans are today enjoying benefits of security because of my bill enacted into law in the Eightieth Congress. The law under which their benefits are being received today is my bill enacted into law. Every Spanish-American War organization in existence in the Nation has written me a letter of appreciation. Need I say any more to the veterans of this Nation?

BUSINESSMEN WILL VERIFY RESULTS

Small- and large-business men know of my record on their behalf. There are in operation today at least 100 small businesses who are in existence because of the help they have received from me. With the crisis we are now in, all indications are that it will be even worse than the last war; it is important that businessmen have somebody in Washington who will heed their pleas for help.

Sometimes it was some regulation that was hampering them. I got the regulation changed. Sometimes it was their inability to get materials. I got the materials for them. Their problems were as different as the number of cases. But all of them got action when calling upon me for help.

I have championed small business as the bulwark of our Nation. I have championed the free-enterprise system under which they operate. But let the small-business men speak for themselves.

There is not a businessman in the district who contacted me who can say I let him down. There are in my files hundreds of letters from businessmen expressing amazement at the results after contacting me for help. Many of them thought the situation hopeless and in sheer desperation decided to ask me for help. But let the businessmen speak for themselves. Here is one of hundreds of letters in my files from businessmen or business groups:

CONFERENCE OF AMERICAN SMALL BUSINESS ORGANIZATIONS,
Chicago 4, Ill.

Hon. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI,
Mercer, Wis.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN O'KONSKI: During the sessions of Congress this conference has been watching very closely the work of individual Congressmen with respect to their interest in legislation which might affect the welfare of the small-business concerns of America.

You, more than most of the other Members of the House of Representatives, have shown your active interest in the problems confronting small business and we are mindful of your efforts to aid us in solving some of the problems small business is facing, especially that large percentage of retail and wholesale trade and small manufacturing, which has been regimented and harassed by bureaucracy beyond any emergency necessity.

We wish especially to commend you for your statesmanlike stand on what are regarded as controversial issues. Your public statement to the effect that what is best for this country as a whole is also best for business as a whole and best for labor as a whole, the country as a whole is also best for business to be commended as a forthright statesman takes courage to back up the conviction.

We wish to take this opportunity of expressing to you deep appreciation for your constructive work in promoting the passage of good legislation to save our free enterprise system and private initiative in America, as typified by small business.

We also appreciate your unfailing courtesy and friendliness whenever we have had occasion to call on you in your Washington office.

I wish it were possible for me, personally, to tell every businessman throughout the Tenth Congressional District in Wisconsin that he should feel under obligation to you.

Cordially and sincerely,

FRED A. VIRKUS,
Chairman.

LABOR GETS FAIR DEAL

Labor is a most important part of our economic structure. The last few years particularly have been trying years with increased cost of living and general insecurity and doubt all over the world. With rising living costs, labor today is more concerned than ever about its security and future.

Generally speaking, labor groups are reasonable and understanding. They seek only their just due and a fair portion of our productive effort. I have found this so during my term in Congress. We have had differences of opinion and serious ones, but I always gave labor a fair deal.

I have supported and voted for increases in the minimum wage law for labor. I have supported and voted for increases in social-security benefits for labor. I have voted for and supported their rights at collective bargaining.

Labor groups who have representatives in Washington know of my fair record. But let these groups speak for themselves. Here is all the proof one needs that I have been fair to labor and worked and voted for their welfare and security. One hundred and seventy-four of the Nation's largest labor groups endorse my reelection.

LABOR.
Washington, D. C., August 3, 1950.

Hon. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: As you may know, Railway Labor's Political League has endorsed you for reelection. We carried the announcement in this week's issue of Labor, and I am sending you a copy.

If there is anything we can do to help you during the campaign, please let us know.

Sincerely,

EDWARD KEATING,
Manager.

BROTHERHOOD OF RAILROAD TRAINMEN,
Washington, D. C., August 5, 1950.

Hon. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN O'KONSKI: I take pleasure in informing you that you have been endorsed by the brotherhood for reelection from the Tenth District of Wisconsin in the primary election of September 19.

We wish you the best of luck, and you may feel free to make this letter public.

With kindest personal regards.

Respectfully,

HARRY SEE,
National Legislative Representative.

ONE HUNDRED PERCENT FARM RECORD

As far as the interests of the farmer are concerned, I have a 100-percent record. The Farmers Union Roll Call Record is the only farm group that rates me less than 100 percent. But they do give me 80 percent, which is also excellent.

I have championed the farmers' cause in REA. Likewise, the FHA and FCA have received my support. Soil conservation and crop insurance got my support. Drought aid and seed loans got my support. Improvement in rural-telephone systems got my support. Having been born and raised on a farm, I clearly understand their needs.

Full parity prices for farmers has always received my support. In every instance I voted for the best farm bill before the House. Not once did I oppose their interests. I have always viewed with alarm any tendency in falling prices for farm products.

Even beyond this, thousands of farmers asked me to help with their individual problems. In each case they got action. Not once was any farmer turned down.

I have always fought and voted against the oleo trust, which aims at the destruction of dairy farming. Likewise, I have fought against imports of farm products from foreign countries. As one who understands by background farm needs, and as one who has always worked and voted in their interests, I am proud to say I have a 100-percent farm record. It will profit the farmers nothing to send a city boy down here who has never seen the inside of a farm or who does not understand their problems.

OLD PEOPLE NEED FRIEND

One of the sad blots on our Nation is the care of our very own people who made our Nation the greatest on earth. They did a much better job of it than we in this generation are doing. They gave us a nation which was the envy of the world. They deserve better treatment than what they are now receiving.

For a nation like ours that proposes to play Santa Claus to the world, giving billions to people who never were or will be our friends, we do not do a very good job at taking care of our aged and disabled. This has been and is one of the most heartbreaking conditions in my entire experience.

We have increased old-age benefits some. But we still have a system where the aged have to beg for what they get. I have supported and voted for these increases. If we were to take just 5 percent of what we throw away all over the world, we could finance a decent old-age-pension system.

The old-age problem is not one which will always be with us. In a few years our social-security benefits will do most of this job. That is why I have also voted for and supported increased benefits and the inclusion of more people in our social-security laws.

In this work, I have the solid support and confidence of the Townsend groups and every old-age-pension organization in the Nation. Without exception, they are 100 percent behind me. I am glad to be their representative and shall continue to strive for their betterment. We can do a much better job with an old-age pension set-up. We should do a better job and we should do so at once. The increases we have made in the last few years have more than been eaten up in increased cost of living.

I shall continue to strive for their betterment. That we cannot afford it is hogwash. We cannot afford not to do it. We can easily cut spending where it is doing us no good. From what dollars we gave Communist Russia in the last 10 years would pay $60 at 60 for the rest of our generation. At least the old people would not have used that money to kill our boys as Communist Russia is now doing.

Below is one of the hundreds of letters I have received in behalf of the old folks:

THE TOWNSEND PLAN FOR NATIONAL INSURANCE,
Cleveland, Ohio.

Hon. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN O'KONSKI: Townsend Club members everywhere, both in your own congressional district and elsewhere throughout the Nation, join me in congratulating you on your successful election to the Eighty-first Congress.

We are especially gratified over your victory because you have shown by word and deed that you want America's senior citizens to get a better social-security deal. You proved your friendship when you signed petition 7 in the Eightieth Congress, the petition that sought debate and a vote on the program the Townsend Clubs advocate. We are most grateful for the help you gave us then. Our people voted for you this year because they know they can count on you to champion the cause that is closest to their hearts.

It is also a source of satisfaction to us that the Townsend congressional district council in your district, fully aware of your devotion to the problems of senior citizens, unanimously recommended your election. We are proud, indeed, that the votes cast by our members were instrumental in your victory.

Thank you for your support. Thank you for remembering the old folks. Thank you for your courage in endorsing a program that has not yet won universal acceptance in this country. We count you among the pioneers of a new social movement.

Very sincerely yours,

Dr. FRANCIS E. TOWNSEND,
Founder and President.

THIS IS MY REPORT AND MY RECORD

This, folks, is my report of my record and my work. These are the things I would talk to you about if I could come home, but the war prevents me from doing so. For your own good and mine I must stick to my post of duty regardless of any consequences. We demand it of our boys in Korea. Who am I to do less?

If you need me, call on me. In the meantime, I rest my report and record with you You are the judge—and you alone, the folks back home.

Medical Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LISTER HILL
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a timely editorial entitled "Medical Education," which was published in this morning's Washington Post.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEDICAL EDUCATION

When the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee recently tabled a bill proposing Federal aid to medical, dental, nursing and public health schools, it was not aware that a desperate need for more graduates of such schools would very speedily develop. If the need was not sufficiently plain then, it certainly ought to be so now. The Army has issued a call to reserve officers in the Medical Corps to meet the critical need arising out of the Korean crisis. As mobilization progresses, greater numbers of medical men and nurses will be needed. The Nation has far too few of them even for normal peacetime conditions.

A program to aid the schools producing such personnel cannot, of course, cure the present scarcity. But it can lay the groundwork for correction of a situation which threatens the country's health even in normal times and seriously impairs security in times like the present. The shortage of doctors is acute. The shortage of dentists is scarcely less so. The shortage of trained nurses is very much worse. The problem arises not from any dearth of young men and women eager to enter these fields but from a dearth of institutions qualified to educate them for these professions.

The proposed legislation would help accredited medical, dental, nursing and public health schools to expand their facilities and increase their enrollment. It would make a Federal contribution up to $500 for each medical student currently enrolled—a fraction of the cost of his medical education—and up to $1,000 for each new student added to a school's roster. The ceiling is set somewhat lower in the case of dental schools and nursing schools. In addition, the bill would provide up to $5,000,000 for construction aid to such institutions.

The measure was passed by the Senate but tabled until today by the House Interstate Commerce Committee. When it comes up, we hope it will receive a favorable report. No form of Federal aid can make a more direct and useful contribution to the country's health. No form of promoting the public welfare is more urgent.

Investigate Cost of Living

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTHONY F. TAURIELLO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. TAURIELLO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and resolution:

CITY OF BUFFALO,
OFFICE OF THE CITY CLERK,
August 4, 1950.

Hon. ANTHONY TAURIELLO,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to direction of the Common Council of the City of Buffalo, I enclose herewith a certified copy of resolution No. 249, C. C. P., July 25, 1950, re: Investigate present cost of living.

Yours truly,

JAMES W. MOCKLER,
Acting City Clerk.

Resolution 249

Resolution to investigate cost of living

Whereas the United States of America is now engaged in resisting communistic inspired aggression in Korea for the preservation of peace in the world and maintaining the prestige of the United Nations; and

Whereas it is the responsibility and obligation of citizens of all walks of life, and especially business establishments engaged in the production of commodities necessary to maintain a decent American standard of living, to wit, to operate their establishments at a fair profit without exploitation of the American citizenry by increasing prices on such commodities without justification; and

Whereas since the invasion of Korea by the communistic forces the cost of living of necessary commodities has spiraled to an unprecedented high, thus causing an unbearable hardship to the citizens of the United States, and especially those on fixed salaries, old-age pension, white-collar workers, and the average working man and woman in general; and

Whereas there is evidence that the increased mark-ups have been made on commodities predicated on labor and material cost prior to the Korean invasion; such mark-ups are not justified and suggest profiteering: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the common council go on record memorializing the Congress of the United States of America to enact necessary legislation to create a special congressional committee to investigate profiteering and exploitation of the citizens through unnecessary and unjustified increases in prices; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, to the Congressmen of western New York, including the Honorable CHESTER GORSKI, the Honorable ANTHONY (JACK) TAURIELLO, and the Honorable WILLIAM PFEIFFER.

Adopted.

Ayes, 15. Noes, none.

Attest: Dr. J. J. TRONOLONE,
City Clerk.

The Portland Plan Against Hoarding

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARGARET CHASE SMITH
OF MAINE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an address I made in Portland, Maine, Sunday evening, August 6, 1950, at the rally of the Portland (Maine) plan against hoarding.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Our country is in far greater peril than most of us realize. It is in far greater peril than we have been told or permitted to know. The principal reason for the withholding of this grave fact from the American public has been the belief that the American people might not be able to take it and might become panicky.

There is more than one way to succumb to emotional panic. There is more than one reaction of panic. Panic is not measured in terms of physical fear alone. Panic is often measured and evidenced in terms of greed and selfishness.

Sometimes a person's courage is found to be very thin in depth. Too often we mistake bravado for courage—bravado that asserts itself only when things are going along smoothly without conflict—but bravado that evaporates when the going gets tough.

Courage and patriotism cannot be accomplished and proved by oratory. They are produced by acts, not mere words. One has to experience fear in order to have courage. One has to make personal sacrifices in order to prove patriotism.

Courage follows fear—it does not precede it. Patriotism follows sacrifice—it does not precede it.

World War I and World War II tested to the fullest the courage and patriotism of Americans. They were not found wanting.

The Korean war has tested the courage and patriotism of many Americans—especially those boys who are fighting for our defense thousands of miles away in Korea.

But our fight is not localized in Korea. Nor is our test of patriotism limited to the members of our Armed Forces.

We have a civilian fight of our own back here at home. Now basically that fight is twofold. The first part of it is to crush the traitorous communism that seeks to destroy our way of life and everything that we respect, cherish, and hold dear. Communism is no longer merely a scare word. It is an alarming menace that has taken full advantage of the constitutional right of free speech and personal protection guaranteed by our free republic.

Communism seeks to destroy our democratic liberty and freedom by the abuse of that very liberty and freedom. Communism seeks to force the suicide of democracy in its tolerance of free speech.

The fight against communism is not the fight of our Government alone. It is your fight too. And you can do more to crush communism than your Government can. Communism can't be destroyed by laws alone. Instead it will only be driven underground all the more. Communism can best be destroyed by the individual will, courage, and patriotism of each American.

The second part of our fight here at home is self-control and the will to personal sacrifice. The opposite to self-control is panic, for panic is the loss of self-control. The opposite of personal sacrifice is selfishness.

Hoarding results from panic and selfishness. Hoarding is patriotism in reverse. Hoarding is full retreat from conscience. Hoarding in time of national crisis and war is despicable. And don't let anyone gloss over our present crisis as merely "police action," because for all practical purposes we are in a national crisis and we are at war.

Hoarders give comfort and aid to our enemy—and to that extent turn their backs on our country and line up with the enemy. One hoarder does more damage to our national security at a time like this than the good that 10 patriots provide by their personal sacrifices. The slogan so admirably puts it, "Hoarding Helps Communism." The blunt fact is that there is no place or excuse for hoarders in our national security.

Yes; hoarding is a direct challenge and threat to us in our fight at home—and on both parts of that fight—that part of the fight against communism, because "Hoarding Helps Communism"—and that part of the fight for patriotic self-control and personal sacrifice, because hoarding is a deady subversive against self-control and personal sacrifice.

The American people are on trial—each one of us. Our boys fighting in Korea have the toughest role—they are challenged with death and injury. But those of us here at home must face the test of remaining calm and keeping our self-control.

What you and I as civilians do will be watched by every Russian spy and Communist in this country. They will keep a close eye on the public's reaction simply because it may indicate what we will do when the going gets tougher.

If we show signs of hysteria and personal selfishness against national interests—if we should show an inability to remain calm, fail to practice self-control or to accept even minor sacrifices or inconveniences, Russian agents here will probably report back to the Kremlin that the American people will be an easy prey—or suckers, if you prefer that designation—to planned panic and chaotic sabotage.

If we can't maintain self-control and resist fear buying and other panic action at this time, what would we do if Russia attacks us with atomic bombs? The implied answer isn't a good one.

But if we show an ability of self-control—avoid shortages by keeping our heads and buying just we normally buy, and disregard those of our neighbors who talk about the smart thing being to stock up on food and other commodities—then there will be a strong indication to the men in the Kremlin that the civilian American public is possessed of such courage and determination that they cannot be thrown into panic by Communist attacks on this country.

Such a display of restraint and disciplined control of ourselves surely would discourage Stalin from any hopes of full exploitation of mass panic here. More than that, it would help discourage the Communists from making an attack, the potential success of which would be doubtful, and the potential failure of which would appear to be probable.

This may seem to be a little thing. But the little things often betray the big things—the little things make up the big picture.

Our boys in Korea are risking their lives for our own protection and even for our own convenience. Surely then, it is not asking too much for those of us back home, in the comfort of our homes, to practice self-control and to resist the temptation to stock up.

And those who might stock up would find in the event of war, that they would be caught up with. The temporary gain they might have achieved would be wiped out by drastic wartime controls that would ferret out the hoarders. And if war doesn't come, surely those hoarders will literally be left holding the bag with food stocks subject to spoilage.

No one can gain from hoarding food or other commodities by Americans—except Joe Stalin and his associates.

It is seldom that I make a speech on the floor of the United States Senate. I don't talk unless I have something of importance to say. Thursday I made one of my rare speeches in the Senate.

I had something important to talk about. I had something to report to the Senate about which I had the greatest pride. I was talking about my home State of which I am always proud. But this time I had unusual pride—for I was reporting the Portland plan to the Senate.

What you have started here has given me a deep-seated pride that squares my shoulders and makes me stand a little taller. With the Portland plan, you have given new and fuller meaning of Maine's motto of Dirigo for you are truly leading the way and setting the example for the rest of the country in the fight against hoarding.

What you are doing should be an inspiration to the rest of the country—an inspiration and campaign that I hope will sweep the country from Maine to California. I shall wear the antihoarding button you have given me with as much pride as a soldier wears a military medal. I expect that people here will clamor to sign the antihoarding pledges and obtain their buttons and wear them proudly.

Surely these buttons are no less than the badges of the soldiers of self-control. May that army of soldiers of self-control in Maine grow into the thousands. May that army of soldiers of self-control in our Nation grow into the millions out of this first mobilization of self-control here in Portland, Maine.

Young American Medal Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. WHITAKER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. WHITAKER. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include therein a letter written by Mr. Justice Clark on August 2 to my dear friend and fellow colleague, the Honorable FRANK L. CHELF, of Kentucky, in which Mr. Clark congratulates Mr. CHELF upon his ceaseless efforts and his untiring work to enact into law H. R. 157, a bill that would for the first time in the history of this Nation recognize the youth of America by awarding an appropriate medal in the name of the Congress of the United States and presented by the President on behalf of Congress for outstanding bravery and unusual service rendered to a given community.

For years, Mr. Speaker, the nations of the world, including America, have recognized bravery and valor on the field of battle by awarding various medals of honor but never, I repeat, has the Congress of the United States heretofore extended to a civilian of any age such recognition. It is fitting and proper, Mr. Speaker, that the youth of America be awarded this distinction and it is refreshing to know that such has been made possible by the efforts of FRANK CHELF, who incidentally is a person of sterling qualities and who fits in every way that saying that we use so often that "to know him is to love him." Frank, as many of us know, was an orphan and his interest in the youth of America which he has portrayed throughout his entire life is so highly commendable, therefore it is with extreme personal pleasure that I join with Mr. Justice Clark and the membership of the House in extending sincere congratulations to our colleague and friend, FRANK CHELF. It is indeed a job well done and long after the President of the United States and the Membership of this House and Senate have gone on, our friend Frank will be remembered for being the one who conceived and brought about this recognition of the youth of our Nation. I again repeat, it is indeed a job well done.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., August 2, 1950.

Hon. FRANK L. CHELF,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: I noticed that the young American medal bill was finally approved by the Senate.

After working so faithfully on this bill for such a long time I am sure it must give you great satisfaction to see it finally go through and I do want to send my congratulations. Much good will come from this.

With kind personal regards, I am

Sincerely,

TOM CLARK.

DEAR FRANK: You certainly deserve great credit for this legislation—congratulations! It will mean much to young Americans.

State Department Loyalty Investigation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD resolutions adopted by Williams Bridge Post 1070, Department of New York, American Legion, and various newspaper articles, relating to the investigation of the State Department.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Resolution of Williamsbridge Post, No. 1070, Department of New York, American Legion]

Whereas the United States is now actively engaged in a war in the Far East, "police action" notwithstanding; and

Whereas this condition was brought about through the disastrous policy of the State Department, which refused aid to the Republic of South Korea after millions in arms and ammunition had been voted for it by the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas gallant American servicemen are now dying in the hills of Korea because of this lack of arms and equipment to the South Korean Army; and

Whereas the charges of Senator JOSEPH MCCARTHY, a former member of the Marine Corps and at present a Legionnaire, regarding Communist influence in the State Department have not been disproven to the satisfaction of the American people; and

Whereas the labored report of the Tydings committee, appropriately termed a "whitewash," has failed to allay the fears of the American people by incompletely, inconsiderately, and inconclusively terminating its investigation and calling Senator MCCARTHY'S charges a hoax and a fraud; and

Whereas the State Department officials named by Senator MCCARTHY have failed to purge themselves of the Communist taint to the satisfaction of the American people; and

Whereas it would be disastrous to the welfare of this country to continue to allow the present State Department officials to remain in their positions of influence and continue to shape American foreign policy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Williamsbridge Post, No. 1070, American Legion, go on record demanding the resignation or dismissal from Government service of Secretary of State Dean Acheson, Advisers Owen Lattimore, John Stewart Service, John P. Davies, John Carter Vincent, and others of like sentiment still in Government service who have had any influence in shaping American far eastern policy; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to Bronx County American Legion, and that it be brought to the attention of the national body through proper channels; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be dispatched to all Bronx County posts for their consideration and similar action.

FAIR ENOUGH

(By Westbrook Pegler)

The great blast of favorable propaganda which the New York Herald Tribune and the New York Times published on two successive days, Sunday, July 30, and Monday the 31st, vindicating Owen Lattimore and damning Senator JOE MCCARTHY, of Wisconsin, becomes the more interesting and significant on better knowledge of certain facts.

To summarize this political performance in the guise of literary criticism, the Herald Tribune and the Times each gave this book all of page one of its Sunday book review section plus a breakover and each followed this lavish plug for the defense with another vindication of Lattimore the next morning.

The Monday pieces were three columns wide and about half the depth of the page. None of the four even pretended to confine the discussion to the literary quality of the work. A token tribute to the art may be said to exist in such phrases as "fighting book," "intensely personal story containing elements of nightmare" and "it is a story which makes one shiver."

There is an assumption that the propagandists who wrote the pieces somehow are qualified to pronounce the last word and vindicate him. This is not a new development in New York papers.

The Herald Tribune habitually has plugged political issues and personalities distinctly to the left of center, and slurred or ignored issues and writers to the right.

This book is advertised as an Atlantic Monthly Press book, meaning a book published by the press of the Atlantic Monthly magazine whose tendencies have been marked and well known to many for a long time, although they occasionally surprise an unobservant old client of the double-dome press.

But beneath this line about the Atlantic Monthly Press there is another as follows: "Little Brown & Co., Boston."

The editor of Little, Brown & Co. is Angus Cameron.

Against the background of MCCARTHY'S charges on the Senate floor and in committee that Lattimore was a Communist and "the top Russian espionage agent in the United States," the political background of Mr. Cameron is unusually interesting.

A press release of the national Wallace for President committee, dated March 23, 1948, when Wallace had the backing of the Communists, names Cameron as a member of that committee.

The program of the Progressive Citizens of America, which launched the Wallace candidacy, dated October 25, 1947, names Cameron as a sponsor.

The New Masses, a Communist magazine, issue of October 14, 1947, page 24, reports that Cameron was a speaker at a protest meeting on behalf of Howard Fast, author of a eulogy of Tito, the Communist dictator of Yugoslavia. Fast had been sentenced to prison for contempt of Congress.

Cameron was named in the catalog of 1945 of the Samuel Adams School of Social Studies, of Boston, as one of the trustees. This school was cited on the official list of the attorney general of the United States as communistic and subversive.

Cameron was listed as a signer of a brief amicus curiae presented to the Supreme Court of the United States, October term, 1949, by a group called The Cultural Workers in Motion Pictures and Other Arts, on behalf of the so-called Hollywood 10 who were sent to prison for refusing to answer whether or not they were Communists.

Cameron was named as sponsor of a dinner in honor of Henry Wallace on September 12, 1948, after Bubblehead's defeat as the Communists' candidate for President but before his repudiation of the Communists, Russia, and his party on the Soviet invasion of Korea.

Cameron was named as a sponsor of the Call for the Bill of Rights Congress, held July 16 and 17, 1949, which was cited by the Attorney General as communistic and subversive. This "congress" attacked the FBI for going after Communists.

Cameron was named on the program of a conference held by the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy, January 23 to 25, 1948. This committee was cited as Communist and subversive on the Attorney General's list.

His name was listed as that of a signer of a release from the Council for Pan-American Democracy, June 5, 1945. This council was cited as communistic and subversive by the Attorney General.

Cameron was listed by the Daily Worker as a member of a committee to welcome the Reverend Hewlett Johnson, the Red Dean of Canterbury, on September 22, 1948. The Archbishop of Canterbury asked churchmen in other countries to ignore the Red dean.

In the New Masses, a Communist magazine, dated October 28, 1947, page 2, Cameron is named as a sponsor of Mainstream, a Communist quarterly.

Referring to the list of sponsors for the Henry Wallace dinner in September 1949, Cameron's name is found in alphabetical order after those of John Abt, a member of the Vermont community where Lattimore bought a house, who refused to answer under oath whether or not he was a Communist, and Harry Bridges.

Paul Draper's name follows Angus Cameron's, and the names of Frederick Vanderbilt Field, William Gailmor, the thief, and Ben Gold, of the furriers' union, ensue in order.

This and other information was available to the propagandists for Lattimore's book if it was not known to them. It is presented for their consideration. It remains to be seen whether their political endorsement of Lattimore's book will be in any way changed.

FAIR ENOUGH

(By Westbrook Pegler)

On Sunday, July 30, the New York Herald Tribune and the New York Times devoted the whole of page 1 of their respective ostensible literary review sections to whooping propaganda for a self-serving book by Owen Lattimore, who had on the Senate floor been called the top Russian spy by Senator JOE MCCARTHY.

In each case there was a break-over into the inside pages.

The Herald Tribune's job was done by John K. Fairbank, professor of history at Harvard and chairman of the China program for the university's committee on international and regional studies, a loud and furious title which may signify little but, on the other hand, may signify much.

The Times' article was written by R. L. Duffus, described as "a member of the Times editorial staff who writes frequently on civil rights and allied subjects."

As though that were not enough to ballyhoo Lattimore's defense, consisting of another monumental disparagement of another earnest campaigner against treason in the Government, both the Herald Tribune and the Times gave the book a double take on Monday.

Each carried a spread the width of three normal columns extending from the top of the page practically to the fold.

The tenor was the same and from the professional editorial standpoint these were repetitions and therefore unjustified except by a determination of the managements to plead Lattimore's cause and discredit his accuser.

Moreover, The Times, in the Sunday book section, carried a two-column ad more than half the depth of the page quoting from the Duffus piece published in the same issue and from Fairbank's piece in the H.-T. and stating, jubilantly, in each case, that the article occupied the front page. Other laudatory opinions were quoted from Francis Biddle, William L. Shirer and Edgar Snow.

Biddle was one of Roosevelt's numerous undistinguished, to say the best of them, Attorneys General. He is remembered for a political pilgrimage to Sidney Hillman at one of the conventions which nominated Roosevelt during the time when the Communists were permeating the Government, and is a committed partisan of the political party which is Lattimore's codefendant.

Shirer is a former run-of-the-mine reporter who lived the easy continental life for pleasant years between the wars and became a broadcaster, which is not a learned profession nor even, on the whole, a respectable one from the standpoints of intellectual and political breadth.

Snow is a political reporter for the Saturday Evening Post for foreign affairs. It would have been no more than fair to the readers of this advertisement to state the facts of the political background of Shirer and Snow.

The Herald Tribune's policy of log-rolling books of a tone consonant with the "liberal" line is well known, having been shown up many times over a term of years. The Times is less uninhibited. The term "liberal" in this usage is a deceptive euphemism.

Often it is applied to politicians who try to impose dictatorial conditions on the people particularly through the medium of unions which are used as a sub-government to set up a despotism under the patronage of government.

Continuing his campaign against Lattimore, whose innocence was proclaimed by a vote of three Senators on strict party lines, Senator McCarthy last week set forth two interesting coincidences.

First, Lattimore bought a half-interest in a house in a region of Vermont secretly infested by Communists and notorious New Dealers of the Frankfurter alumni or cult who refused to testify whether or not they were Communists.

He bought it from Vilhjalmur Stefansson, sometimes known as Bill Stevenson, who was named more than 30 times in various connections, but of a general type, in the records of the House Committee on Un-American activities.

He soon sold the house and Senator McCARTHY before the Senate identified the buyers as avowed Communists, naming them as Ordway and Mary Southard, husband and wife. He said Ordway was the Communist candidate for Governor of Alabama in 1942 and Mary a Communist candidate for the Alabama State Senate in the same year.

Senator McCARTHY thought it significant that Lattimore bought his house from Stefansson, of all people, and sold it to the Southards, of all people.

The blazing indignation of the reviewers of Lattimore's book would be much more convincing and reassuring if it had been expressed in the defense of many individuals who have been damned without trial or proof by other Members and committees of Congress and by private societies as Fascists and hate mongers.

These terms are equally injurious and are applied with intent to smear the victims by the process of association and insinuation often without the slightest evidence of association. The political characters of the seller and the buyers with whom Lattimore dealt may be pure coincidence.

It may be true, as Lattimore said, that the Southards were complete strangers about whom I knew nothing and of whom I had previously never heard. But, upon examination, that statement still does not exclude the possibility set forth by Senator McCARTHY that the Southards were put into the situation by the Communist Party as buyers.

That could be a fact even though Lattimore knew nothing about the Southards and never had heard of them.

Senator McCARTHY insisted that the Government files had been stripped of significant data concerning many persons and that he was denied access to official information.

Withholding judgment on Lattimore, I argue that the publicity here lavished on his book stands in sensational contrast to the treatment of George Morganstern's Pearl Harbor, Charles Beard's President Roosevelt and the Coming of World War II, and John T. Flynn's The Road Ahead.

CAPITAL CIRCUS

(By Ruth Montgomery)

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 7.—A heretofore undisclosed chapter in the fascinating career of Owen (Ordeal by Slander) Lattimore, which even Senator JOSEPH MCCARTHY overlooked, has just come to light.

It can here be revealed for the first time that in the late 1940's, the Owen Lattimores and a group of Commie suspects, left-wingers, and fellow travelers helped found and finance radio station WQQW here in the Nation's Capital.

Mrs. Lattimore served on its board of directors.

Lattimore, who stoutly denies MCCARTHY's charges that he is a Communist, recently took his case to the people in a book entitled "Ordeal by Slander" and published by Little, Brown & Co. In it he writes, "I have never advocated the Communist cause, and have no Communist connections."

The office address listed by Owen and Eleanor Lattimore as stockholders of WQQW in 1947 was 1710 G Street NW. Strangely enough, this was the identical address at that time of the short-lived Committee of One Thousand, a group of left-wingers formed to smear the House Un-American Activities Committee.

TELEPHONE NUMBERS 8666 AND 8665

Apparently the Committee of One Thousand and Lattimore's Institute of Pacific Relations shared the same suite, since their telephone numbers were District 8666 and District 8665, respectively.

The owner of the building was Samuel J. Rodman, a fellow stockholder in WQQW, who last year refused to answer a long list of questions posed by the Un-American Activities Committee concerning Communist activities on the ground that it might incriminate him.

Rodman's wife, Bella, who has been accused before the committee of being a dues-paying member and heavy contributor to the Communist Party, was also a WQQW stockholder. Bella, a native of Warsaw, Poland, is being cited this week by the Un-American Activities Committee for contempt of Congress.

Both Samuel and Bella Rodman admitted making heavy contributions to the Southern Conference for Human Welfare, an organization cited by the committee as subversive, but Mrs. Rodman refused to tell committee members whether she was a member of the Communist Party for fear that it might incriminate her.

Samuel's brother, Morris Rodman, an original trustee of WQQW and its president since the reorganization last summer, has also frequently been mentioned in testimony before the Un-American Activities Committee.

Morris Rodman, born in Russia in 1903 and naturalized in Baltimore in 1928, was permitted by the Federal Communications Commission August 11, 1949, to take over control of the stock of some 200 stockholders, including apparently that of the Lattimores.

Another stockholder at the time of the Lattimores' connection with WQQW was Sol B. Minowitz, who, according to public hearings before the Un-American Activities Committee, received $57,000 from the Russian Embassy for printing the Soviet Bulletin in his Superior Print Shop. Mrs. Minowitz, as a subpenaed witness, refused to answer whether she was a Communist Party member, but admitted belonging to the Washington Bookshop, an organization cited by the Attorney General as a Communist front.

Two more stockholders with the Lattimores were John P. and Rose Leaf Anderson. About the former, the Un-American Activities Committee reported last year: "During the course of the committee's investigation, it was reported that John Anderson was a member of the white-collar branch of the Communist Party of the District of Columbia and that meetings of that branch of the Communist Party had been held in his home."

ADMIT INVESTING IN RADIO STATION

It identified Anderson as the treasurer and an executive board member of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare and as a member of the Washington branch of the American League for Peace and Democracy and the Washington Committee for Aid to China, both cited as subversive by the Un-American Activities Committee.

Both Mrs. Anderson, who was born in Russia 59 years ago, and Swedish-born Anderson admitted to the committee that they had invested several thousand dollars in WQQW and had contributed to the Southern Conference for Human Welfare, but declined to say whether they were Communists for fear of incriminating themselves.

"Have you made any large contributions for the benefit of the Communist Party?" asked committee counsel, Frank S. Tavenner, Jr., of Mrs. Anderson in June 1949.

"Mrs. ANDERSON. I refuse to answer. It might incriminate me."

"Mr. TAVENNER. Were you a member of the white-collar branch of the Communist Party in 1944, and the holder of membership card 53456?"

"Mrs. ANDERSON. I refuse to answer for the same reason."

"Mr. TAVENNER. Are you a stockholder in radio station WQQW?"

"Mrs. ANDERSON. Yes, I am."

In summing up its investigation, the Un-American Activities Committee wrote, "During the course of the committee's investigation of Bella Rodman, it was reported that she was responsible for the sustaining fund of the Communist Party of the District of Columbia and that she has discussed Communist Party financial affairs with Martin Chancey, former Communist organizer in the District of Columbia."

RECEIVED $2,000,000 FHA LOANS

Of Samuel Rodman, who was naturalized in 1927, the committee wrote, "It was ascertained that he had been the recipient of loans totaling more than $2,000,000, which were to be used in the construction of housing enterprises under permission granted by the Federal Housing Authority.

"During the committee's investigation, it was reported that Rodman had been associated with the Friends of the Soviet Union, that he had attended Communist Party meetings of a public nature, that he had made contributions for the benefit of the Communist Party in the District of Columbia, through his wife, and that he had discussed Communist Party affairs with Martin Chancey."

Samuel Rodman, a former UNRRA executive in Yugoslavia and Egypt, refused to discuss his alleged Communist associations but denied having been a member of the Communist Party of the United States. Morris Rodman has not yet been questioned by the Un-American Activities Committee.

Neither have the Lattimores.

Appointments to the Courts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement I have prepared regarding appointments to the United States courts by President Truman, together with a letter I wrote to the President on August 1, 1950.

There being no objection, the statement and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR WILEY CONDEMNS PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S HUMOROUS ANSWER REGARDING OVERLOADING OF COURTS BY DEMOCRAT JUDGES

Mr. President, last Tuesday, August 1, I wrote again to the President of the United States asking him to correct the terrible overloading of Democratic judges on the Federal court of the United States. I thus renewed a fight which I have waged for some years now for the purpose of securing a balance on the Federal judiciary. I feel that now, more than ever before, it is important that as a symbol of national unity the President begin to appoint able, well-qualified Republican jurists to posts like the two pending Illinois vacancies.

I pointed out in my letter that in 17 years since the New Deal came to power, of 192 Presidential appointments to the bench, 184 were Democrats and only 8 were Republicans. Such lop-sided unbalance makes a farce of our judicial system.

While this extreme Presidential partisanship might be considered to be the mere extension of the old Jacksonian psychology "to the victor belongs the spoils," I, for one, feel that it is extremely harmful to the best interests of the American Republic and intolerable in this day and age. I would say that if a series of Republican Presidents were guilty of the same poor judgment. I wrote to President Truman very frankly mentioning that my own party has not always been farsighted enough to recognize that fact. But we all know that two parties' wrongs do not make a right, and besides, never before have there been so many court positions, has there been such lop-sidedness, nor have Federal judgeships been so important in affecting the lives of 150,000,000 Americans.

President Truman very kindly and promptly answered under date of August 4. Now, I do want to compliment Mr. Truman and his White House secretariat for their real speed in answering, considering the fact that the President is tremendously busy these days with problems arising out of the Korean emergency. I say that very sincerely, that the President is to be highly complimented for his speed in responding.

TRUMAN RESPONSE WAS A GRIM JOKE

I do wish that I could supplement that compliment and say that the President gave some clear-cut indication to me that he would correct this basic grievance. Unfortunately no such assurance was forthcoming.

I should like to read the President's brief and grimly humorous response:

"DEAR SENATOR: I read with a great deal of interest your letter of August 1 and I am more than happy to have your views on the appointment of judges to the Federal courts.

"It has always been my policy to be very careful in the selection of men who sit on the Federal bench and I am very glad to have your endorsement of that policy."

"I'SE REGUSTED" OVER TRUMAN REPLY

Now, Mr. President, it seems that Mr. Truman either did not read my message very carefully or that he has such a keen sense of ironic humor that he felt he could joke about it. Very obviously, I did not, to use his words, "endorse his policy." All in all, to paraphrase a certain comedian, "I'se regusted" over the President's reply. Seriously, I believe that Mr. Truman's reply will be an extreme disappointment to the American bar—fair-minded judges and attorneys of both political parties—and that, more important, it will be a disappointment to the American public.

I say, Mr. President, that we have had business as usual, we have had politics as usual, and the Chief Executive insists on having patronage as usual even during a war.

I want to appeal, therefore, to his sense of justice and his sense of fair play once again. I do not make this appeal as a Republican for the Republican Party. On the contrary, as I pointed out, the mere fact that the President appoints a Republican jurist would not of itself necessarily help the Republican Party. (On the contrary, the President usually chooses a type of Republican who lacks the faith of the Republican Party.)

Be that as it may, I want to appeal for a beginning toward the correcting of this deplorable unbalance on the Federal courts. I ask unanimous consent that the text of my letter of August 1 be printed at this point in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
August 1, 1950.

Re restoring the balance on the judiciary.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
Blair House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am respectfully writing to you concerning a matter which I have previously taken up on several occasions with yourself and with the Department of Justice. I hesitate to intrude upon your busy schedule, recognizing, of course, that you are tremendously concerned with a thousand and one critical problems arising out of the Korean emergency. I present this matter however, namely the restoration of the balance on the Federal courts, because I feel it is of importance to the prosecution of the defense effort as well as being important on a long-range peacetime basis.

As you so well know, during the last two decades, appointments to the courts of the United States have been almost exclusively on a partisan, Democratic basis. Thus, during the hearings conducted on Supreme Court Justice Sherman Minton's confirmation, it was brought out that from 1933 onward, 192 Federal justices had been appointed and of that number, all but eight were Democrats. This unbalance is particularly serious on our Supreme Court, where there are eight Democrats and one Republican in contrast to the period from 1922 to 1932, when there were six Republicans and three Democrats and to the still more balanced situation from 1917 to 1921, when there were five Republicans and four Democrats.

I wish each of the present justices of the Supreme Court long life and good health, and it is obvious that the present unbalance will continue for some time there. But insofar as the rest of the Nation's courts are concerned, for example, insofar as the filling of the 3 present vacancies on the Illinois bench are involved, I respectfully submit that in the interests of national unity, your administration would be performing a patriotic act in the appointment of a number of ably qualified Republican jurists.

It is obvious that all of the major wartime statutes which we will write will sooner or later be tested and interpreted by the courts, but how can the millions of Americans who voted Republican feel they are getting a square break when the courts are obviously completely overloaded by Democratic appointees? "Business as usual" must go out the window during the war effort but so should "politics as usual" and "patronage as usual."

I am writing, therefore, not in the interests of the Republican Party (because the appointment of a few Republican jurists of your own selection will actually not do any particular good to that party); I am writing in the interests of the great American tradition of checks and balances.

It is obvious that the Republican Party, when it has been in power, has not always exercised the vision and judgment which I am now urging. It, too, in the past has occasionally been partially guilty of appointing a disproportionate number of its own members to the courts. But let me point out these current circumstances:

1. Never before have the courts been so important. They are taking up today more momentous issues affecting more people than ever before in American history.

2. Never before have there been so many court positions and has there been such a disproportionate overloading of those positions by members of one political party.

I believe that any Republican to be considered for a judicial appointment should have the same high standards of—

Experience and ability;

Integrity and unassailable honesty;

Complete devotion to the American Constitution and to the free-enterprise system.

That I would ask of Democratic nominees.

I believe that if you were to appoint worthy Republicans—men who are not rubber stamps of the Democratic administration but men of high independent Republican ideals, if you were to do this, your patriotic act would be a tremendous shot in the arm for the American people. Just as the national administration should take in various Republicans in the executive field of domestic and foreign policy in order to assure bipartisan unity, so I believe should Republican jurists be appointed.

I think that it is a terrible loss to the Nation that in all of these 17 years the magnificent talents of scores of great Republican attorneys have been denied to public judicial office because they have been frozen out due to their political affiliation.

It is inconsistent for us, I believe, to draft 19-year-olds into the Army and give them a gun, to recruit older workers into war factories and put them behind a machine, but to fail to use the tremendous talents of these GOP lawyers who could serve with distinction on the bench on behalf of the Nation in this grave hour of need.

I trust, therefore, that my appeal will be considered not on a bipartisan basis but on a nonpartisan basis in which I assure you it is sincerely intended. Let us not breed cynicism on the part of our people to the effect that "to the victor belongs 99 percent of the spoils," including the spoiling of the national welfare.

Sincerely yours,

ALEXANDER WILEY.

Color Television

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I desire to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD three letters which have a bearing on the controversial subject of color television. The first letter is signed by David Sarnoff, chairman of the board, Radio Corp. of America, and is addressed to the Honorable Wayne Coy, Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission. The second letter is written by Mr. Frank Stanton, president of Columbia Broadcasting System, to Mr. Coy. The third letter was written by me to Mr. Coy.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RADIO CORP. OF AMERICA,
New York, N. Y., August 2, 1950.

Hon. WAYNE COY,
Chairman, Federal Communications Commission, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN COY: We write with reference to the color television matter which is pending before the Commission.

Items have appeared in the trade press that there are those who are in favor of delay in the disposition of this matter by the Commission.

On behalf of RCA and NBC we wish to reiterate that we have not and do not favor any delay in the establishment, by the FCC, of commercial standards for color television.

Sincerely yours,

RADIO CORP. OF AMERICA,
DAVID SARNOFF,
Chairman of the Board.

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC.,
New York, N. Y., August 4, 1950.

Hon. WAYNE COY,
Federal Communications Commission, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Commission is aware, I believe, that there is talk in industry circles that some groups would welcome delay in determination of the color television case.

I would like to underscore what the record already makes clear—that Columbia has always wanted and now wants a prompt and definitive decision adopting a system of color television and fixing full commercial standards therefor. We are not and never have been in favor of any deferment whatever of a definitive color decision.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK STANTON,
President.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
Washington, D. C., August 4, 1950.

Hon. WAYNE COY,
Chairman, Federal Communications Commission, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We have noted with great interest copies of letters sent you during the last 2 days from two of the leaders in the television industry with respect to the pending color television decision. We presume these letters grow out of the current rumors and intimations in the trade press that a final and conclusive decision is to be postponed indefinitely, using the war as an alibi. We put little credence in these incredible fears.

These letters from the Columbia Broadcasting System and the Radio Corp. prove conclusively once and for all that the selfish interests conspiring for delays are not the pioneers who have fought the hard battle in the laboratory and expended millions of dollars to make this amazing recreational and educational development available now to the American people.

On the other hand, busybody scandalmongers are spreading these stories for a wicked purpose and obviously not in the public interest. They ignore the 9 months of tedious, detailed, and searching hearings only recently completed—the most intensive ever held by an administrative agency. They forget the time and money spent by CTI, RCA, and CBS in presenting their cases. They overlook the patience, the continuous attendance, and the intense study and concentration which each Commissioner has given the mass of testimony which was presented in the tense atmosphere of good American rivalry and free-enterprise competition. They overlook, too, the fact that this vital matter has been before the Commission for almost a full decade. Any further delay will place us far behind the rest of the world in this potentially phenomenal improvement of the television art.

Most certainly, the Commission now has before it all of the basic and scientific facts which can be presented. The eminent and unbiased committee of scientists, popularly known as the Condon committee, has declared unequivocally that color television is ready now. Every Member of the Senate is receiving a copy of the Condon report with a covering letter from me calling attention to its findings. Already, more than 1,100 copies have been sold by the Government Printing Office and Senators are requesting more and more copies for their constituents.

The employment of the current Korean crisis as an alibi for delay by the detractors of color television shows how desperate they are for any excuse for procrastination, deferment, or weasely worded proposed findings which would have the deadly effect of delay itself. When delay is the objective, of course any expedient will serve the purpose but it is wholly unrealistic for these selfish interests to seize upon the war needs as an excuse; it indicates an utter lack of appreciation of the important part played by electronics in modern war. The immediate commercial utilization of color television could be of vast aid to the defense effort in testing jet engine flame colors, observation of guided missiles, surveillance of various atomic processes, and in a number of other still secret processes and developments. Whether or not the Korean conflict, or even a major expansion of it, would seriously affect production in the electronics industry is beside the point. Korea is not part of the testimony in the record and even if it were honestly believed that a decision for immediate utilization of color could not be put into effect because of the war, the commission has no duty or responsibility or even right to use such an anticipated development as a prop for "no decision now," or for a proposed or tentative decision, or for anything other than a clear-cut definitive decision based on the record before it. I am certain that you will agree that to do otherwise would subject the commissioners to the sharpest criticism.

However, I find it hard to believe such expediences will be resorted to when I recall that the two most recent Commissioners to appear before us for confirmation, Messers. Webster and Sterling, are firmly on the record as favoring a quick and positive decision on color television; in fact, they took considerable credit personally for "pushing" their colleagues into doing something about color. The viewpoint of at least two other commissioners with respect to the advisability of a speedy and definitive color decision which would authorize immediate operation on existing channels is well known. I have such confidence in your common sense, responsibility to duty, appreciation for effective public relations, and deep concern for the general public interest that I have no qualms about your personal position. Therefore it is obvious that at least a majority believes that a decision now would in no way prevent future development of improvements in color which could and would be made as experience is gained from actual operation in the present TV band.

Consequently, I am grateful to the present Commissioners for their constructive approach to the imperative need for speeding the commercial operation of color television. I know the devious character of the opponents. They have tried to bring pressure on Congress also. They will not hesitate to confuse the issue, spread false rumors, and even attempt to induce Commissioners to postpone, equivocate, or hedge.

You know my deep concern over the color question but I am equally as concerned over the standing and stature of the Commission with the Congress and the public generally. Everyone realizes that the Commission is itself before the bar of public opinion in this matter.

In any event, I want it on the record now in advance that I have been in this campaign too long to surrender without a struggle. If there is any temporizing with a clear-cut decision now, the fight must go on until the American people enjoy the beneficent gift which science already has brought out of the laboratory.

I feel so strongly about this entire matter that it seemed wise to write you as I do. With my warmest personal regards, I am

Very sincerely yours,

ED. C. JOHNSON,
Chairman.

Senator Myers' Washington News Letter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of my Washington news letter of August 3, 1950.

There being no objection, the news letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Prices have risen steadily since April of this year, but the rise was gradual until the Korean invasion prompted "scare buying" which sent prices up sharply after June 25 and has created artificial shortages of goods actually available in large enough supply to meet our needs. The recent, drastic price increases were caused primarily by a handful of businessmen who hoped to profiteer or to unload "white elephants" from their shelves—and by selfish buyers who wished to hoard. The merchant who sold 50 pounds of sugar to a customer shared the guilt equally with the hoarding consumer.

I unhesitatingly support the principle Baruch proposes. Some controls are needed at once, and "stand-by" powers must be available for comprehensive rationing, priorities, and controls over wages and prices. Price-control powers must contain provision for roll-backs. Stand-by controls influence price stability, and can be used quickly if and when needed.

The planned $10,000,000,000 increase for defense won't disrupt our economy. This amount would require less than a 5 percent expansion in our productive output—and since Government spending not connected with defense will be curtailed, the net expansion will be about one-half that amount—a task our economy can easily manage. However, unnecessary inventory stockpiling and consumer hoarding have added new burdens to our industrial machinery and make controls inevitable.

Our defense program should be paid for as we go. We can balance our cash budget and reduce inflationary pressures by a combination of higher taxes, reduced Government spending for nondefense programs, and tightened credit. Here are some of the details.

A $5,000,000,000 tax increase has been recommended by the President. I believe the increase should be designed to curb profiteering and to discourage unnecessary buying. It should also plug loopholes in our present tax laws. The new tax burden, however, should not be imposed on families with low, fixed incomes who are the worst victims of high prices.

Nondefense Government spending will be severely cut. Many needed programs will be given lower priorities and work will be slowed up or stopped altogether on many federally-assisted programs. Planning for public housing and slum clearance work will continue so the work may be undertaken as soon as conditions permit. Construction of Government buildings will be curtailed—and some stand-by war plants built during World War II will be reopened. But present needs call for little new Government construction of war plants. Public health programs, including research on polio, cancer, heart disease, mental health and others, will be continued because of their importance to our national health.

Consumer credit must be tightened. Just before the Korean invasion, Americans owed more than $19,000,000,000 for goods purchased on credit—the highest level in history. Easy credit for installment buying exerts a tremendous inflationary pressure, particularly when scarcity rumors stampede our stores. Much of this pressure can be relieved by requiring larger down payments.

Some shortages will result from our defense expansion. Our steel capacity, as President Truman predicted a year and a half ago, has proven inadequate to meet our combined civilian and new military needs. Plans are being developed now, however, for private expansion of our steel production. Steel and other critical materials must be assigned priorities to assure allocation of sufficient supplies for defense needs. But unless the international situation worsens, present defense needs won't make serious inroads into production of basic consumer goods.

Fifty-two members of the United Nations have made it clear that aggression won't be tolerated. We've acted to counter the Red decision to launch an unprovoked attack on a free nation. We've acted to enlarge our defenses—and those of other free nations—as further insurance against attack at other points along the iron curtain. A bit of belt-tightening at home is called for, but present needs are far short of demands of total war. If the danger doesn't spread, our economy should be able to expand quickly to meet our combined civilian and defense requirements. But to attain success, every American must do his part by purchasing only the things he must have to meet his immediate needs.

Billions Lost Through Tax Loopholes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 22, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, in crucial times such as these when our expenditures for defense purposes are so high in order to safeguard this Nation, many of our citizens are utilizing certain loopholes in the tax laws for their personal benefit. Although we have no exact figures on the amount of taxable income that escapes taxation through these legal loopholes, it has been roughly estimated that the figure may be as high as $50,000,000,000 annually.

We are engaged now in a bitter struggle to retain our free and democratic way of life. For the past few weeks there have been terrific demands on Congress for new appropriations for defense purposes, and we shall probably be faced with more such requests. This means new and greater taxation for all of us; that is, all except the tax dodgers and the loophole scrutinizers. We must put a stop to this most unpatriotic and selfish practice. Our tax laws should be properly strengthened, all possible loopholes eliminated, and drastic measures prescribed to deal with tax dodgers in a way which would not only make their dishonorable practice most unprofitable but would expose them to the public.

Following is a most interesting article on the subject by A. G. Mezerik, which appeared in the magazine Sales Management on June 1, 1950. I commend it to the attention of my colleagues:

YOU AND I ARE TAX SUCKERS—WANTED: IMMEDIATE ACTION BY CONGRESS TO PLUG THE LEGAL LOOPHOLES THROUGH WHICH BILLIONS OF INCOME NOW GO TAX-FREE

(By A. G. Mezerik)

A bright radio entertainer has gone to Puerto Rico and formed a corporation. In Hollywood, a producer and his wife organized a collapsible corporation to make a quickie movie. In Rhode Island, a textile executive—in the name of sweet charity—pyramided $500 into $4,500,000. Out in Nebraska, operators of two of the Nation's largest farms have donated their plantations to a foundation. A New York City doctor says to his patient, "Would you mind paying in cash?" And further down the same street, hundreds of men are fresh out of cash, their jobs gone.

If you think all these doings and a lot of others—just as seemingly unrelated—have nothing to do with you or your business, look at the tax bill which you just paid. High, eh? But the President is talking about the need for further increases in taxes, which would make the diverse and far-flung activities of oil men, movie producers and unemployed furriers a matter which, as you will soon see, affects your pocketbook.

Millions—even billions—of dollars a year, which might otherwise be paid as taxes, are sticking to the fingers of people who have had the benefit of strong lobbies in Congress or of high priced tax lawyers. If these sums were collected the balanced budget, about which everybody talks, might be achieved.

Take the case of the oil and the mining men. Since 1918 they have had a strong lobby and a lot of all-too-compliant Congressmen whose actions have already delivered to them a sum well up in the billions. Called "special depletion allowance," this gimmick works year in and year out for oil, gas, and sulfur operators and, to a lesser extent, for miners of metals.

Starting on a par with the rest of us, these men are permitted to deduct their business expenses, which is fair enough. But that's only the beginning. From his profit for the year the operator then deducts any and all expenses for developing new wells. After that, for as many years as the well produces, he deducts 27½ percent of his gross income from the well to help him to amortize his capital investment which, you will remember, he charged off in his first year. The net is that he deducts the expenses of developing the well over and over again. Behind this is the theory that a natural resource has, in contrast to a factory, a limited life, for which allowance should be made.

In practice, the United States Treasury reveals that this theory has produced astounding results. One man whose returns from 1943 to 1947 were analyzed by Treasury officials earned $10,500,000 from oil and gas enterprises, plus almost $4,000,000 from other sources during those years. On this huge income he paid a total of $80,000 in all for the entire period, the special tax privilege making this possible.

The Treasury pointed this man out as one of a group of 10 who, in the 5 years, had a combined income of $47,000,000 from oil and gas operations alone, on which all taxes were entirely and legally escaped, during a period when wartime rates for others with $1,000,000 incomes ran as high as 80 percent. This law applies not only to individuals but to corporations. The 1947 figures reveal that total taxes paid on the $926,000,000 profits earned by 20 oil and gas corporations averaged 19 percent as against the 38 percent paid by corporations in other fields. In other words, this industry pays 50 percent less than others must pay.

How sizable the sums involved here are, need not be left to imagination. Always conservative, the Treasury estimates that the revenue gain, were this one loophole plugged, would be between $400,000,000 and $500,000,000 annually.

The loophole available to the oil and mineral interests is about the size of an airplane hangar. The movie industry and the radio and the entertainment glamor boys have one which, if not nearly so large, is quite as effective and more dramatic. They are the masters of the "collapsible corporation."

The short but not so simple annals of the movie moguls begin, according to Thomas Lynch, general counsel of the Treasury, with the basic and undeniable premise that tax rates for individuals, on ordinary business income, range as high as 82 percent, while on long-term gains it is only 25 percent. Should a producer make all his pictures as an individual, his profits would be taxed at the individual rates. Were he to produce them through a single corporation, that corporation would pay 38 percent, in addition to which our producer friend would pay an individual income tax on the profits when the corporation distributed them.

Many a producer has avoided these dire results by organizing a separate collapsible corporation for each picture. Once he has completed the single film for which the corporation was organized, the corporation is liquidated. Assets are distributed before the first nickel of box office income has made its appearance. Since there has been no income, no taxes are paid by the corporation. The amount of tax which does subsequently get paid by the producer is based on the difference between his cost and the fair market value of the assets distributed by his collapsible. When rates are 25 percent as against 82 percent, it can—and does—amount to quite a chunk of money which the Government does not get.

The bright radio entertainer who moved his corporate body to Puerto Rico had something more in mind than the climate of that island. He took advantage of another loophole.

Under an obscure section of the tax code an American citizen may obtain, in any of our possessions except the Virgin Islands, complete exemption from Federal income tax on his foreign income. Presumably, to make this as convenient as possible, there is no need for him to remain abroad for a specific length of time. What counts is that his income is derived from sources within a possession.

The popular radio personality, acting on this knowledge (no doubt conveyed to him by a wise old tax lawyer), has moved the ostensible scene of his operations to Puerto Rico and thereby has qualified for this exemption. This entertainer has succeeded in gilding his already bright tax exemption lily. Before moving to Puerto Rico he entered into an arrangement with the government of Puerto Rico, under which he agreed to produce all his radio and television transscriptions and films on that wonderful island, in return for an exemption from the Puerto Rican income tax. It could be that a radio comedian at long last has disproved one-half of old Ben Franklin's adage: "Nothing is certain but death and taxes."

Puerto Rico's tax exemption has quite naturally attracted more than 50 individuals, among them one of this country's largest textile operators.

Our possessions have tax advantages not only for corporations but for United States Government employes stationed in them. All of these employes are exempt from payment of Federal income taxes—although everywhere else in the world, including of course inside the United States, our Government employes are always subject to taxes on their salaries.

COST TO TAXPAYERS

The support of our possessions, especially Puerto Rico, costs taxpayers of our country a sizable sum every year. In addition to that cost, the possessions are responsible for a huge income tax loss to the Government. Taxpayers who have in the past complained bitterly about the money voted directly to Puerto Rico each year, will not appreciate whatever humor there is in this picture.

Senator CHARLES W. TOBEY, in the process of investigating why it was that a large New England textile mill was moving to Puerto Rico, revealed another method by which taxes manage not to find their way to the Treasury. This is the use of a so-called charitable trust—naturally tax-exempt. Trusts can be—and have been—set up with as small a contribution as $100.

In the charter, obtainable in almost every State, the founder designates himself or one of his associates as trustee. If there is more than one trustee, there are more associates. A trust must, of course, have a beneficiary, and therefore this worthy object of charity is also named in the charter. However, any provision for the beneficiary to receive a specified percentage of the trustee's resources or income is strangely lacking. This detail, minor in the light of the real aim of tax avoidance, is left to the exclusive judgment of the trustees.

Once the charter has been granted, the trust swings into high gear to accomplish its real purposes. The founder's corporation lends substantial sums of money or securities to the trust. The trustee uses these assets for speculation in the founder's own properties or in those which he wants to acquire. Profits from this speculation are tax-exempt, which is of course the reason for all this activity in the name of sweet charity.

Operating along these general and completely legal lines, one New England trust grew from $500 to $4,500,000 in 11 years. The United States Government did not receive a cent from all this profit pyramiding and the beneficiary received only $50,000.

The movement into the formation of foundations and charitable trusts where profits are tax exempt, is on a huge scale and involves huge properties, among them the Campbell ranch, the world's largest wheat grower, and the Giffen plantation, the country's premier cotton ranch. In Lincoln, capital of the State of Nebraska, three foundations were recently incorporated. The original trustees included George W. Diesing, Omaha lawyer, who was named president, secretary, treasurer, chairman of the board of trustees, general counsel and resident agent, and the articles of all the foundations provided that the funds and business of the foundations "shall be managed and controlled by the president and treasurer."

Meanwhile, three corporations, the United States Wheat Corp., Rancho San Bernardo, Inc., and the Rancho San Theresa were set up to support the foundations. All were founded as nonprofit, charitable enterprises claiming exemption from income tax. These corporations had not only the benefit of Mr. Diesing's participation, but the strength and significance added by wheat grower Brig. Gen. Thomas D. Campbell of Hardin, Mont., and cotton rancher Russel Giffen of California.

The United States Wheat Corp. purchased the 95,000-acre Campbell Wheat Co. farm for approximately $2,000,000. Rancho San Bernardo, Inc., bought the 35,000-acre San Joaquin Valley cotton ranch, owned by Giffen's firm, for $4,800,000. Capital stock of the two corporations that purchased the two ranches is $10, and it is all held by one of the foundations. One last and not so surprising fact: Brigadier General Campbell and Mr. Giffen have been retained by the new owners as managers--salary unknown.

On September 16 Representative MASON (Republican) blasted the program on the floor of the Congress by announcing that "Tom Campbell's famous wheat ranch in Montana has been sold for $2,000,000 and its earnings which have heretofore been subject to a 38-percent corporation income tax will now go free." To which Representative MASON added that "doing business without paying taxes is becoming a national racket."

This use of charity and education as a guise for obtaining tax-exemption is presently under considerable fire. So much so that a congressional committee recently was privileged to hear Royal Little, the genius behind the Textron textile charitable trusts, recommend that the practice should be discontinued. We, like Mr. Little, are eager to lock the barn door now, although we were not in the barn when he was and, after all, it was our horse. Nevertheless, belated self-criticism is welcome.

A little more self-criticism is being heard from heads of colleges and universities, whose activities in buying and selling real estate, making chinaware and noodles, and garnering profits from race tracks and hundreds of other unrelated activities, were described in the December 15, 1949 issue of Sales Management (Alma Mater Is in Business Now—Tax Free).

Harold Stassen, president of the University of Pennsylvania, has publicly deplored these activities which not only cost the Government about $150,000,000 a year in tax loss, but which represent unfair competition to privately owned businesses. However, the universities—including the University of Pennsylvania, which owns the building occupied by Lit Bros. store in Philadelphia—have not divested themselves of their holdings, nor do they show signs of curtailing their march into business and banking.

Every one of these methods of not paying taxes is legal. Of course there are many illegal ways of dodging taxes. Twenty-three thousand full-time Bureau of Internal Revenue investigators check 2½ to 5 million returns each year—about 5 percent of those filed—to find cheaters. But professional men, like the New York doctor, and farmers, and small-business men who deal chiefly in cash are difficult to keep tabs on. A few people will always try to outsmart the Government by failing to report cash income, claiming exemption for dependents who are dead, falsifying their records or keeping two sets of books.

However, we aren't terribly worked up about small-time evaders. The old game of dodging the tax collector is a sport to which people of every country have been addicted since the first tax collector made his appearance—which must have been a week or two after Adam and Eve moved out of the Garden of Eden. Our main concern is with the holes in the law which make our tax pattern look like a sieve.

Big money is being lost by these legal loopholes. Experts say that more than a billion dollars annually could be collected in tax income just by filling the law's cavities described above—which are by no means the complete list. This was made startlingly clear in statements made by Representative MASON and Senator TOBEY that as much as $50,000,000,000 annually escapes taxation. That there are ways to get more tax income without raising taxes is the substance of our contention.

"Taxes can and do have an important effect on business conditions and economic activity. It should be our constant objective to improve our tax system so that required revenues can be obtained without impairing the private initiative and enterprise essential to economic growth." From left to right, no one could better or more clearly state the case for plugging loopholes and removing wartime excise taxes (a crusade inaugurated by Sales Management in August 1949) than did President Truman when he used the above words in his tax message. The trouble is nuisance taxes are still on the books and the loopholes are as big as ever.

Meanwhile, congressional committees hold one hearing after another in Washington. Businessmen and others trek down to Washington at their own expense to tell their stories to Senators and Congressmen. Yet, chances seem better than good that constructive action on the floor of the Congress, which is the only place where action really counts, will not happen until and unless a lot of mere taxpayers get into the picture. They should warn their Congressmen that they, the voters who put them in office, are serious about getting a tax pattern which neither penalizes—as with the excise taxes—nor favors—as with the big loopholes—one group above another.

The Steel Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, an article by Richard L. Strout and published in the Christian Science Monitor of July 26 discusses the important problem of our steel capacity and production. We all know how vital steel is to our national security, as well as for the production of goods for civilian uses. Mr. Strout has a penetrating understanding of the problem, and I recommend that all Members of this body take the time to read his article. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OH FOR THOSE STEEL STAND-BY PLANTS—AN INTIMATE MESSAGE FROM WASHINGTON

(By Richard L. Strout)

WASHINGTON.—President Truman has been issuing 6-month economic reports to Congress now for over 3 years, and Congress sometimes seems to take real delight in knocking his proposals on the head.

Mr. Truman objected to the killing of OPA. Congress killed it. Mr. Truman said prices would soar. His opponents said, "Not so." The anti-OPA sentiment whipped up became so strong, and the unpopularity of continued curbs on civilian buying so intense that they affected the 1946 congressional election where Mr. Truman's party lost control of the House.

Prices soared as Mr. Truman predicted. His council of economic advisers in their January 1948, statement reported: "The abolition of OPA (was followed) * * * by the sharp rise of wholesale prices between June and December 1946. This was at the annual rate of almost 50 percent, one of the steepest rises ever recorded. Consumers prices rose at an annual rate of 30 percent."

Then again, Mr. Truman repeatedly opposed tax reduction. The excess-profits tax had been removed when the war ended and corporation profits were soaring. The economic report of January 1948, mentioned that corporate profits had reached a new peak in 1947; the report a year later again noted that corporate profits for 1948 had surpassed all previous records. Mr. Truman argued that some of the profits should be skimmed off to pay the cost of the war and that the budget was not too solidly balanced anyway.

Congress went ahead and cut taxes. It overrode a Presidential veto the third try. The tax cut was about $5,000,000,000 at a time of heavy inflation, Mr. Truman commented in his July 1949 report. He deplored the present deficit of the Treasury and attributed this to "the untimely tax reduction of $5,000,000,000 during the height of the inflation against which I so strongly advised."

Another field is steel. Almost from the start of the economic reports Mr. Truman and his economic advisers have had a running controversy with the steel industry. Repeatedly the administration has urged steel: (1) not to increase prices; and (2) to expand production to prevent a bottleneck for American industry, of which it is the mainspring. On the "bottleneck" thesis, the CEA was recommending "substantial increases in the output of such basic commodities as steel" in January 1948.

Again in its July 1948 report the CEA mentioned "the shortages which the national defense program will in due course accentuate" and mentioned that "steel is another case in point."

Mr. Truman went so far in his January 1949 State of the Union message to Congress as to ask "priorities and allocations for key materials in short supply." Specifically he urged "an immediate study of the adequacy of production facilities for materials in critically short supply, such as steel. He wound up with the proposal that "Government loans" be made available if found to be needed to relieve such shortages, and with the unprecedented recommendation that, in extreme circumstances, the Government itself should engage in "the construction of such facilities directly if action by private industry fails to meet our needs."

In his simultaneous 1949 economic report, Mr. Truman declared, "There are shortages of supply in certain critical areas which are so serious as to impede maximum production * * * and to limit programs related to national security."

Did Congress grant Mr. Truman's recommendations? No. No study of production facilities was made, and the unprecedented proposal to set up stand-by steel plants was roundly denounced as "socialistic," which in a sense it was. Such stand-by plants would, of course, be of prime military advantage today.

Fortunately, the steel industry did expand its own facilities to some degree. And shortly after the Korean outbreak the big industry announced, January 19, a great billion dollar steel expansion program. This will be completed toward the end of 1952, which will be fine if the Russians are willing to wait. One difficulty is that it takes steel to expand steel. The steel expansion program will compete for steel with the Armed Forces and civilians in the emergency scramble.

Streit Forecast Kremlin's Shift to Asia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the third of a series of five articles by Clarence Streit, editor of the magazine Freedom and Union, published at 700 Ninth Street NW., Washington, D. C., and author of Union Now, which have appeared in various newspapers in the United States and Canada, pointing up the urgent lesson which I find Korea teaches, namely, that the Atlantic Union resolution—Senate Concurrent Resolution 57—cannot be passed too soon.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KOREA'S LESSON: THE FREE MUST FEDERATE SOONER

(By Clarence K. Streit)

"The trend of recent events in Asia," Freedom and Union warned back in February 1949, "makes it all the more urgent that the democracies which are now working on an Atlantic alliance should meet in a Federal convention to work out an Atlantic union instead. This for two major reasons:

"1. These events prove that the present policy of the Atlantic democracies in the Pacific is bankrupt; they need a common policy there that will honor the ideals of individual liberty they uphold at home and encourage Asians to follow the free way of life.

"2. Continued glaring inconsistency of their Asian policy with their ideals can only encourage communism everywhere, and lead the Kremlin to correct one of its most helpful postwar blunders by shifting its major pressure from Europe to Asia.

"Consider this second point first. The Kremlin could hardly have adopted a policy more certain to bring the Atlantic democracies to unite than the one it has followed since 1945 in Poland, Trieste, Greece, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and Germany, and brought to a climax by its establishment of the Berlin blockade * * *.

"Instead of taking advantage of this to end the fatal disunion of the democracies once and for all, by energetically framing a firm federation while Soviet pressure facilitated this, Atlantic policy-makers have been dabbling with western European union and Atlantic alliance. Their 'gradualist' approach to the immensely difficult problem of solidly uniting the free is as stupid as the Kremlin's blundering, for it is based on the assumption that the Kremlin will kindly continue to apply pressure on Europe generally, and Berlin particularly, as long as the timid statesmen in Washington, London, and Paris need this pressure to paint their snail's eye picture of peace * * *.

"Suppose it (the Kremlin) wakes up soon to its present folly. Suppose it seeks to exploit the latest divisions among the democracies, their longing for peace, their wishful thinking * * *. The Kremlin can gain a good name for magnanimity merely by restoring to the western powers their land access to Berlin, though this leaves it still in the strongest military position around that city. Suppose it accompanies this peaceful gesture with those pleasant noises with which one sidles up to a jackass which he means to saddle. * * * Suppose it contrasts the mild reaction of the American people to Communist success in vast China with the alarm caused by Communist success in little Czechoslovakia.

"Such considerations might conceivably lead the Kremlin to turn to a policy of conciliation in the west temporarily—long enough for it to gain most of the rest of Asia by concentrating its aggressive activity there. Suppose it did this. Where, then, would be the statesmen of the west who depend on Russian pressure in Europe, not on any positive policy of freedom and union, to unite their peoples and win the friendship of Asians? These statesmen now seek to build a solid wall by pouring gravel between concrete forms without adding any internal cement to hold it together. Where will these blundering builders be when Stalin suddenly removes the concrete forms he now supplies?

"In the east, as well as in the west, these leaders of the free have failed to provide a positive policy for freedom. By this failure in the east, they encourage Stalin to concentrate on Asia and knock the props from under their flimsy building in the west.

"Lest I be charged with easy hindsight, let me cite this excerpt from an article I wrote while attending the San Francisco Conference that drafted the United Nations Charter. It appeared in the Federal Union World for June 1945:

" 'The leading democracies at the conference here have given the impression of aiming mainly to maintain or improve their national positions in the game of balance of power politics * * *.

" 'They have been sacrificing their good names and their basic principles for considerations of material power that are picayune compared to the power they could all gain by uniting to advance their common democratic ideals * * *.

" 'Either the democracies must work out separate postwar policies in their Pacific territories, or they must work out a common policy. The former course means dangerous divisions among them * * *.

" 'Imagine, on the other hand, the effect of the democracies deciding to get together in a Congress to work out a common program to achieve, say, these democratic ends for the people of their Southwest Pacific territory: (1) Self-government and self-determination within a specified time; (2) Economic development to raise the lowest native standard of living 100 percent in a specified time, while making their raw materials equally accessible to all; (3) Free grade school education for all native children within a specified time; (4) Long term credits to finance this program.

" 'The mere announcement that a Congress of democracies would be set up to work out such a concrete program as this would restore confidence in democracy in Asia and everywhere, give it the dynamic impulse it now lacks, help shorten the war and secure the peace, improve the European situation, and lead toward real Union of the free.

" 'On the theory that they should not unite more closely behind their free principles than they could unite with their Russian ally, the democracies let go the opportunity the war in Europe gave them (to federate). The results are only too visible in the Old World and in the muscle-bound league that San Francisco is now completing.

" 'In the hope that the more disunited and imperialistic the democracies remain in the Pacific, the sooner the Russians will decide to give their lives in Asia to save our sons (in the then looming invasion of Japan), shall we fool away the opportunity we still have left?' "

Korea proves it is only truer today than it was in 1945: The free cannot federate too soon.

Social Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, in the Christian Science Monitor of August 2, there was published an article by Richard L. Strout entitled "A Great Social Revolution," which I believe deserves the attention of every Member of this body. In that article Mr. Strout briefly and concisely outlines the history of social security both in this country and abroad. He explains very clearly what social security has come to mean to our people, and calls this social insurance "one of the greatest democratic revolutions of our time." I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A GREAT SOCIAL REVOLUTION—AN INTIMATE MESSAGE FROM WASHINGTON

(By Richard L. Strout)

WASHINGTON.—I still have somewhere in my roll-top desk the front page of a Boston newspaper published a few days before the congressional election of 1934, announcing in an eight-column banner headline the alleged decision of the Roosevelt administration to have all workers wear "dog tags." The story wasn't true, but it was a politically effective one. There was even a picture of the aluminum "dog tag" to band free-born American workers, each carrying a number.

The article made it appear that Mr. Roosevelt was pushing the slave state for all he was worth. Presumably it had been kept until just before election day to have maximum political effect.

You have to go back to specific little incidents like that to remember the passion and poignancy of half-forgotten times and to appreciate what a long way we have come in a short time.

Congress has just voted to extend the now well-established social-security system to another 10,000,000 people. It is the single most important piece of domestic legislation of the Eighty-first Congress. The issue has passed from violent partisanship into general acceptance. Last October 5, the House approved the measure by the smashing majority of 333 to 14. On June 21, the Senate passed it by 81 to 2. It is supported, among others, by the National Association of Manufacturers.

Yet only 15 years or so ago many believed they had a sure-fire political issue in opposition to this unprecedented Federal social security. These foes reached their climax in the ill-fated Alf Landon campaign of 1936. Mr. Landon, you remember, carried only two States. The opposition today is almost forgotten and lies moldering in musty newspaper headlines preserved by whimsical observers of the passing scene who enjoy such examples of a complete misreading of the temper of the times.

As a matter of fact, the United States was about 40 or 50 years behind most of the other leading industrial countries in coming to social security on a national basis. Bismarck started the thing in Germany in 1889. Then Britain, under Lloyd George, provided the first comprehensive national compulsory unemployment insurance program in 1911.

It was fairly obvious to any reasonable observer that the United States would follow suit when the need of the optimistic young country became more urgent and when the advantages of insurance over the almshouse and poor farms became more evident. The time came in the disastrous 1929 crash. By 1932-33 some 15,000,000 workers were unable to find jobs. (For comparative purposes, with a bigger population today in America, there are only 3,500,000 unemployed.)

The idea of social insurance against the misadventures of life on a national scale was wholly alien to American individualism. Victor Berger, Socialist Congressman from Wisconsin, had introduced a bill for Federal old-age pensions in 1911, but it never got out of committee. "Wasn't this a job for the States if undertaken at all?" it was asked. Mr. Hoover resisted all demands for Federal assumption of a share in the growing relief burden for 2½ years, then allowed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans—not grants—to the States for relief purposes. That, in a sense, really began the whole big movement.

The Federal Social Security Act finally passed in 1935. Now it is being expanded to include 10,000,000 more workers. Once in effect, it is significant that big business has swung behind the program. It has done this because aggressive trade-unions were getting pension clauses written into contracts with individual firms. Naturally enough, the firms want the burden carried by everybody rather than by them alone.

Now, the extended law will cover about 45,000,000 workers. The law is less inclusive than some of the cradle-to-grave systems in Europe. It will moderate some of the hazards of life for low- and middle-income groups. It should help to make old age more dignified for many, and put a prop under purchasing power for the unemployed which in itself may help stabilize the business cycle.

Without doubt, this is one of the great democratic revolutions of our time.

The Creeping Shadow of Socialism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. ALEXANDER SMITH
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I recently had called to my attention an important address made by a friend of mine, Mr. George E. Stringfellow, of East Orange, N. J., vice president of the Edison Cos., before the Rotary Club of Wichita Falls, Tex., on August 3, 1950. Mr. Stringfellow's address has so much wisdom in it, and is so relevant to some of the issues before us today, that I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CREEPING SHADOW OF SOCIALISM

(By George E. Stringfellow)

I'm highly complimented to be asked to speak before such a fine group of public-spirited, liberty-loving citizens. It is you and men such as you who have made America great, and it is you and men such as you who will keep it great, if it is to remain what our forefathers envisioned.

Since politics invades every segment of our human family, I shall speak of politics and its influence on our lives. I shall not speak in the narrow partisan sense, but rather I shall speak in the sense defined by Webster as "the science of government." I shall suggest what we citizens must do to influence our public servants to save our way of life.

I have selected as my subject the Creeping Shadow of Socialism. Extravagance and deficit spending always produce inflation and inflation always produces statism in one form or another, socialism or communism. The difference between capitalism, socialism and communism is one of principle. The difference between socialism and communism is one of degree. Socialism is the bridge over which capitalism passes to communism. Capitalism produces things for people to divide. Socialism divides the product of capitalism until there is nothing left; then communism takes over and chaos reigns.

I would like to remind you of a very forceful statement in George Washington's Farewell Address. It is, "Cherish public credit and avoid the accumulation of debt."

If we continue the accumulation of debt we shall destroy public credit. The destruction of public credit would end our form of government. The danger of deficit spending, which, of course, means the accumulation of public debt, was pointed out very forcefully by President Franklin D. Roosevelt during the early part of his first term when he said, "A government, like a family, can spend a little more than it earns for a year or so, but you and I know that the continuation of that habit means the poorhouse." Our Federal Government has continued that habit for almost a fifth of a century.

Governments go to the poorhouse when they habitually spend more than they earn. When governments go to the poorhouse, they take their citizens with them.

It was Lenin, that patron saint of communism, who said, "Sooner or later we will force the United States to spend her way to destruction." It seems to me that during the past 20 years we have done much to spend our way to destruction. During the past 20 years we have done much to destroy ourselves financially. The cost of Federal Government 20 years ago was less than $5,000,000,000. The cost of Federal Government for this fiscal year, excluding the cost of the war with Korea, will be more than $45,000,000,000. The national debt 20 years ago was less than $20,000,000,000. Today it exceeds $257,000,000,000, and the President budgeted a $5,000,000,000 deficit before the war with Korea. Our Federal budget has been balanced but once in the last 20 years. It was balanced by the Eightieth Congress.

If our business were in the red, as the Federal Government is and has been for almost a fifth of a century, and we told our stockholders that we could not balance our budget until the volume of business increased (as the President tells us, his stockholders) our stockholders would say, "Cut your cost or we'll find new management."

When a business runs a deficit for several years, it gets into financial difficulty and then the courts appoint a receiver who is responsible to the courts. The receiver takes over and liquidates the corporation's assets, pays its bills, and, if there is anything left, reorganizes and staffs it with a set of officers who have enough business intelligence to live within the corporation's income. If there's nothing left after paying the bills, the firm folds up, the employees lose their jobs, and the stockholders lose all they invested in the business.

When a government runs a deficit for a long period of time as ours has, it builds up an unmanageable debt, it gets into financial difficulty and, of course, there is no court of law to appoint a receiver for a government as in the case of a business. A self-appointed dictator arises and takes over,

Dictators are responsible only to their own whims. Under such circumstances, the people lose their savings, they lose their property, and, what is more important, they lose their liberty. Their way of life is prescribed for them by a self-appointed dictator. History bears mute evidence to the fact that when a government habitually spends more than it takes in, inflation follows as surely as night follows day. The thing that alarms me is that we have been unable to balance our budget in the height of peaceful prosperity. If we can't balance our budget when the Nation is at peace and prosperity reigns, we certainly cannot balance it in a depression or in a war. However, even in war we can and must reduce waste. We must reduce waste if we are to avoid inflation, for it will avail us nothing to win the war with Russia and lose our way of life through inflation.

We know that it was inflation that produced Mussolini; it was inflation that produced Hitler; it was inflation that produced Stalin; and inflation is certain to produce a dictator in America. The buying power of the American dollar is worth about 50 cents today compared with what it was 20 years ago. At the rate it is losing its value, it will not take long for the dollar to drop to zero. Then we shall have a worthless dollar and, of course, inflation. Then we shall lose our Republic and all the benefits which our citizens enjoy thereunder.

On leaving Independence Hall in Philadelphia in the late afternoon of September 17, 1787, following the signing of the Constitution of the United States, Benjamin Franklin was asked, "What have we got?" The wise old man replied, "We have got a Republic, if we can keep it." If we are to keep our Republic, the greatest form of government ever conceived by the mind of man, we must avoid inflation.

Twenty years ago the annual cost of Federal Government was about 75 percent of the annual income of all the citizens of the State of California. The annual cost of Federal Government this year, excluding the cost of the Korean war, will equal the total income of every citizen of the States of California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Nevada, Arizona, Utah, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska, North and South Dakota, and 11 percent of the income of the people of Minnesota.

This creeping shadow of socialism, motivated by Government extravagance, will cover the entire country at an early date unless our citizens rise up and rebel against it. This creeping shadow of socialism, if it isn't turned back, will produce the kind of state socialism here which Britain has today. The Hoover Commission has shown the President and the Congress how to save $4,000,000,000 a year without affecting our war effort. That is 75 percent of the annual cost of Government 20 years ago. I would suggest that each of you contact the President, contact your Congressmen, and contact your two United States Senators and urge them to work for the enactment of the Hoover Commission's recommendations and thus reduce the cost of Government by $4,000,000,000 a year. This will help stem the creeping shadow of socialism.

I submit that the Chief Executive of this Republic should be a symbol of economy. It is he who should set the example for the Nation and especially for his fellow administrators of Government. During the last year of the Hoover administration, the White House payroll was $127,200. During the last year of the Roosevelt administration, the White House payroll was $256,431. During last year of the Truman administration, the White House payroll was $998,254. Many of you recall the President's recent nonpolitical trip to the Pacific Northwest which cost the taxpayers more than a quarter of a million dollars. That, I submit, was a wanton waste of our money.

President Truman would lead us to believe that he is against socialism, yet every move he makes leads in that direction. "We in this country," said the Honorable HARRY FLOOD BYRD, senior United States Senator from Virginia, one of the ablest statesmen of our time, "will be irrevocably committed to state socialism if Congress adopts the following Fair Deal proposals advocated by the President: (1) Socialized medicine; (2) socialized agriculture; and (3) socialized housing."

Of course, the President does not call these projects socialism. His leftist advisers who would socialize and communize America have other names for them. To call them what they are—socialism—would be too forthright and too revealing to the public.

Only you and others like you can roll back this creeping shadow of socialism by demanding that the Government reduce nondefense expenditures and eliminate waste wherever humanly possible in the prosecution of the war. We should demand that our Government desist from buying votes with the taxpayers' money through subsidies and desist from making RFC political loans, such as Lustron, Rattlesnake, and for building of gambling joints.

We have, in my opinion, reached the period in our history where men worthy of their heritage must lift up their voices in defense of the principles of government for which our forefathers worked, bled, and gave their lives. Sixty years ago someone asked James Russell Lowell, "How long will the American Republic endure?" That great statesman responded, "As long as the ideals of the men who made it continue dominant." Those who would socialize our people, destroy their initiative, and confiscate their wealth through deficit spending are not imbued with the ideals that made America great.

"I place economy among the first and most important virtues. * * * We must make the choice between economy and liberty or profusion and servitude," said Jefferson. "If we can prevent the Government from wasting the labors of the people under the pretense of caring for them, the people will be happy," concluded that great statesman.

The politicians of this Republic have in recent years tried to teach our citizens to believe that our Government is something to live on instead of under. It is that philosophy which has given impetus to the creeping shadow of socialism. It is that philosophy which is accumulating the great public debt which will destroy public credit and produce inflation. It is our duty as citizens to tell our administrators of Government at all levels, regardless of political label that they must eliminate extravagance and live within the Government's income. We must tell our public officials very forcefully that the way to cherish public credit is to avoid the accumulation of debt. That is plainly our duty.

"Duty," said Robert E. Lee, that great American patriot, "is the sublimest word in the English language. Do your duty in all things," charged this great patriot, "you cannot do more and you should never wish to do less."

It is plainly our duty to force our public servants at all levels of Government, from the President down, to eliminate waste, thus avoiding confiscatory taxes. Over 100 years ago, Karl Marx said, "There is only one way to kill capitalism * * * by taxes, taxes, and more taxes." Marx knew what he was talking about. He had studied history. Waste means high taxes. High taxes destroys incentives; high taxes produce socialism; and socialism produces communism.

The President seems to think the way to prevent inflation is to take the moneys away from the people through high taxes made necessary by the wastage of public funds. The way to avoid inflation is to reduce the cost of Government, but this never dawns on politicians.

I should like now to say a few words about the threat of communism. The President's Loyalty Board recently stated that they uncovered only 200 Communists in the Government departments in recent years. Someone has said that if we could put 200 GI's in and about the Kremlin, Stalin would be whistling Dixie in a few months.

You perhaps recall that two of our Associate Justices of the Supreme Court recently testified as character witnesses for Alger Hiss, who was subsequently convicted in a court of law of lying about giving State Department papers to Whittaker Chambers, a self-confessed Communist courier. At the time Hiss gave those confidential papers to Chambers he was on the payroll of the State Department. After Alger Hiss had been found guilty by a jury of his peers the Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, proclaimed that he would not turn his back on his friend—a man who had turned traitor to his country.

Acheson has refused to take a definite stand against recognition of Red China. He has refused to take a stand against seating Joe Stalin's Chinese representative in the Security Council of the United Nations. He did all he could to discredit the Chinese Nationalist Government which was favorable to us and thereby helped Joe Stalin take over China and place in slavery 400,000,000 people. Of great significance, I think, is the fact that the Daily Worker, the principal Communist publication in this country, has from time to time been very complimentary of our Secretary of State.

David Demarest Lloyd, formerly a member of the Washington Cooperative Book Shop, which is on the Attorney General's list as a subversive organization, and who was for a number of years a member of the National Lawyers Guild, which is listed by the Un-American Activities Committee as a Communist-front organization, at present has an office in the White House and is one of President Truman's speech writers.

Since resigning from the Washington Cooperative Book Shop and the National Lawyers Guild, Lloyd has written complimentary articles about the traitor, Alger Hiss.

Most of you will recall that while in search of "liberal votes" President Truman referred to one of the most notorious and despicable characters of our time, Joe Stalin, as "good old Joe." And during that address he expressed a fondness for that godless man who would rule the world by saying, "I like old Joe."

When Alger Hiss was under investigation by the Un-American Activities Committee President Truman referred to that investigation as "red baiting" and he characterized it as "red herring." Little wonder that our people are not too much impressed with the President's most recent appeal to our citizens to report any Communists or other subversives to the FBI.

I have no doubt but that Stalin's agents in our Government are reporting to the Kremlin daily on our activities and our plans. I have no doubt but that Stalin's advisers look over these reports daily and make their plans accordingly. It is my feeling that we have more to fear from the Communists in our Government than from the Communists in Moscow.

We have, I think, reached a period in our history where the basic principles upon which our Government was founded are threatened. They are threatened from within as much, if not more, than from without. We should, therefore, support those men in public office and those men who seek public office who are animated by a sincere desire to preserve our way of life. It should make no difference with us whether those men call themselves Democrats, Republicans, or Dixiecrats.

Only you and others like you who place the welfare of our Republic above partisan politics can keep the light of liberty alive in America.

May I close my address with this prayer:

"O God, Our Father, let us not be content to wait and see what will happen, but give us the determination to make the right things happen. Give us the courage to stand for something lest we fall for anything."

Red Leader Is Very Happy About Minute Women—Says They're on Our Side

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 4, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I regret deeply the necessity of reporting not only that we have a very few Communists in western Massachusetts, but that we have a particularly obnoxious one who describes himself as the secretary of the Communist Party of western Massachusetts. I can assure my colleagues that his following is very limited. But he and that following, apparently, do have it within their power to mislead otherwise decent and loyal Americans with the Communist propaganda upon orders from Moscow, and it appears he has induced a group of ladies to organize what he describes as the Springfield-Chicopee Minute Women for Peace. He is careful not to indicate how many ladies have joined this organization in support of the Communist-inspired Stockholm peace petition, but it is apparent from an article appearing in the Saturday edition of the Springfield Daily News that some of them met recently and adopted some kind of a resolution of endorsement which caused Comrade Lipshires to report great gratification.

The article is as follows:

RED LEADER IS VERY HAPPY ABOUT THE MINUTE WOMEN; SAYS THEY'RE ON OUR SIDE—SIDNEY LIPSHIRES, AREA COMMUNIST SECRETARY, PLEASED AT SUPPORT HERE FOR STOCKHOLM PEACE PETITION, GENERALLY VIEWED AS KREMLIN SMOKE SCREEN

Sidney Lipshires, secretary of the Communist Party of western Massachusetts, allowed today that the party has an excellent ally in the Springfield-Chicopee Minute Women for Peace—an organization which came out strongly last night for the Communist-inspired Stockholm peace pledge.

Lipshires said anyone circulating the so-called Stockholm peace pledge petition or endorsing its aim is on our side. He said he would have more to say on the subject later on.

Meanwhile, it was recalled that Representative JOHN W. HESELTON, of Deerfield, had urged all true Americans to recognize the Stockholm petition as an attempt by Soviet Russia to catch peace lovers everywhere in the Communist trap.

Similar warnings against this spurious peace petition—a camouflage designed to confuse the free societies and to conceal the aggressive policies revealed in the invasion of Korea—were issued recently by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, the National Catholic Welfare Conference, and the Synagogue Council of America.

UNANIMOUS PLEDGE

Yet a pledge to continue support of the campaign to ban production and use of the atomic bomb, as expressed by the Stockholm petition, was unanimously voted by the Minute Women for Peace, of which Mrs. Clyde H. Dorr, of this city, is chairman.

Meeting in St. John's Congregational Church, the group also endorsed Indian Prime Minister Nehru's proposal for a speedy solution to the Korean problem, based on admission of the Chinese Communists to the United Nations, as demanded by Russia.

In line with the Minute Women's actions, Communist Lipshires said he and his party will continue to urge Americans to unite to change the present war policy of the United States Government.

Speaking for Communists everywhere, he said:

"We will continue to urge the American people to override the veto of President Truman on Indian Premier Nehru's proposal to end the lock-out of China and the Soviet Union in the UN. We will continue to back Nehru's plea for a just and peaceful solution for the war in Korea.

"We will go on asking all peace-loving Americans to urge our Government to abandon its plans for atomic war, and to accept the outlawing of atomic weapons through international agreement."

UNJUST WAR

These and other remarks were contained in Lipshires' first press statement since the United States court of appeals upheld the conviction of 11 top Communist leaders. Of this action he said:

"The decision of the court goes hand in hand with the war program. The unjust and undeclared war against the Korean people grows more unpopular every day. Increased numbers of Americans are shocked by the sacrifice of both American and Korean lives in order to guarantee corporation investments in the Far East."

Containing the usual Commie harangues against big business, Wall Street bankers, and the monopolists, Lipshires' statement said the Communists will continue to teach and advocate the necessity of replacing the worn-out capitalist system which threatens to plunge the world into its third world war within the last 36 years.

Airmail Payments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under the permission heretofore granted me by unanimous consent of the House, I include herewith the following editorial from the New York Times of Saturday, July 29, 1950:

AIRMAIL PAYMENTS

The full House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will soon vote on the question of separating airmail payments from Government support of the airlines. Such segregation should be made in the interests of business-like handling of this phase of the Post Office Department activities and in the true interests of the airlines, whose development and soundness must be maintained for the sake of both national defense and economic well-being. The President, in his budget message to Congress last January, asked immediate action in this matter. The proposal has been supported by the Secretary of Commerce, the Postmaster General, the Committee for the Hoover Report and many others. The question of the desirability of segregation seems to have been determined by a strong weight of evidence. These spokesmen have declared themselves in favor of the bill (H. R. 2908), which would establish immediately such separation of airmail payments and subsidies.

Nevertheless, at the coming hearing, the Commerce Committee will be asked to choose between this bill and House Joint Resolution 331, which would require the Civil Aeronautics Board to make a further study of the desirability of segregation and proposes that $500,000 be appropriated for the purpose. Its adoption would effectively kill the whole matter for this session of Congress and probably for the first session of the next Congress. We believe that H. R. 2908 should be voted out by the committee and passed without further delay.

The Reds Reach for Your Wallet

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 4 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled, "The Reds Reach for Your Wallet," written by J. Anthony Marcus, president, Institute of Foreign Trade, and published in the August 1950 issue of the American Legion magazine.

The article is a provocative one which all Americans should read. Mr. Marcus has spent 24 years on the European Continent and knows what is going on.

Unless, and until Members of Congress get the facts respecting international affairs we cannot react wisely.

I have been advised by the Government Printing Office that the article slightly exceeds the two printed pages allowed under the rule, and that the cost of printing it in the RECORD is $205.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE REDS REACH FOR YOUR WALLET

(By J. Anthony Marcus)

Very few of us ever stop to think how Soviet imperialism is eating into our pockets—rich and poor alike. Every pay envelope is being rifled by the invisible Kremlin hand. Every dividend check is being robbed by the same international brigand. Every grocery bag contains less food because a fanatical gang at Moscow has decreed perpetual war until either they or free men survive.

Due to the rise of the Soviet counterrevolution against free institutions in 1917, economic normalcy has become a thing of the past. Long-range development programs are not undertaken, jobs are not multiplying fast enough to take care of the ever-rising population because Moscow wants conditions to remain uncertain, chaotic in order to fish in muddy waters. War-weary and impoverished nations must spend huge fortunes on armaments to prepare for the show-down which Lenin, chief architect of the Russian slave state, had proclaimed as unavoidable.

To gain our diplomatic recognition in 1933 the Kremlin dangled billions in trade for our then idle factories. We fell for it and found ourselves cheated and deceived. Soviet purchases actually fell off. With recognition, however, came Stalin's hoped-for opportunity to flood this country with industrial spies disguised as buying commissions to steal our technological secrets in order to strengthen the Soviet war potential.

At Tehran and Yalta Stalin cheated President Roosevelt by promising peaceful cooperation after the war. With men like Alger Hiss as his advisers, he was unaware of Stalin's strict adherence to the old Russian principle: "If you don't cheat, you don't sell." No sooner were our common enemies defeated than, with renewed fury, the Soviet Government resumed the perpetual war against the democratic nations which is costing us over twenty-five billions of dollars a year. No nation has ever been confronted with so deadly and costly an enemy. No nation has ever had less reason to have so little understanding of the true conspiratorial nature of its adversary than we have.

Busy as we are with the humdrum of everyday living, we have yet to sense the ruinous economic war with which Stalin hopes to weaken us before launching the final onslaught for the bolshevization of the world—a goal which neither he nor his successor will ever abandon.

Stalin knows that a shooting war now might spell the doom of his regime. Why? Because his tyrannical rule has embittered against him more than 90 percent of the Russian people. There is hardly a family in Russia which has not had a loved member tortured or liquidated by this sadistic secret police state. He remembers that in numerous (thousands, one might say) Russian towns and villages the invading German armies were welcomed with open arms, with the traditional bread and salt; that by the end of the first year of war with Hitler, millions of Red army men had surrendered to the enemy because they had no use for their Communist oppressors.

If this could happen in a war with a traditional enemy like the Germans, he knows that the desertions could be much greater in a war with the United States—the traditional friend of the Russian people, the country which had afforded millions of Russians a haven and a refuge, the country which had saved millions of Russians from famine and epidemics, and in the last war actually saved them from certain conquest.

Stalin is therefore turning to his foreign-trade monopoly to carry on the war with the United States. In recent years we have been in a habit of locking the international stable after the horse was stolen. We have paid very dearly for lack of vision and foresight. If we fail now to see the true nature of the war the totalitarian countries are determined to wage against us, there will be no stable left to lock. Having had close contact with Russia's foreign-trade monopoly since 1920, I have known since 1925 that once backward Russia became industrialized the benefits would not go to the domestic consumers to help raise their very low standard of living.

In 1946 and 1947, for instance, the Soviet Government exported hundreds of thousands of tons of grain to European countries while millions of Russians starved because of crop failures. It was done in order to bolster its prestige and to keep its stranglehold upon large bodies of subversives abroad. With millions of men and women in slave-labor camps exploited in mines and industries on a 12- to 16-hour schedule without pay, housed in filthy and unheated barracks, dressed in rags and without medical care, with the entire Soviet working population chained to their jobs and exploited mercilessly, Stalin or his heir can make their people go without the most elementary necessities and dump their industrial or agricultural products abroad to the injury of the United States or the other nations not under the Kremlin domination.

In this thirty-third year of the Soviet regime the income of the Soviet worker and all other segments of the producing population is unbelievably low. While a pound of bread is about 41 cents, sugar $1.50, butter about $6, a shoddy man's suit from $120 to $200, a pair of shoes from $50 to $120, a fall coat from $90 to $200, a pair of ladies' shoes from $60 to $140, the monthly income of an engineer is about $240, a locksmith's from $100 to $180, a highly qualified worker from $160 to $200, a common laborer from $60 to $100, a charwoman $50.

Since the Government owns all the means of production and distribution, the citizen must pay the prices demanded or do without, he must accept the low wages or be mercilessly liquidated in a slave-labor camp. In disregard of the Russian people's welfare, the Soviet Government, when it suits its over-all international game, can dump anything abroad and at any price.

While from time to time Stalin has been heralding to the world the false statement that he sees no reason why the two systems—his and ours—could not live side by side, his all-embracing foreign trade monopoly has already embarked upon a plan to swell the ranks of our unemployed by monopolizing trade in the conquered satellite countries and by dumping. On a national scale, to be sure, the effects are not as yet felt here. In individual American industries and communities, however, it is beginning to lay its deadly hand on the incomes of the workers and employers alike. And it is not too soon to begin looking at least 5 to 10 years ahead. A few recent developments are worth recounting here.

Czechoslovakia: In our oldest center of the hat industry, Danbury, Conn., thousands of workers find their livelihood undermined by the dumping of felt hats from Czechoslovakia, one of the best industrialized puppet states of Russia. With America a heavy importer of the finer fur for hat felting from eastern Europe, our leading source of raw materials is now at the mercy of Moscow's powerful foreign trade monopoly. Counting on the greedy nature of some individual traders in a free-enterprise economy, the marshals of the totalitarian trade war know that not only could they strangle our hat industry by denying us the raw materials, but could extract further profits by fabricating the hats themselves and selling them here at prices far below our cost of production. This is now going on, and it is only the beginning.

With America as the world's largest and most efficient producer of shoes, Czechoslovakia is nevertheless underselling us right here in America. Between January 1 and April 1 of this year nearly 500,000 pairs of such shoes have been landed in New York at the ridiculous price of 87 cents per pair. They are exact copies of American-made shoes, and no manufacturer here could possibly sell them for less than $2.40 to $3.40 per pair and remain in business. When the Czech citizen buys them at home with a ration card he must pay the equivalent of about $7.50 per pair. On the black market they cost around $30. With the country of origin concealed, and with some of our retailers conniving to pack them in domestic boxes, the American consumer is tricked into supporting slave-labor products shipped by an enemy government monopoly to the injury of our economy.

In some instances the merchandise is sent to western European ports for reshipment to this country. Recently Czechoslovakia has been shipping here large quantities of rubber dolls, balls, and inflatable rubber toys. Large shipments of burlaps have arrived from the ports of Hamburg and Gdynia (Poland) by transshipment from Rotterdam, Holland. Glassware, beads, and other manufactured items, as well as permanganate of potash, malt for the beer industry, mineral waters, etc., have also commenced to move into our ports.

Poland: Despite the fact that most of the Polish population is undernourished and impoverished, while hard-working Americans of Polish origin are sharing their food with relatives in Poland by sending them food parcels and paying high duties to the Polish government in addition, the Polish Communist government is shipping large quantities of canned hams and shoulders, as well as many other foodstuffs to the United States and other countries. About the middle of April, for example, the steamer Mormacclm arrived in New York with a large consignment of Polish hams; the steamship Paraguay landed considerable shipments of candies and other general cargo. Substantial consignments of Polish hams have also arrived recently from British ports.

China: For generations America has been China's main customer for hog bristles. In 1948, for example, United States imports from China averaged about $1,842,000 per month. They fell to an average of $1,126,430 during January–April, 1949, and in January, 1950, they were 38 percent below the corresponding period of 1949, according to United States Department of Commerce figures. From the same authority we learn that the importation of Chinese bristles from the Soviet Union rose from a monthly average of $17,465 in 1948 to an average of $60,000 in the last 4 months of 1949. And during the first 6 weeks of 1950, bristles imported from the U. S. S. R. were valued at $865,000—a monthly average of over half a million dollars. This represents a rise of 2,900 percent over the 1948 monthly average above quoted.

With China producing 75 percent of the world's supply of hog bristles, and America its principal customer, it is quite apparent why the Soviet Government would want to monopolize this vital raw material. It also portends what is ahead of us in our trade dealings with the formerly free countries now slipped behind the iron curtain. One by one all other vital raw materials we have been importing from China will be forced to move through the rigid Soviet monopoly.

Take still another highly strategic metal—tungsten. The domestic production is totally inadequate for our steel industry requirements. Of the 17 countries supplying us with tungsten ores and concentrates, about 50 percent of the total imports have been coming from China and 18 percent from Korea—a total of 68 percent from the Far East, now sunk in the Soviet cesspool. It will not be long before this too will come under the domination of the Soviet world-wide foreign trade monopoly.

Accustomed, as the Russian Government is, to selling the most inferior quality merchandise to their captive clientele, and living up to the principle of no cheating, no selling, the Soviet Government and its satellites will stop at nothing to fleece our consumers by misrepresentation, concealment of facts and falsification of trademarks and patent rights.

For the time being the Soviet super-duper foreign-trade monopoly is compelled to allow a certain amount of independence to the recently conquered countries. Busy as they are now with fortifying the secret police network in the satellite nations and China, modeled after the Soviet brand, preoccupied with the rehabilitation of their war-devastated areas, they must postpone for the time being the complete integration of all the foreign trade of the Communist world. When the day of complete integration arrives—and it is as inevitable as the rising and the setting of the sun—we will be confronted by one colossal monopoly wherever we are selling in foreign markets. How do I know that this is inevitable? Of course I am not in Stalin's confidence. But there is documentary evidence, recently come to light, to prove the case:

On May 9, 1941, the executive committee of the Communist International (the old Comintern now renamed the Cominform—worked out a blueprint for the future conquest of the Balkan countries, for example. Section (e) of the first paragraph stipulates:

"Once power has been seized by the party, foreign policy will be laid down by the diplomatic representatives of the U. S. S. R., who will receive the necessary directives from the Comintern * * *"

Then paragraph 2 makes this significant statement:

"The country where the central committee has recently assumed power should not apply for inclusion in the Soviet Union until the necessary instructions to this effect have been received from the executive committee of the Comintern * * *."

And who dominates the Comintern—now the Cominform? The Kremlin, of course. Since the founding of that conspiratorial body in Moscow, only two men have thus far dared to stand up against its determination to rule the actions of the Communist parties in foreign countries as well as in their own country. They are: Benjamin Gitlow, the first titular head of the American Communist Party, and Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia. Their experience settles for all time the question as to whether or not the Communist Party in any country is an independent body or a mere branch, a stooge of Moscow.

To listen to Soviet propagandists and their parroting American Red Fascists, one would conclude that not they but we are the dangerous monopolists, not they but we are interested in subjugating the rest of the world. Of course the very opposite is correct.

One of the first actions of the Soviet Government upon coming into power by force and violence, and with the aid of a mere handful of 240,000 followers as Lenin himself admitted, was to form the foreign trade monopoly. It was inevitable. Having monopolized the entire economic life of the nation, in fact, having monopolized, too, the life of every man, woman and child from cradle to grave by making of them involuntary slaves of the state, there were no longer any free enterprisers left to carry on international trade. Since that day every purchase or sale abroad, no matter how small or large, has had to move through the tiny eye of the foreign trade monopoly needle. And this has given the government a powerful weapon against us and the other nations not in the Communist camp.

This weapon is not used against capitalistic countries alone. The countries within the Soviet orbit are now finding out that the Soviet octopus is implacable to friends as well as enemies. Yugoslavia was the first country to make this discovery and she incurred the undying enmity of the Soviet hierarchy because she fought it. But the other satellite countries are also finding out that the true meaning of Soviet friendship is, "You give us everything you have and we give you nothing in return."

The Rumanian Government, for example, is compelled to export its entire surplus oil and oil products to the Soviet Union. The Soviet Government fixed its own price, based on world prices, for these petroleum products, which is considerably below the cost of production in Rumania. On the other hand, it compels the other satellites—Bulgaria, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia—to import petroleum products from the Soviet Union only, and charges them Soviet prices, which are much higher than world prices. Since these countries do not possess sufficient dollar exchange to pay for the petroleum products, the Soviet Government compels them to ship machinery, locomotives, textiles, coal, coke and ores. Retaining the best of these imports for herself, in accordance with the Soviet principle "If you do not cheat, you do not sell," it resells to Bulgaria, for example, agricultural machinery imported from Czechoslovakia and Hungary. Polish coke and ores and Bulgarian coal are reexported to Czechoslovakia, and to Hungary and Rumania.

Through this double dealing the Soviet manipulators are now able to dump Czech textiles in India, Bulgarian tobacco in Italy, Hungarian and Rumanian foodstuffs to western Germany and, as we have seen before, Chinese hog bristles in the United States. All this is affecting the pockets of our consumers and our industries.

About 100 years ago a frustrated and antisocial Prussian—Karl Marx—had taught, the embittered Lenin of Russia had imbibed and confirmed those teachings, and a man with the morals of a head-hunter—Stalin, the Georgian—has been parroting ever since in his semiliterate Russian that since a capitalist country cannot consume all it produces, because of the low income of its masses, it must export or die. Well, then, he would meet us with ruinous competition in overseas markets, help swell the ranks of our unemployed, recruit them into the Red-Fascist movement and hasten the collapse of our free institutions.

One might forgive Marx for his now exposed silly writings about the development of capitalism. He could not have foreseen the miracle of America's mass production system with the lowest unskilled worker enjoying a much higher standard of living than even the highest engineer in Russia. But the refusal of his disciples to recognize the superiority of a free-enterprise economy to their totalitarian form can only be ascribed to the deranged mentalities of the leaders and the blindness of their followers. A rude awakening, of course, is awaiting them. But until it comes, we must accept the challenge of relentless trade war here and everywhere. Defensive measures alone will not suffice. We must take the offensive in concert with like-thinking nations if possible—alone if we must.

As our continued prosperity becomes more and more dependent on international trade, both exports and imports, the Soviet intriguers are taking to that channel as a means of doing injury to our economy. Throughout their existence the Russian peoples have been accustomed to getting along on next to nothing, on a close-to-animal existence. On the other hand, their leaders know that if Americans suffer a drop from their high standard of living, discontent among our people will be widespread. Although the Soviets have been in need of consumer goods worth tens of billions of dollars since 1917, they bought none here or anywhere else. Averaging a meager $46,000,000 a year during the 20 years prior to the last war, those purchases were primarily (87 percent, for example, in 1938) of our most modern machines and equipment. Sample units were bought so their designs could be pirated for domestic consumption and exported to other countries in order to impress those peoples with "Soviet industrial achievements." Such business was obviously disadvantageous to us and most profitable to the Soviet Union. Under the hammer blows of this intensified trade war, our Government followed the advice of well-informed people and since 1948 has cut down the flow of strategic machinery and equipment to the Soviet Union and its satellites. Many loopholes, however, are still to be plugged.

The disappearance of much of the world behind the iron curtain has already cut us off from markets laboriously developed by our people. Of course the Soviet Union would like nothing better than to use those countries as a means to obtaining here the needed machinery and equipment. But that is all the Soviets will allow these nations to buy from us. As long as they are under the yoke of the Kremlin, the satellites won't take any of our consumer goods. Formerly, before Czechoslovakia came under the control of the Soviets, we used to sell her 13,000,000 people almost as much as we sold Russia's 180,000,000 in the course of a year. This business was profitable to both Czechoslovakia and to the United States. The same was true of our trade relations with Poland—until the hand of the Kremlin stopped all that "nonsense."

It is therefore clear that once the foreign-trade war gathers momentum, hundreds of thousands of our workers and employees will feel the pinch; so will the United States Treasury in reduced income-tax receipts; so will the stockholders of corporations with or without overseas trade.

This outlook will not change as long as there is a Soviet Government in Russia. Under the circumstances the reader is bound to ask the inevitable question: Can anything be done to remedy the situation? What should it be?

1. Sever trade relations with Russia and all the Kremlin-ruled countries. This step appears to be inevitable and it would be to our advantage to take it now. As Soviet military and industrial power grows, as consolidation of human and material resources in eastern Europe and China is accomplished, their arrogance, insolence, and hatred of us will express itself in even more serious forms than the shooting down of an unarmed American plane over the Baltic Sea. If need be, they will press down still further the standard of living of their own people and dump their increased output on world markets to eliminate us as a competitor.

Our severing trade relations would bring cheer to the enslaved millions and consternation to their tyrants. Many a time brave Russian functionaries have said to me:

"Mr. Marcus, why do you Americans come here to deal with our Government? You are enhancing the Kremlin's prestige, you are tightening the noose around your necks."

2. We must make it perfectly clear to Moscow that if diplomatic relations are to be continued, it will have to be on a strict reciprocity basis. Up to now Stalin's interpretation of reciprocity has prevailed and it has amounted to his saying to us: "You Americans must do in our country as we tell you to, and we will act in your country as we damned well please." And he has got away with it. Washington has done considerable injury to our interests by permitting this to go on with impunity.

The Soviet Embassy in Washington must not be allowed to have a single member on its staff more than we have in Moscow. From the Ambassador down their personnel must be restricted in their movement about the country as ours are in Russia. Under no circumstances should they be permitted to address public meetings, issue interviews or write for publications. Their official publications here should be subjected to the same searching censorship as ours are in Moscow; their circulation must be restricted to the number of our magazine copies allowed in Russia.

3. Attacks against our Government and people by the Soviet press and radio must be construed as an attack by the Soviet Government, since all means of communication are owned and operated by that Government. We must demand and receive equal space or time in the Soviet press and on the radio to answer their slanders and lies against us.

4. If our just demands are rejected, diplomatic relations should be broken off altogether. It is serving no good purpose to us and merely affording them a means of villifying us to our face and before the whole world.

5. Stop all relief shipments to Russia and the satellites; prohibit the remittance of all funds from this country to individuals and organizations in the Soviet Union or the satellite nations. It all goes to help strengthen the enemy; it impoverishes our people directly and indirectly by reducing their purchasing power.

Adding insult to injury, we have permitted those gangster governments to set up right here on our soil customs stations to fleece our people by imposing duties on food, clothing, and medicine parcels sent by our kind-hearted people to the needy in the iron-curtain countries. It is indeed monstrous that our officials proved to be so stupid or pliable as to overlook such flagrant violation of our rights.

The more we help worsen conditions in those countries by increasing discontent among their masses, the sooner will the tyranny be ended. The guns and bombers are still in the hands of the people—the sons of peasants and workers, the first victims of the Red nightmare.

It is futile to leave the conduct of this perpetual war with the implacable enemy to bureaucrats alone. It is perfectly clear that our best and ablest men are still outside and not inside the Government. Some of the immediate steps should be:

1. Declare a national emergency until our goal of bringing an end to Soviet imperialism is achieved.

2. Forge a united nation. There must be no room in America for hate-mongers—whether the field be race, color, or religion. Whoever engages in such hate-mongering is as valuable a servant of Red fascism as though he were a card-carrying Communist.

3. Labor and management must pull together, making a conscientious effort to maintain peace and uninterrupted production. The belated drive against Communist infiltration into labor unions must be intensified and continued until the last subversive has been purged.

4. Rally the Nation behind the All-American Committee formed at the All-American Conference last January, sponsored by the American Legion to launch a vigorous campaign against the Soviet counter-revolution. The Communists are giving the whole of their lives to fomenting unrest and the destruction of liberty. Is it asking too much that the patriotic people of the country give the whole of their lives to preserve and perpetuate our freedoms?

5. Under the driving and coordinating power of a citizens' general staff of the All-American Committee, clubs, societies, labor-union locals, trade associations, educational, religious, and fraternal organizations, etc., should dispense with all non-urgent activities and devote themselves to the emergency campaign by contributing funds, ideas, services to the relentless prosecution of the war of liberation.

6. Our millions of naturalized citizens must take their places in the front ranks of this movement. In America they found the liberty and opportunities denied them in their native lands. Those whose ancestors did not help build the free institutions under which they now live should deem it their sacred duty to help strengthen and preserve those institutions.

As one of America's naturalized citizens, I may be permitted to add that we have much to atone for. The Communist movement here is the creation of former immigrants; they still provide most of the leadership and the rank and file membership. Of the 4,980 militant subversives, no less than 91.4 percent are of foreign origin or married to former immigrants, according to the United States Attorney General's testimony before a Senate Judiciary Subcommittee. America does not deserve such thanklessness on the part of people who have benefited from the free institutions of this country. This disgraceful stain must be washed away with indefatigable labor and sacrifice in the cause of freedom on the part of us naturalized citizens.

7. The hundreds of thousands of DPs from eastern Europe and Russia are willing fighters in this cause. If we give them the wherewithal, they can inflict some mortal blows to the tyranny across the iron curtain. The partisans who are still fighting in the forests of the Ukraine and Byelorussia must be helped to continue with renewed effort. A dozen or more weekly publications must be made available to them to reach the masses of the afflicted countries. A dozen or more powerful radios would be the cheapest investment to help preserve freedom. The hundreds of thousands of Soviet occupation troops in Europe must be reached and influenced to carry the torch of liberty into the enemy camps.

If this were done we would soon see an increase in sabotage against the tyrannical governments. Disorder and confusion would follow; as reprisals by the governments multiplied, so would the number of embittered and desperate people in the Red domain. The late war helped rip the iron curtain. Millions of Russians have seen life outside their borders. They know that for decades their government lied to them about conditions abroad. They have seen with their own eyes that even the humblest worker lives better than the privileged Russians, that the Soviet oppressive atmosphere is totally unknown outside their borders. Before the Soviet government manages to liquidate the remnants of the millions of former slave laborers in Europe and the war prisoners, the tide will turn against it.

The virility, imagination and self-sacrifice which has made this Nation great must now be applied to solving our problem No. 1 in Russia by renewing hope and bolstering the spirit of revolt among hundreds of millions of people. In the absence of such a movement they feel abandoned to their fate.

8. Stalin's most cherished dream is to place the German people with their industrial and organizing genius under his heel to help his designs for world domination. Americans with German family ties, therefore, must bestir themselves to help save our freedom and their kinfolk overseas before it is too late.

What we fail to do during the next 3 to 5 years may well decide the fate not only of these United States but of civilization. Stalin is already gaining converts in Germany for another Rapallo agreement among the same selfish former diplomats, militarists and narrow-minded industrialists who not so long ago helped bring Hitler to power and with him the consequent German downfall. If they succeed this time in cementing a union between the Kremlin and Germany, it might well mean the end of all civilization.

Surely there must be within this Nation at least 54,000 red-blooded Americans ready and willing to match the 54,000 card-carrying Stalinists in the United States of America, to fight them here and all over the world, to bring an end to the Soviet counter-revolution and thereby forestall the inevitable third world war. The Red plague must be destroyed at its source.

The hour of decision is here. Our sacrifices are already great and promise to become even greater. Yet that need not be the case if we only use better judgment in employing the billions we are now spending and the effort we are now putting forth. Mediocrities in government and civilian leadership must give way to the ablest and most imaginative. These new leaders must come forward, they must give up their present unproductive pastimes to devote themselves to the saving of their country's free institutions and world civilization. If we do not default, victory will be ours.

Dick Doyle Comes Home

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting in the RECORD a newspaper story from the Daily Missoulian, of Missoula, Mont., and the Montana Standard of Butte, Mont., under date of August 3 and relating to Dick Doyle's athletic exploits overseas.

Dick is one of Montana State University's great all-time athletes. A fine student, an outstanding sports participant, and a real man, Dick represents all that is good in the American youth of today. He is a credit to his family, his school, his State, and his country and we welcome him home not because of the honors he has received but because he is Dick Doyle—a good American boy that we are all proud of and from whom we expect to hear much in the years ahead.

Mr. Speaker, the news story follows:

[From the Daily Missoulian and Montana Standard of August 3, 1950]

DISCUS CHAMP DICK DOYLE HEADS HOME WITH HONORS, TROPHIES—MONTANA UNIVERSITY ACE HAD BIG TIME ON TOUR

NEW YORK, August 2.—Dick Doyle came home loaded.

No, not that way, buddy. Dick was loaded with silver loving cups, crystal vases, javelins, skis, track shoes, discuses, and other trophies of his jaunt to Finland with an AAU track and field troupe.

Dick Doyle is national collegiate discus champion. His home is Missoula, Mont., and gals, we guarantee if he was put in a line with movie stars, crooners, and other glamour boys you'd point to him and say: "I want that."

He's 6 feet 3 inches and 195 pounds of good looks, charm, and modesty, but don't get the idea he is a Mr. Meek and start to push him around. He plays a spot of end on the University of Montana football team, and his huge right mitt sent a 4½-pound platter spinning 171 feet 5 inches as he won his national title.

Doyle went to Finland June 26 with 14 other athletes, including Fortune Gordien of Minnesota. Gordien holds the world record for the discus throw, which accounts for the fact Doyle won that event in only 8 of the 10 meets in which he took part overseas.

AIMS AT 1952 OLYMPICS

The 15-man squad competed in three meets as a unit. Gordien won the discus event in two of them, and was unable to take part in the third because of a muscle strain, so Doyle won that one. After the three big meets, including one at Helsinki witnessed by 13,000 spectators, the squad split into small groups for barnstorming tours.

"The people there really are track-minded," Doyles says. "They start training as kids for the different events. They're very fine sportsmen, too, and applauded us wholeheartedly.

"We all enjoyed the trip tremendously, and I'm looking forward to going there for the 1952 Olympics, if I can make the team, of course. They are enlarging the beautiful white stadium at Helsinki to accommodate about 80,000 people and are making plans for an Olympic village.

"We ate pretty well over there. Vegetables and fruits are scarce, but there is plenty of meat and fish." Dick winced a little as he mentioned fish and you gathered he'd rather be an innocent bystander at a goldfish-swallowing contest.

"The weather, for summer, was quite cool. When it got up to 60° you considered it a hot day. One night it got down to 42°. They don't use fuel in summer, no matter how cold it gets, so we piled into bed with our warm-up suits on to keep warm."

We mentioned that he must have brought home eight trophies, as he had told us he won eight discus events.

HELPED BY FINNISH COACH

"More than that," he grinned. "I won a couple of 110-meter hurdle events, too, and, oh yes," he added, "I got the honor prize in two meets." It developed the honor prize was something like a most-valuable-player award. The best man in the meet, no less.

Doyle's best mark over there was 170 feet 2 inches. We suggested he'd probably be gunning for 175 feet now.

"One eighty," he corrected. "After what Armas Valste taught me—he's the Finnish Olympic coach—and after watching me he suggested that I wasn't getting enough legs into my throws. The advice helped me and I'm going to keep practicing on it."

Dick returned here last Saturday by air, toting 132 pounds of baggage, not counting a pair of skis and four new javelins, which made him look like a man trying to get through a revolving door with an armful of trombones. He'll reload and head for home this week end.

Recommit the Knowland Amendment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER A. LYNCH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, as I was one of the conferees on the social-security bill, H. R. 6000, and did not sign the conference report, I have received many inquiries as to the reason for my refusal to sign the report and what course I intended to pursue with respect to the report.

I refused to sign the report because of the failure of our House conferees to insist upon the inclusion of total and permanent disability insurance and because of their acceptance of the Knowland amendment, which appears in the Senate version of the bill.

I have this day sent to each Member of the House a letter which, as briefly as I could make it, sets forth my position and the course I hope to pursue.

The letter follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 8, 1950.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: The conference report on the social-security bill, H. R. 6000, is programed for House action on Thursday, August 10. I was one of the conferees, but did not sign the report. If I am recognized by the Chair, I shall offer a motion to recommit the report with instructions to the House managers to insist upon the House provision for total and permanent disability insurance and to reject the Knowland provision in the Senate amendment.

I believe that the Knowland amendment strikes at the foundation of the entire unemployment-insurance program. Briefly, the Knowland amendment:

1. Makes it possible for a State unemployment-compensation agency to deprive a worker of his unemployment-insurance benefits for refusing to be a strikebreaker.

2. Makes it possible for a State unemployment-compensation agency to deprive a worker of his unemployment-insurance benefits if he refuses work on a job where the wages, hours, or other conditions of the work offered are below those prevailing for similar work in the locality.

3. Makes it possible for a State unemployment-compensation agency to cause a worker to lose his unemployment-insurance benefits if he refuses work on a job where he is required to belong to a union or where he might be required to resign from, or refrain from, joining a bona fide union.

4. Compels an unemployed worker, aggrieved by an unfair or unjust ruling of a State administrator, to go to court and exhaust every legal remedy in the State courts before the Secretary of Labor may act. To my mind unemployment-insurance benefits should be given during the period of unemployment—not 2 or 3 years later, after every legal remedy in the State courts has been exhausted, and at his expense.

5. Will break down the standards established by Congress and will substitute therefor the interpretations of the law by the courts of the 48 States.

6. Is a threat, in the present Korean crisis, to manpower mobilization, as most of labor, especially skilled labor, must, of necessity, depend upon uniform interpretation of the unemployment-insurance law.

7. Is not stopgap legislation as the report indicates. It is permanent legislation—so permanent that it can only be terminated by repeal legislation.

It is to be noted that the deprivation of the workers' benefits as indicated above may be accomplished entirely without any action of the State legislature and wholly upon a ruling of an appointed official, the State administrator. We all know that law is made by administrative agencies as well as by legislative bodies.

It has been suggested that if the motion to recommit, with instructions as outlined above, is carried, no further action will be had on the bill during this Congress. I entertain no such fear. I have too much respect for the integrity and wisdom and political sagacity of my fellow conferees to believe that they would let this bill die through their inaction.

It is quite possible that a simple motion to recommit will be offered, or a motion to recommit with certain instructions, but without reference to the Knowland amendment. Either of such motions will be designed to freeze the Knowland amendment into the bill and will be definitely aimed at undermining the entire unemployment-insurance program and should be defeated.

I trust that this explanation will assist you in your decision with respect to the Knowland amendment.

Cordially yours,
WALTER A. LYNCH,
Member of Congress.

Letter From Governor of Puerto Rico

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under the permission heretofore granted me by unanimous consent of the House, I include herewith the following letter addressed to me by the Honorable Luis Muñoz Marín, Governor of Puerto Rico:

LA FORTALEZA, PUERTO RICO,
August 1, 1950.

Hon. JOHN J. ROONEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ROONEY: Both in my personal and official capacity and on behalf of the people of Puerto Rico I wish to express to you my heartfelt thanks for your participation in bringing forth favorable action on the bill recognizing the right of your fellow citizens of Puerto Rico to approve their own constitution. I truly think that this step, that speaks so highly of the American democratic tradition, opens new political possibilities worth while watching by the world at large.

With renewed expression of my appreciation, I am

Cordially yours,
LUIS MUÑOZ MARÍN,
Governor.

Korea Exposes One of Worst Blunders in American History

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence from the Washington Evening Star of Monday, August 7, 1950:

KOREA EXPOSES ONE OF WORST BLUNDERS IN AMERICAN HISTORY—THOSE RESPONSIBLE FOR MILITARY WEAKNESS SHOULD BE RELIEVED

(By David Lawrence)

Whatever the immediate significance of the Korean war, a profound effect on the long-range military policy of the United States has been produced.

Never again can America depend on that narrow concept of a one-weapon strategy, the failure of which has brought the Nation to its senses suddenly to learn that American interests can be as gravely injured by a series of local attacks in different parts of the globe as by a blitz at a given point by the large-scale forces of an enemy.

For one of the worst blunders in all American history has been committed. It is a blunder inexcusable because it defied the plain lessons of history taught in every naval or military war college in every nation of the world for centuries past.

The truth is that a nation with global responsibilities, disregarding the simple fact that three-quarters of the earth's surface is covered with water, ignored the age-old doctrine which called for the stationing of naval and military forces at strategic locations outside continental United States. America's offensive strength has always been her best defense.

Today Soviet Russia has acquired a vast coast line on the mainland of China and is reaching down with her land armies to Korea and is plainly threatening Japan, Okinawa, and the Philippines. Against this the United States has an insignificant fleet in the Pacific Ocean. Its air power from floating bases is relatively small. Its fire power from battleships and heavy cruisers for shore bombardment is virtually nonexistent. Its "hunter killer" defense by planes from small carriers against submarines is tragically absent from important sea areas in our line of communications, though the planes and the ships have been available for 5 years.

History shows that sea power is basic to the transportation of men and supplies and for the effective use of land power and air power at the point of trouble.

NAVY LOSES ITS STATUS

Whoever, therefore, scuttled the American Navy is responsible for today's debacle, having deprived the Navy of its status as a "fleet in being" recognized for centuries as a fundamental principle of national strategy. Those responsible for this mistake in judgment should be relieved of office—civilian or military.

Whoever took away from the United States Army its own airplane units capable of operating always with ground troops—compelling the Army to rely instead on the intermittent help of bombers or inadequate tactical units furnished by a United States Air Force primarily and rightly concerned with long-range strategic bombing—should be relieved of office, whether civilian or military. For to send a ground army into action without its own air artillery is like sending infantry into action without ground artillery.

Whoever fostered the idea that land armies of the United States could fight nowadays without armored divisions of tanks in sufficient numbers should be relieved of office—civilian or military.

Whoever sold Congress the idea that America would not need overseas bases—floating or fixed—with adequate forces maintained constantly in areas of potential trouble distant from our shores should be exposed to view now.

Politeness, personal friendships or sensitivity, partisanship are criminal excuses if they stand in the way of punishment of the blunderers. No other course will satisfy the mothers of the men who are dying in Korea nor the mothers of the many more young men about to die as a consequence of these mistakes.

WHITEWASH INDICATED

The Congress shows signs of preparing a whitewash. A subcommittee of the Senate Armed Services Committee has been hastily appointed with hand-picked partisans, and already it has been announced, in effect, that past mistakes will be ignored. What a travesty on congressional government. Will the American people have to punish the Democratic Party at the polls next autumn, deprive it of its majority status, and accept Republican leadership which has also been indifferent if only now to register a protest and get the President to clean house? He might do it by transfers and camouflaged changes in function, but the end result should be to get some new military and civilian planners of strategy at the top.

America today needs to fix on a new long-range policy commensurate with her responsibilities in the United Nations. America needs at least 3,000,000 troops with plenty of tactical aviation of their own, a naval fleet close to what it had in 1945, an Air Force of 70 groups for strategic bombing, and a mobile force of United States Marines of at least 250,000 men to be stationed in various parts of the world where it can be supported by the sea power and air power.

These are the real costs of survival. These are the elements of a national strategy based on the lessons of history and experience. The price of peace is never inexpensive and the price of survival always is economic discomfort and sacrifice. The tragedies of ancient Greece and Rome, the tragedies of Italy and France and Germany and Japan in modern times attest too plainly from a military and naval viewpoint to the disregard by their top commanders or civilian rulers of the significant lessons of strategy in world history.

Development of Critical Materials

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WESLEY A. D'EWART
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, on July 31 my good friend, Hon. BEN JENSEN, of Iowa, made the following statement with regard to certain administration officials:

I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that while American boys are fighting and dying in Korea, the Truman administration has delayed an all-important meeting to stimulate much-needed minerals and metals production program so that a high Government official can travel around the country making speeches.

The Associated Press reports that Interior Secretary Chapman has delayed from August 1 to August 3 a meeting of the Department's National Minerals Advisory Council because Crow Girard Davidson, the Department's Assistant Secretary for Mineral Resources, is off on a political junket and will not be in Washington on August 1.

Mr. Chapman notified the 44 members of the Advisory Council that the meeting is urgent and important. I agree that such a conference is urgent and important. But, despite the urgency of the situation and the need for wartime speed-up in the development of vital minerals and metals now needed on the Korean front, Chapman delays the meeting in the interest of politics, as usual.

I believe that the Members of this House and the people of the Nation want Government officials, particularly those concerned with the war effort, to remain on the job in Washington in these serious days. I believe the people of the country are getting sick and tired of the double shuffling of the Truman deal, fighting a war with one hand and playing politics with the other.

A delay of 2 days in a program for the development of critical materials is not only shocking, it is criminal.

The boys in Korea cannot take 2 days off from the bombs and the fire of the blazing Red tanks. They must stay on the job every second, fighting for the principles of freedom and liberty while the Washington bureaucrats delay the war effort with a political junket on the taxpayers' time and money, speaking at Democratic rallies in Montana, Idaho, and other points.

Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that at least one Montana newspaper editor agrees with the gentleman from Iowa concerning this political junket. I include at this point an editorial from the Bozeman Daily Chronicle, which is published by Mr. Jefferson Jones:

TELLING MONTANA HOW TO VOTE

At a cost of some $500 a day to the taxpayers of the country, C. Girard Davidson, Assistant Secretary of the Department of Interior, flew to Great Falls last Friday to tell the people of Montana how to vote in the coming election. Ignoring the fact that the country is at war, Davidson comes into our midst to beat political drums and to work indirectly for a socialized authority by which the people of Montana can be robbed of their constitutional rights and control over the State's water resources.

It is a sad commentary on the times that while fathers and mothers are readying their sons for the draft that there are demagogs like Davidson in Government who are oblivious of the war and who waste public funds in plane journeys, hither and yon, to talk twaddle to anyone who will listen. Evidently, it is to be politics as usual with some Government officials this year as American GI's fight to the death to hang on to the tip of the Korean peninsula.

Probably Washington was glad to get rid of Davidson for a few days at least. What's $1,500 of the taxpayers dough for a 3-day jaunt to and from Montana if in the expenditure the Interior Department can be rid of the individual who has sunk the Department to a low in good will throughout the West.

As a matter of fact Davidson and his policies are under attack from all sides in this country. Only 2 weeks ago Bernard De Voto in a scathing article in the Saturday Evening Post captioned, "Shall we let them ruin our national parks?" knocked Interior Department officialdom, including Davidson, so breathless that no reply has yet been made. Davidson is supposed to have been handling national parks for the Interior Department.

Only some 60 days ago Davidson's policies were the target of the CIO Utility Workers Union of America, which in resolutions declared that if Government participation in the utility business was permitted to continue "we will soon have authorities, not elected by the people, but appointed, who will constitute a supergovernment with control of practically all the electric power in the Nation." To this statement, also, Davidson has been silent.

But the Davidson policies hit the Interior Department its worst blow when the American engineering profession in a sharply worded report, through an 80-man committee, spoke out bluntly against excessive and unsound water resources practices, which it attributed to competing Federal agencies and congressional "response to pressure and trading" and which called for a halt in further authorizations.

Davidson, it would seem, has enough to answer for without taking a $1,500 taxpayers' joyride into Montana to tell citizens how to vote. He could better spend the time in sticking to a job which he was appointed to do, and which the evidence shows he has neglected.

Tribute to Alice Carter Oliver by May M. Cresswell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. STENNIS
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Miss May Cresswell, State home demonstration agent of Mississippi, in regard to the outstanding career of Alice Carter Oliver, district agent in charge of Negro home demonstration work in Mississippi, who is retiring from active service. This statement from the Extension Service Review, a publication of the United States Department of Agriculture, contains appropriate tribute to a woman who has served her people for more than 30 years in an effort to help them improve their home practices and living conditions. Her success in this field is widely recognized in Mississippi and over the Nation, and she is respected and appreciated by the people of her home State.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALICE OLIVER RETIRES

(By May M. Cresswell, State home demonstration agent, Mississippi)

Alice Carter Oliver, district agent in charge of Negro home demonstration work, 1917 to 1950, is retiring this year. She was the first Negro home demonstration agent in Mississippi. Her first salary was $1 per year, and her first task was to organize groups of women and girls to study better homemaking practices on Coahoma County. This was in 1917. Less than a year later Alice was placed in charge of organizing home demonstration work for Negro women and girls in the counties of northwest Mississippi. Her work was so successful there that, as provision was made for the expansion of extension work, Alice was named district agent in charge of Negro home demonstration work in Mississippi.

On March 1, 1946, when the number of counties employing Negro home-demonstration agents had grown to 50, the second district agent was appointed. This district agent, Daisy M. Lewis, was given supervision of half the counties; and, like other Mississippi home-demonstration agents, she had been selected and trained by Alice Carter Oliver.

The career of Alice Carter Oliver in extension work has been unique and her service outstanding. She was born in Frankfort, Ky., in 1887, the youngest child of Mose and Lucy Carter. She attended Greenhill public school in Frankfort and Kentucky State College. Later she took advance courses at Cheyney Training School in Pennsylvania and at the University of Illinois. Alice taught for 6 years in the schools of Frankfort, coming to Sunflower County in 1910 where she engaged in social-service work with the Negro people at Stephensville. In 1911 she married Georg H. Oliver, superintendent of Negro schools in Clarksdale. For a while Alice served as supervisor of home economics under the Jeanes fund and for several years taught in the Negro schools of Clarksdale.

George and Alice Oliver were highly respected by both white people and Negroes in the county and the surrounding Delta. They were leaders among the Negroes and had the confidence of the white citizens of that area. Having observed the work of white home demonstration agents and realizing that her own people might improve their living conditions through work of this kind, Alice Carter, in 1917, applied to the director of extension, E. R. Lloyd, through Susie V. Powell, State home demonstration agent, for permission to organize groups of rural Negro women and girls in agricultural and home-making projects. Alice's first compensation was $1 per year, with the use of the franking privilege. Her first groups were organized in Coahoma County.

She found that the white planters readily understood the needs of the Negro families and, for the most part, were in sympathy with her efforts. Near the end of her first year, Alice's efficient service was recognized. She was given a salary and the title of district agent in charge of Negro home demonstration work. Her district consisted of 17 counties in north Mississippi.

Alice visited boards of supervisors and told them of her work and of the needs of her people. In many instances she was able to convince them that the services of a Negro home demonstration agent would be a valuable asset to the county. When asked how she, an unknown Negro worker, managed to get an audience with these boards, Alice said: "Many times I got in through the front door of the board room by seeing a supervisor's wife or some other influential white lady at the back door. Sometimes she would put on her hat and go with me to meet the board.

When Alice accepted the dollar-a-year job in 1917, she was the lone Negro home demonstration agent in Mississippi. This year, as she now retires, there are full-time Negro home demonstration agents in 54 counties, working with 21,121 4-H Club girls, and as many adult women. These women and girls are striving to improve their homes and the family's standard of living through the adoption of better practices in homemaking, gardening, poultry raising, and marketing. They are learning the importance of sanitation, of healthful living, and of good family and community and race relationships. Most of the 54 home demonstration agents are college graduates, trained in home economics. Some of the older ones who do not have their degrees have, nevertheless, had special training courses in home economics and are strengthened by years of successful work in the field and under the supervision of Alice Carter Oliver.

Alice's health has failed now so that she must live quietly, giving up the hard travel schedules which took her into the highways and byways of Mississippi. She retires with the respect and affection no only of all the Negro extension workers but of the entire extension staff who knew her and have seen her work. Her work has been so outstanding that often she was called on to go to other States to tell about the progress of Negro extension work in her State. Alice will be missed, but she leaves behind her a sound organization and a staff of trained conscientious workers who have the interest of the Negro people at heart.

In a farewell letter to the State office, Alice expresses her gratitude and her affection for her white coworkers in the Extension Service. She writes: "It has been a privilege to work with you, and I shall always be grateful for the kindness you have shown me and the support you have given me in my work." "Please, ma'am," Alice adds, "call on me if I can ever be of service in any way."

Alice's retirement marks the close of a useful career. She served with humility but with dignity at all times. Her life has been an inspiration to thousands of her own race and to us, her coworkers, who have watched her tireless efforts, her enthusiasm, and her loyalty to her people and to her work.

California Cost Accounting on Arizona Reclamation Projects—One-Column Unbalance Sheet

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, not all of us are accountants, and I find myself confused by the intricacies of bookkeeping. It appears to be good bookkeeping practice when it is desired to present a financial picture of a business investment to draw up what is called a balance sheet. I have seen such a picture but my recollection is that it usually has two columns—one entitled "Resources" and the other "Liabilities." Lately a new type of bookkeeping picture of capital investment has been presented by California authorities which has only one column, and since it does not balance with anything, I presume this new calculation might be called an unbalance sheet.

This new picture has been presented with reference to the proposed Government investment in the central Arizona project, embodied in S. 75 now before Congress. Congressman POULSON, of California, is one who has presented this new type of investment picture, as will be found in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at page A5358 Congressman POULSON calls the central Arizona irrigation project a fantastic proposal, and to try to back up his assertion he pictures it as costing billions and mentions an interest cost alone of $2,000,000,000 on the proposed investment over a period of 75 years. If that is the whole and correct picture, it is not a pretty one; but is it the correct picture?

Congressman POULSON even has Secretary of the Interior Chapman helping him draw up this unbalance sheet it would seem, for he says the Secretary of the Interior was asked the question concerning the amount of interest which would accumulate on a given sum—the cost of the project—through 75 years and that Secretary Chapman said the arithmetical amount would be $2,000,000,000. Is Secretary Chapman condemning it? Let us see, for it is strange in view of the fact that Secretary Chapman has given his official sanction and approval to this project and urges that it be built. A little later I will explain how the Secretary of the Interior happens to be doing this homework in arithmetic.

If I were an accountant after this new California bookkeeping pattern, I could draw up an unbalance sheet on numerous great capital investments, some in California, but to begin, let us consider Thomas Jefferson's investment of $15,000,000 in the year 1803 in a piece of real estate west of the Mississippi River, known as Louisiana. If this unbalance sheet is to be the California one-column affair, we must compute the interest which would accrue on $15,000,000 at say 4 percent compounded semi-annually from 1803 to the present date. A mathematician tells me that $15,000,000 so invested through 147 years would amount to $5,269,000,000, which of course must show as a loss to the American taxpayer on this investment. Therefore, from this California type of accounting, we must conclude that that real estate project was a serious mistake and a financial blunder of the first order.

I always supposed that big corporations under our private enterprise system commonly borrow money thus creating an interest bearing debt in order to carry on their business venture but this California interest cost calculation has me confused. Let us take the biggest corporation in California, or to be specific, we might take the Southern Pacific Railroad, which has been organized for perhaps 75 years. That great railroad company no doubt has outstanding bonds representing the money it has borrowed and those bonds undoubtedly bear interest. Would Congressman POULSON picture the financial worth of the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. by drawing up one of his unbalance sheets for this great corporation showing only one column and have that made up only of the total amount of interest which the railroad company has paid out or was obligated to pay out on its borrowed money? If so I fear that great railroad company would not seek his services to present such a sheet, for it would not be a pretty picture either to the owners or to any financially minded person and certainly not to investors.

However, I shall not attempt levity to match the Californian's sophistry. The utter absurdity is apparent of charging up the possible interest on any good investment and presenting it as a half statement without any consideration whatsoever being given to the far greater offsetting benefits. These counterbalancing benefits are in wealth-creating, taxpaying, social, and economic cultural developments which make the money cost seem small in comparison even to the money returns. Yet this distorted half picture is the type of figuring the new accountancy which this school of obstructionists in Los Angeles are presenting to Congress and to the country concerning irrigation projects in Arizona. I wonder how many people are being fooled by such a distorted, halfway presentation of these economic and financial facts.

When Secretary Chapman computed some interest costs in relation to the seventeenth question which the Californians submitted to him about the interest charge on the central Arizona project, he merely performed what any mathematician would do in computing a problem in arithmetic, but he did not say thereby that the investment was fantastic or unworthy. If I had asked the Secretary how much interest $15,000,000 invested in Louisiana would have accumulated in 147 years at a certain stated rate of interest, he would have answered $5,269,168,668 correctly, but that would not have expressed his opinion that Jefferson made a blunder in such an investment. If I wanted to deride the founding of New York City and figure the cost according to this California style, I might recall that the Dutch, in the year 1609, paid $25 for Manhattan Island. Now, interest rates were high in those days. So we might compute the interest on $25 at 10 percent during the 341 years and show what a bad bargain and crazy investment the Dutch made in the purchase of that land. However, I have never seen any such one-column unbalance sheet drawn up by the chamber of commerce or the Chase National Bank, or any other financial authority for advertising purposes in America's greatest city. Ask any New Yorker whether this special California brand of accounting in computing interest charges alone appeals to him.

Perhaps this special brand of California bookkeeping coming as it does out of Los Angeles does not have great appeal to the Californians in the great Central Valley. Knowing Congressman POULSON'S attitude, as I do, toward reclamation projects, in California, as in Arizona, I am sure he would just as soon apply this picture to the great California development in the Central Valley as he would to apply it to the central Arizona project. The other day he said that reclamation projects ought to be put in moth balls, but I think he meant to say, all such plans should be thrown into the ashcan, and that is the purpose of his variety of accounting. If we apply his brand of cost accounting to the great California development which may take more than a hundred years to complete I am sure the interest charge alone on the hundreds of millions of dollars put into the project would total five or six billions of dollars. That is the comparative picture which these so-called friends of irrigation would have Congress see and have the American people believe their Government is attempting to do in that great agricultural empire only now half developed in central California.

If we listen to these men for whom Congressman POULSON appears to be spokesman we will put an end to irrigation and turn over as quickly as possible all the power-producing facilities thus far built in order to furnish the Power Trust the cheapest possible hydroelectric power at the bus bar. Los Angeles wants more and cheaper power for her growth. That is the hoped-for effect of their figuring and this is a sample of their method of figuring.

How Communists Operate, by J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI, and Answer to Vicious Editorial in Washington Post

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question just asked concerning Communist publications, I desire to call attention to the fact that one of the outstanding publications that is doing more harm than anything else here in the District of Columbia is the Washington Post, sometimes referred to as "the uptown edition of the Communist Daily Worker."

On yesterday, August 7, that publication quoted with approval Soviet Russia's attack on the United States to the effect that "American democracy is false, because we flagrantly violate the premises of democracy by discriminating against particular groups in our own country, because they have different national origin or racial derivation."

Remember, that was an editorial in yesterday's Washington Post. That publication is lined up with an un-American front known as the "Anti-defamation League," which has a file on every man who amounts to anything in America—whether he is a Member of Congress, Governor of a State, member of a State legislature, a businessman, or just a private citizen of influence in the locality in which he lives. It is carrying on the most infamous persecution of white Americans ever known in all the history of this country.

This Washington Post is also lined up behind the so-called National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which is doing the law abiding Negroes of this country more harm than any other organization outside of the Communist Party itself.

The Post, in this editorial, commenting on the attack on the United States by Soviet Russia, says:

> These charges have the sting of truth.

A more infamous falsehood never stained the pages of an American publication, or polluted the cowardly lips of depraved humanity.

Russia's charges not only do not have the "sting of truth"; but they are vicious lies that are being spread throughout the world to try to destroy our form of Government, and to wreck the civilization of mankind.

This same editorial goes on to say that—

> The Capital of the United States, with all its memorials here dedicated to liberty, maintains the policy of Negro segregation in housing, in the schools, in most forms of business, in hospitals, and in churches.

This Washington Post has for several years carried on this Communist smear propaganda to try to force Negroes into white schools, playgrounds, swimming pools, and churches of the District of Columbia, for the sole purpose of stirring trouble between the races here in Washington. The better element of the Negroes here in the District of Columbia have appealed to us to help them get segregated places where they can meet and not be bothered with members of other races, especially the ones who are interested in promoting communism and stirring up racial friction throughout the country.

The white Americans throughout the country are appealing to us to protect them from these communistic influences.

The editorial to which I refer will undoubtedly be repeated in Pravda and other Communist publications throughout the world.

Under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting excerpts from an article from the United States News entitled "How Communists Operate," an interview with J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

In this connection, let me say that J. Edgar Hoover is a great American, and he is doing everything he can to expose the Communists and to protect our country from these enemies within our gates.

In this interview Mr. Hoover was asked this question:

> Do you think, Mr. Hoover, that Communists are basically agents of a foreign country, or do you draw a distinction between those who are philosophical Communists and those who are tools of the Communist spy rings?

His answer was:

> The teachings of communism are directed toward one final result—world revolution and the triumph of international communism. The achievement of this aim would mean the violent and complete destruction of the American Government. Any person who subscribes to these teachings, regardless of his reason, is working against American democracy and for the benefit of international communism's chief leader, Soviet Russia. The "philosophical Communist" who advocates Marxism-Leninism might just as well be working as an agent of a foreign power because he is aiding its cause. He is, in fact, however, being "played for a sucker" by the Communists, who consider him a dupe, a person not to be trusted but only to be used and then discarded.

Then he was asked:

Do your investigators show that the basic allegiance of a Communist is to a foreign government rather than our own Government?

To which he replied:

Most emphatically. As I mentioned in my previous answer, the ultimate loyalty of fully indoctrinated Communist Party members is to Moscow. Stalin is represented as the foremost leader of international communism, the omnipotent oracle from whom all wisdom flows. The Communist Party is today a Trojan horse of disloyalty, coiled like a serpent in the very heart of America.

It may mouth sweet words of "peace," "democracy," "equality," and flourish gay slogans of "international solidarity" and "brotherhood of men," but its body and feet are from the Russian bear. Wherever the Trojan horse of Communist fifth columns has walked, the indelible footprints of Russian imperialism remain behind.

The interview proceeded with the following questions and answers, which I hope every Member of Congress, and every other law-abiding American, will take the time to read:

Question. How do the Communist cells operate? Are these the training units out of which larger numbers of Communists are recruited?

Answer. The basic unit of the Communist Party is the club. These clubs may be shop or industrial clubs, that is, Communist units within a special manufacturing or industrial plant, or neighborhood clubs, drawing members from residential areas. These clubs are coordinated through an elaborate apparatus, from ward, city, county, state, and district organizations to national headquarters in New York City. Because of security reasons, they have now been divided into small groups consisting of three to five members. In these clubs the Communist Party conducts its basic and fundamental activities: instruction in Marxism-Leninism, organization of pressure campaigns, the passing out of leaflets and handbills, the circulation of petitions. Here Communist literature is sold, dues collected, instructions received from higher officials disseminated. The club is the basic operating unit of the Communist Party. Through the club, of course, new members are recruited and indoctrinated.

Question. Do your studies of the Communist techniques over the years show that the Communists are trained to lie about their status?

Answer. The basic premise of communism is deceit and hypocrisy. The Communist philosophy teaches that every available means must be utilized to achieve the final end—world revolution. For this reason the Communist will lie, cheat, and resort to any tactics which will gain his end. He will advocate today exactly what he denounced yesterday. And with a straight face. Has he lied? No; he will say, he's only carrying out party policy. The concept of morality and fair play, as practiced in our democracy, is alien and repugnant to him. Moreover, the Communists employ a purposive double-talk, roundabout style, known as Aesopian language, in their literature and speeches, designed to deceive and evade, to clothe their true thoughts. This technique, utilized by Lenin, is the very epitome of deceit.

Question. What does membership in the Communist Party really mean? Does it mean a formal joining or does it mean informal adherence?

Answer. When an individual joins the Communist Party he agrees to accept, in full, the principles of Marxism-Leninism. I mentioned previously that to accept these teachings means, in the final analysis, working for world revolution—in the boots of Russian imperialism—and the destruction of American democracy.

There is no halfway point: The individual accepts fully these obligations or he does not become a member. If later he refuses to abide by these rules—as defined by the party hierarchy—he is expelled. This is no informal adherence You are either a full member or an enemy.

NO MORE PARTY CARDS

Question. Do Communist members carry cards any more? Did they previously carry cards?

Answer. As a security measure no Communist Party membership cards were issued in 1949. In previous years, with certain exceptions, they were issued. I might mention, in this connection, that the open maintenance of membership records has been discontinued. Today the Communist Party is becoming more and more deceitful and underhanded in its operations Question. Are there any sections of the country which are relatively free from Communists?

Answer. Communists may be found in most sections of the United States. Of course, in some areas, the Communists are more thickly located than in others. But, as a general rule, the Communists are less strong in agricultural areas. And there is a reason for this.

Question. In what centers do Communists tend to congregate.

Answer. The Communists are strongest today in the industrial areas of the United States—in States such as New York, California, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan. Of course, these States being heavily populated, you would expect more members there than in the less populated States. But that is not the entire reason. The Communists, as a basic principle of infiltration, are interested in possessing strength in heavy industry, that is, coal, steel, rubber, automobile, etc. It is here that, in event of an emergency, they can do their greatest harm to the country's economy.

Moreover, in these industries one Communist Party member located in a strategic job can wreak damage completely out of proportion to his own strength. Through this heavy-industry concentration policy the Communists are able to exercise a power far in excess of their numbers. In fact, one of the highest-ranking leaders of communism in the United States has openly admitted:

"The Communist Party bases its work directly upon the mills, mines, and factories. Its principle is to make every shop a fortress for communism. * * * It concentrates its work upon the heavy industries and those of a war character."

That is one of the potential sabotage dangers facing America today.

WHY CONVICTIONS ARE DIFFICULT

Question. Are there many suspected Communists or suspected agents of foreign governments who could not be successfully prosecuted even though you have considerable suspicion about them?

Answer. The matter of prosecution, of course, is the exclusive responsibility of the Department of Justice. However, to successfully sustain a prosecution, legal evidence is necessary. Our laws regarding espionage are technical, requiring legal evidence, which is often most difficult to obtain because spies do not carry on their activities in the presence of witneses but under a cover of stealth, because party members trained in deceit either decline to furnish information or misrepresent the facts in an attempt to conceal the acts of their associates.

Question. Is this because you need corroborative evidence and this is not always possible to attain, or is it because the laws at present are not clear concerning the unlawfulness of Communist activitities?

Answer. We have had frequent cases in the past where we have developed the full facts, but, due to the passage of time, the fleeing of witnesses from the United States, and other matters beyond our control, the development of corroborative evidence is physically impossible. As to the adequacy of existing laws, this is a matter not within the province of the FBI.

Question. Have you suggested from time to time to Congress any principles that might be embodied in legislation concerning Communists?

Answer. The FBI is not a policy-making organization and the advocacy of specific legislation is not within the scope of its authority. The FBI, however, has furnished, from time to time, its observations to the Attorney General on ways to strengthen its activities.

Question. Does the FBI have adequate means for the detection of Communists who are foreign agents or saboteurs?

Answer. The Communists, foreign agents, and saboteurs operate behind a smoke screen of stealth and deception. There must be a starting point in every investigation. The FBI has the means of detection if it receives sufficient information on which to predicate an investigation.

EVERY ONE A POTENTIAL SPY

Question. Is the FBI interested in knowing of the detection of any Communists, or is it interested only in those who are connected with espionage rings or possible sabotage?

Answer. The FBI is primarily interested in those members of the Communist Party who might be engaged in espionage, sabotage, or who constitute a potential threat to the internal security of the United States. Increasingly, however, with the development of the outward manifestations of a revolutionary movement in the Communist Party, the FBI is interested in knowing the identity of all Communists in the United States, as any Communist, properly qualified, might be recruited into espionage. He may today be circulating peace petitions or selling Communist literature. Tomorrow he may be sabotaging American industry or serving as an espionage courier. We are interested in identifying, therefore, every member of this international conspiracy in our midst, because every Communist is a potential saboteur and espionage agent.

Question. Would you, for instance, have an actual list of 55,000 Communists, or is this an estimate?

Answer. When the figure of 55,000 Communists in the United States was made public, there was considerable speculation in party circles as to the accuracy of the figures. Later, when detailed tabulations by States were made public, the Communists in various districts manifested great concern as to where we obtained our figures.

Question. Are there many Communists who have confessed and turned in valuable evidence to the FBI?

Answer. An individual who has seen the error of his ways and has been converted from the ensnaring tentacles of communism can be as reliable as any other type of witness. Many former members of the Communist Party have been of invaluable assistance in our investigations.

Question. What motivates these Communists to confess their relationships with espionage, etc.?

Answer. What motivates one person might be a minor factor for another individual. Many influences affect these individuals, causing them to seek the truth. However, from an over-all point of view, one factor emerges crystal clear: These individuals have realized that communism was a falsehood and a perversion of the truth.

MANY DISILLUSIONED

Question. Do you believe there are many people who formerly were Communists and who now have changed their views?

Answer. Many individuals associated with the Communist movement—even some of those in high places—have become disillusioned with this godless conspiracy and have renounced their allegiance. They have tasted of communism and found the taste bitter and repugnant. Many of these men and women hoped, through joining the Communist Party, to work for a bright new world, for peace and improved democracy. But these hopes became shattered, for some, quickly; for others more slowly.

Once inside the Communist world they could see with their own eyes the hypocrisy, deceit, and terror which is the essence of Marxism-Leninism. They recognized communism for what it is—brutal tyranny coated with false hopes and promises. For them there was only one course: to renounce communism.

The fact, however, that they have seen the errors of their ways and renounced communism does not entirely excuse their wrongs. The alibi that every person was radical in his youth or was a Communist sympathizer in the 1930's is a malicious falsehood. The great masses of Americans never fell for the schemes of the Communist swindlers.

Question. Do you generally find that confessed Communists or confessed espionage agents are reliable in their testimony—that is, where you have been able to verify or check upon their statements with one or more witnesses?

Answer. The testimony of any person must be judged on the basis of that individual's knowledge of the truth, his ability to know of what he speaks, and, from a practical standpoint in any type of case, the value of his testimony must be interpreted by corroboration. In each case we endeavor to verify information furnished us. In some instances the very nature of the information makes verification impossible, such as a meeting of two people. But, if one of the individuals traveled extensively, or stayed in the locale, these facts, subject to verification, can lend credence to his story. Weight must be given to the witness whose recital of facts can be verified by proof.

Question. Does the FBI determine who shall or shall not be prosecuted, or is the function of the FBI solely to collect the information and transmit it to the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice?

Answer. The FBI is the investigative arm of the United States Department of Justice, charged with the duty of investigating violations of the laws of the United States, collecting evidence in cases in which the United States is or may be a party in interest, and performing other duties imposed by law. The FBI's function is solely and exclusively that of investigation, to obtain the complete and accurate facts. The FBI does not, at any time, evaluate, make recommendations or draw conclusions from the results of its investigations. That is the responsibility of the Criminal Division and the United States attorneys.

Question. Do you believe that pitiless publicity will be helpful in running down Communists?

Answer. Absolutely. The Communists, by their very nature, are conspiratorial. They operate under a cloak of deceit. Communism can be defeated by an alert and aroused public opinion, conscious of the evils of Marxist-Leninist chicanery. The newspapers and magazines, the radio and television, by informing the Nation of the true character of communism, are rendering invaluable services.

I would never fear communism in America if all Communists were out in the open, peddling their wares in the market place of free speech and thought. But they are not. We cannot meet them on an even basis. They are working behind the masquerade of hypocrisy. For this reason America must be vigilant to recognize communism for what it actually is—a malicious evil which would destroy this Nation.

Question. Do you believe that public exposures through congressional committees, when properly safeguarded to avoid implication of innocent parties, could be helpful in drawing public attention to instances and episodes involving espionage and other Communist activity?

Answer. With the laws of libel and slander militantly used by subversives, exposures, under oath, with safeguards to protect the innocent, are necessary. A private citizen or even a great metropolitan daily paper does not have the facilities to make the investigations. Hence, many exposures can be made only through an official investigating committee possessing the power of subpena with persuasive facilities such as laws covering perjury and the power to cite for contempt.

Question. Are there any suggestions you can make as to how the public can detect Communists and report them to the FBI?

Answer. A Communist is not always easy to identify. He is trained in deceit and uses cleverly camouflaged movements to conceal his real purposes. But he may frequently be detected by certain common characteristics. He will always espouse the cause of Soviet Russia over that of the United States. His viewpoint and position will shift with each change in the Communist Party line. He will utilize a language of double talk—referring to the Soviet-dominated countries as democracies and complain that the United States is imperialistic. He will attempt to infiltrate and gain control of organizations and subvert them to the use of the party.

Mr. Speaker, if I had my way, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, of which Edgar Hoover is the head, would be made an independent agency of this Government, and given the power to secure information in every quarter of the world and report directly to the Congress of the United States.

That would do more to turn back this tide of communistic fanaticism, expose the enemies within our gates, and protect our Nation now and in the years to come, than anything else that could be done at this time.

God save America.

Social Security Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 10, 1950

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, the pending social security bill has been held up for several weeks by an amendment offered in the other body on unemployment insurance. Many Members of the House do not know that the Knowland amendment to break down the unemployment insurance system which was adopted on the floor of the other body was opposed by the Senate Financc Committee. This amendment has nothing to do with old-age pensions at all. The Knowland amendment deals with unemployment insurance administered by the Secretary of Labor. It is a bad amendment.

But even more important than the fact that it is a bad amendment is that it is holding up final passage of the social security bill. Millions of American people are anxiously waiting for the passage of the social security bill so that they can get the increased benefits which Congress has voted. But the adoption of this irrelevant amendment by the other body has jeopardized the possibility of millions of aged persons, widows, and dependent children getting their increased benefits promptly.

The Knowland amendment jeopardizes the welfare of the aged. It jeopardizes the welfare of widows and dependent children. I am opposed to it.

Weevils in the Storehouse

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. WILLIAMS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the July issue of the Farm Journal, entitled "Weevils in the Storehouse."

This editorial clearly points out how the reckless spending policy of the present administration for the past several years has been undermining the value of the American dollar.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WEEVILS IN THE STOREHOUSE

Farmers have long respected the United States dollar. As a storehouse of value, as well as a medium of exchange, the dollar was for generations as good as a hog or a steer. It was better; the animal might get sick or die, or decline in price. The dollar was durable. If paper, one could easily get a gold dollar for it.

One could put away a few spare dollars in full confidence that they would perform as expected when needed again. The work which earned a dollar could be stored for future use. At any time it could be exchanged for equivalent work done by someone else.

The American dollar is still the strongest currency in the world. The regard which other nations entertain for the dollar helps to obscure its shameful failure to keep serving as a storehouse of value.

Your $10 bill says that "The United States of America will pay to the bearer on demand ten dollars." Take your bill to a bank or to the Treasury and demand $10. The most you will get will be another piece of paper with the same printed promise.

The $10 bill looks about the same, and you can still trade it for another $10 bill. Not since 1934, however, has paper been exchangeable for gold.

Suppose that in 1939 you laid a $10 bill aside. You stored what was then $10 worth of your work. You plan now to use the $10 in its other function, as a medium of exchange. Can you exchange it now for as much work as you put into it? You know the answer.

"Prices have risen," people say. Your 1939 $10 bill will now buy about what you could have bought in 1939 for $5.94. "Prices have risen" is only another way to say that "$10 bills have gone down."

Weevils have been in the storehouse. They have chewed away at every insurance policy and savings account. They endanger today's savings. The rate of decline has been such that compound interest cannot keep up with inflation.

The failure of the dollar to store full value is an extremely serious matter. The weevils are the pressures which lead Government to keep on spending more than it takes in. The temptation to spend public money bears heavily upon every ordinary politician. The pressures upon him to support spending are specific. They represent votes he can identify. The sentiment for not spending is general. The pleasures of inflation tend to overwhelm common sense.

As long as Government spends more than it takes in, the ability of the dollar to store value will sift out. The fact is unpleasant. Only support by informed and courageous people will create statesmen courageous enough to reverse this trend.

We Cannot Do All the Fighting

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial entitled "We Can't Do All the Fighting," published in the Kansas City Star under the date of Sunday, July 30, 1950. This editorial reflects the thinking on the part of millions of Americans and points out some realistic approaches that all of us should have the courage to face. The editorial is so challenging and worth while that I feel it should be brought to the attention of the Senate and the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE CAN'T DO ALL THE FIGHTING

The Russians are showing themselves to be the ruthless masters of a new military-political technique. They first enslave a helpless population such as the North Koreans. Then, under the guns of Soviet armed might, a native army is formed, trained, equipped and subsequently sent to fight—for Russia. But, while the fighting is on, the Soviet Union pretends to have nothing to do with it and goes ahead proclaiming itself the great protector of world peace.

Under this procedure the Kremlin may hope to wear down the United States by using the soldier of other nations against us, provided we continue to insist on fighting them with our own men, instead of enlisting the support of others as the Russians have done.

What is the administration going to do about it? Congress has vetoed any plan for a foreign legion. But at least a start has been made by a recent law under which a few Germans, Japanese, Poles, Czechs and others will be recruited for service with the American Army. They will be trained with American weapons, they will receive the same pay as Americans and after 5 years of service will be entitled to American citizenship.

It is the intention to scatter these men through the American forces and in the event of another war to use them in their homelands to make contact with the underground forces. The proposal originally was for 25,000 enlistments, then the number was whittled down to 2,500 by Congress before the Korean crisis.

But certainly this force is not enough. Under the impact of the Korean experience military men believe the number of these foreign forces will be increased. Why should only American men be sent to fight and perhaps die in defense of world trouble spots when men of other nationalities are available?

This Government surely is not so stupid as to fail to find some method of directly countering Russia's use of non-Soviet peoples in Asia and Europe to conduct wars for the advancement of communism.

Our great difficulty in trying to meet the Korean situation with the military strength now available to the United States and less-powerful United Nations allies ought to convince us that we should find another way. But if this so-far-localized conflict has not already made the need clear, we should keep in mind other developments which could provide the makings of the global war we have been trying so hard to prevent.

In east Germany the Russian occupation officials are organizing an army along with an air force and a navy of sorts. It reliably is reported to number at least 75,000 men, including many combat veterans of the old wehrmacht. For purposes of deceit, this organization is called the "people's police" by the Communist government of east Germany. Yet it is equipped with tanks, heavy artillery, machine guns, mortars, and all the weapons used by a modern army but not needed to maintain law and order.

The intended mission of this new army is as clear as the present aggression in Korea. It one day will be ordered by the Soviet commanders in east Germany to march against west Germany. By that time it will doubtless be much larger than it now is. Its declared objective will be "reunification" of Germany. When this force crosses the border between east and west Germany, it will expect to find little opposition.

Certainly there would be little if this army only had to confront the small allied forces stationed in Germany. Nor would west Germany as it is now organized be able to defend itself. For, in accordance with the four-power agreement to demilitarize Germany, we have permitted the establishment of only a 50,000-man police force. Its members are not equipped with military weapons.

The question therefore is whether we are going to stand by and let the west Germans be overrun by the east Germans just as the North Koreans are doing to the South Koreans. We know that the agreement to deprive all Germany of arms has been voided by Russia.

Why, then, should we continue to honor it? Why not make certain that west Germany can be defended? If we were to do that, Russia would be must less likely to order an east German attack against an area capable of resisting effectively.

There is a closely related question of why we do not make use of trained Japanese manpower to help turn back the Korean Communists. The answer is that Japan's new constitution, whose drafting was guided by our occupation officials, forbids military activities by the Japanese. But it was drawn up under conditions much different from those we have been able to recognize since the assault on Korea. We now should consider whether the neutral state we decreed for Japan ought not to be changed so that the Japanese at our direction could have a part in defending their section of the Far East against Communist enslavement.

Such moves would be drastic. They would be a complete departure from our present postwar policy toward Germany and Japan. But if we are to avoid further use of the technique developed by Russia for Korea, we shall be compelled to find the way to check or defeat its employment.

America does not have the manpower to police the whole world against future Soviet aggressions. We are going to require a lot of assistance. The logical source of it is the native populations of countries which otherwise would be the helpless victims of attacks plotted and directed—if not actually carried out—by the Russian rulers of the world Communist movement.

Columbia University Bars Circulation of Stockholm Peace Petition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I have received from Dean Kenneth D. Johnson a copy of the memorandum from the provost of Columbia University denying the use of the university facilities for the circulation of the so-called Stockholm peace petition and of the notice from Dean Johnson's office with reference to the use of the grounds and buildings of the New York School of Social Work. This type of prompt, constructive action on the part of the officials of a great American university is highly commendable. It should be a further inspiration to us in taking equally prompt and vigorous action expressing the opinion of Congress in this matter.

The memorandum and notice are as follows:

[Columbia University in the City of New York, N. Y. Provost of the university]

MEMORANDUM FROM THE PROVOST'S OFFICE

The University has been requested to recognize a new student organization entitled Student Peace Committee. The primary, and perhaps the sole, purpose of this organization, apparently, is to secure signatures in the University community to the so-called "World Peace Appeal" or Stockholm "Resolution."

Secretary of State Acheson, in his press conference on July 12, branded this resolution as "a propaganda trick in the spurious 'peace offensive' of the Soviet Union." The Secretary further pointed out that proposed special condemnation of the use of atomic weapons was "an utterly cynical begging of the question. The real crime against humanity is aggression, and in particular, the deliberate resort to armed aggression in defiance of the United Nations. The war criminals are the people who sanction such action."

In view of this official statement of the attitude of the United States Government toward this peace petition, it seems quite clear that the University should refuse to allow its facilities or its sponsorship to be used for such propaganda purposes. The request, therefore, must be denied.

GRAYSON KIRK.

NOTICE

Attention is called to the attached copy of Memorandum from the Provost's Office referring to "Student Peace Committee."

Pursuant to University policy expressed in this memorandum there is to be no circulation of the so-called "World Peace Appeal" or "Stockholm Resolution" on or within the grounds and buildings of the New York School of Social Work.

The New Dilemma of Europe and the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM BENTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an important dispatch from Rome by Anne O'Hare McCormick appearing in the New York Times on July 19, 1950, entitled "The New Dilemma of Europe and the United States". When I spoke to the American Chamber of Commerce in Rome, I urged the imperative need of agrarian reform. This column emphasizes the importance of building up our defenses in the west as well as in the east. I particularly call attention to the statement that "the spread of the Communist peace campaign to cover war moves is almost as great a danger to Europe as physical aggression." Unhappily, we in the United States have not been sufficiently conscious of this danger—and are doing pitifully little about it.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NEW DILEMMA OF EUROPE AND THE UNITED STATES

(By Anne O'Hare McCormick)

ROME, July 18.—The great dilemmas of Italy are overshadowed for the time by thoughts of another war. Even before news from Korea, the bright varnish of recovery and reconstruction distracted the stranger's eye from the darker aspects of the picture. It is easy for Italians to take cheerful views of the future and easy for the visitor in this genial atmosphere to share their confidence that, if peace holds, another 5 years will see the country out of the worst of its troubles.

For the past 5 years the Italian economy and the plans and prospects of the people have been geared to peace. The nation has manifested such recuperative power that it surprised itself as well as outsiders and led many to believe that there were no problems that time and tranquillity will not solve. The problems are still t[illegible] however, and they rise to the surface [illegible]in with the threat to peace and the fear that there may not be a time to build anew before there is another smash.

Once more the matter of survival begins to preoccupy the mind of western Europe. How can we defend ourselves against sudden attack? How much help can we expect from the United States? These are the questions Europeans are asking themselves—and us.

A LONG WAY BACK

It seems a long way back since the foreign ministers of the Atlantic Pact countries met in London and decided to take immediate steps to pool their military resources into one army. The note of impatient urgency Secretary Acheson introduced into that conference has been justified by events, but in 2 months practically nothing has been done to translate the resolution of the 12 ministers into action. The deputies who were to be in continuous session have not yet held a meeting.

The effects of this uncertainty are so disturbing that American diplomats over here are urging the President to reiterate in an unequivocal statement that our engagement in the Pacific, instead of lessening our military aid to Europe, impels us to increase it. They believe that the Atlantic Pact deputies should meet at once to carry out the commitments made in London. To dispel the uncertainties of our friends in the West, as well as to deter Russia from striking here while we are occupied elsewhere, nothing is needed so much as decisive proof that Europe comes first in our calculations.

For these are the nations that can be most easily helped to help themselves. They are pretty weak and defenseless at this juncture, because like ourselves they believed that war would be followed by peace and that the best way to perpetuate peace was not by maintaining armies but by restoring order, prosperity, and freedom. As a country which has been disarmed militarily, reformed politically, and built up economically and morally, Italy is a good example of the success of a postwar policy which put all the emphasis on recovery.

FROM RECOVERY TO DEFENSE

But present developments compel the Italians, as they compel the French and the British, to turn their thoughts from recovery to defense. Two events occurring this week in Italy illustrate the point. One is the adoption of that part of a far-reaching agrarian reform bill that applies to the most neglected areas. The program of expropriating uncultivated land and distributing it among the poor peasants is already being carried out in some arid and undeveloped districts in the south. The present law will extend the program to other regions on terms that will distinguish between the productive and unproductive landlords and spread ownership among the landless. Even the general law, if put into effect, is not adequate to solve the agricultural problem. Italy itself is not adequate. The dream plan to settle a million persons in Sardinia depends for its realization on the results of a survey of the island's resources to be made by the Rockefeller Foundation. The question is: Will the fulfillment of this thrilling project be postponed; will the slow-paced land reform be still further slowed down because the cost of this essential work of reconstruction will have to be diverted to building up the army?

The second event is the inauguration of "a crusade of truth" to counteract the Communists' "crusade of peace" which is using the Korean war for all it is worth to organize popular opposition against the United States, the United Nations and the Atlantic Pact. When Premier de Gaspari told this correspondent the other day that instead of suppressing Communist activity he meant to start a movement in every commune to unite all opposing parties, he was not speaking in general terms. The "positive campaign" has already begun. Whether or not it is inspired by the American decision to wage a grand scale propaganda war, there is no question that the spread of the Communist peace campaign to cover war moves is almost as great a danger to Europe as physical aggression.

Korea has shocked western Europe into the realization that it not only has to fight on two fronts but that part of its economic and social defense program has to be sacrificed to armament. But the extent to which it will arm itself depends on the assurances it receives of American support. If the United States hopes to build up an effective mutual defense system the best way to go about it is to ship over here some highly visible tokens of military power.

Unjustified Increases in Price Levels

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter written by Mr. Albert J. Loveland, former Under Secretary of Agriculture, to Mr. Charles F. Brannan, Secretary of Agriculture, and another letter, also written by Mr. Loveland to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS].

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 3, 1950.

Hon. CHARLES F. BRANNAN,
Secretary of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BRANNAN: In view of the international emergency and the inevitable rising costs, I recommend and urge that the Department of Agriculture initiate as soon as possible a program to increase hog production.

A program of this kind is needed now both to increase the meat supply for whatever might be ahead, and to help stabilize the price of meat to consumers.

Such a program must necessarily be backed up by a reasonable price guaranty that will assure a fair return to farmers. It should go into effect, in my opinion, this fall, and be extended through the marketing period for the 1951 spring pig crop, for which farmers will be making breeding plans soon.

I would suggest a price-support level assuring the farmer a corn-hog price ratio of not less than 12 to 13 to 1. This is well below the market price for hogs now and the probable price for hogs next winter and spring. It would be beneficial to consumers, and would enable farmers to plan with confidence.

Our experience has proved that food is one of our greatest assets, whether in a campaign for peace, or one against aggression. We know also that in a period of inflation one of our best safeguards against excessively high and burdensome food prices, especially for those with fixed incomes, is to produce more food.

We have good reserves of most commodities now, except meat. While our present production of meat is high, our population is growing and there is demand for an even higher production.

A program to increase hog production would begin to have beneficial results by early winter. It should also be helpful in stabilizing meat prices during the period immediately ahead.

Our fortunate policy of building and maintaining large reserves of corn and other feed grains puts us in a favorable position to call for an increase in hog production now.

We will have between 900,000,000 and 1,000,000,000 bushels of corn in the carry-over reserve next fall. We can profitably use a part of this now to increase the meat supply and to help stabilize food costs. But the corn taken out of the reserve should be replaced as rapidly as possible, so we can keep it at the present high level.

Our corn crop in Iowa is from 2 to 3 weeks late. We cannot expect as large a crop to be harvested as had been anticipated a month ago.

Therefore, I recommend that there be no acreage allotments on corn for the year 1951, and that full production be encouraged within the limits of good soil conservation.

I further recommend that every effort be made to keep the full 90 percent of parity loan rate on corn for the year 1951.

I am aware that this would require revision of the present farm law to prevent the sliding scale loan rate (85 percent of parity for the 1951 crop) from automatically going into effect. I am writing to the chairmen of the Senate and House Agriculture Committees asking that they consider this suggestion.

In formulating any program to increase hog production, the present high and still rising level of farm costs must be kept in mind. It would not be right to ask the farmer to add to his already high costs without some positive guaranties that he will not be left holding the bag, in the event markets might be depressed temporarily as a result of the increase in hog production.

It is important that the mistake made during the last war not be repeated. I refer to the December-January period of 1943–44, the year farmers were asked to make a big increase in hog production to help win the war. Hog growers went all-out to increase production. They expected to receive a minimum floor price of $13.75 a hundred, Chicago basis, for good and choice market hogs.

However, the weight classification for hogs eligible to receive the guaranty was not broad enough. Markets became glutted. Farmers had to hold back. Market weights became heavier, and good heavy hogs were discounted as much as $1.15 below the minimum price farmers had expected.

We should not, in my opinion, ask farmers to expand their hog-production facilities without a more positive method of guaranteeing that they will not be caught short.

Therefore, I am recommending to the chairman of the Senate and House Agriculture Committees that production payments be authorized for hogs, and be used if necessary.

Should world events make it advisable, a program for increased production along similar lines could be adopted for other livestock, dairy, and poultry products.

In my opinion, a plan of this kind not only would help consumers, but at the same time would give farmers a more positive form of price protection.

We all hope the Korean War can be ended soon. But we cannot be sure, and we dare not gamble on that possibility.

Should the international situation improve in a few months, everyone would benefit from an increase in meat production. Should the war be prolonged, a very large increase in pork will be essential.

Respectfully yours,

ALBERT J. LOVELAND.

AUGUST 3, 1950.

HON. ELMER THOMAS,
Chairman, Senate Committee on Agriculture, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR THOMAS: I am writing today to the Secretary of Agriculture making a number of recommendations as to measures which, in my opinion, should be given careful consideration at this time concerning agricultural programs related to the present war emergency. A copy of this letter is enclosed.

I have recommended to the Secretary: (1) That the Department of Agriculture initiate as soon as possible a program to increase hog production, not only to increase the meat supply but to help stabilize meat prices.

(2) That this program be supported by a price guaranty assuring farmers a corn-hog price ratio of not less than 12 to 13 to 1—roughly $18 to $19 a hundredweight.

(3) That the Department of Agriculture have no acreage allotments on corn for the 1951 crop, first, because our present large reserve will have to be used in part to get more hog production, and second because it is important in my opinion to replace what we use out of the reserve as rapidly as possible.

I am sure you will agree that in the present emergency, with both farm and city family costs rising, an increase in meat production is both desirable and necessary.

In addition, I respectfully submit for your serious consideration two proposals involving revisions in present legislation which I feel would be helpful in carrying out a program to expand meat production.

The first concerns corn. We will have an abundant carry-over of corn this fall. However, the corn crop in Iowa, the largest producing State, is late. Production will fall short of what had been expected a month ago.

In view of this prospective shorter crop, plus the fact that corn will be needed from our present reserve to increase pork production, I would like to recommend that the present 90 percent of parity loan on corn be continued.

As you know, this would require a revision of the present farm law in order to keep the sliding scale rate, or 85 percent of parity, from automatically going into effect in 1951.

In troubled times like these, next year seems a poor time to initiate a lower loan rate for a crop that is so basic, not only to food production, but to essential war industries. Furthermore, in the long run the Government has never lost money on basic commodities which are easily stored.

The second legislative proposal involves a change in the method of guaranteeing farmers a fair return for increasing hog production. The only method now available is Government purchase of pork in the open market.

During the last war this method was used, along with a direct subsidy to packers. You may recall that in the winter of 1943–44 this system broke down under pressure of a big increase in hogs. It was unsatisfactory to consumers, and producers suffered unnecessary losses.

Therefore, I wish to recommend that your committee seriously consider authorizing production payments for hogs as a more positive and satisfactory method of guaranteeing that the farmer who is asked to increase his costs by expanding production will not be caught short, should the increase in output depress prices temporarily.

It is my sincere belief that the production payment method of guaranteeing prices for increased production would enable farmers to plan ahead with more confidence, and would in the long run benefit consumers.

I am confident that your serious consideration of these proposals would be applauded by farmers not only in Iowa but all parts of the country.

Respectfully yours,

ALBERT J. LOVELAND.

Stop Government Waste

REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised at the alarm of the gentleman from Minnesota and the splendid remarks he made a moment ago. I think a lot of us in the House are disappointed in the fact that the big one-package appropriation bill sent to the other body, having been reduced in the House by about $1,500,000,000, is now coming back into conference with a reduction of only about $550,000,000.

Another point I would like to raise is this, we should not use the war as a license for unbridled spending. I think, because of the war, we ought to cut the cost of Government on the home front to a greater degree than we cut it when the bill went over to the other body. We can use that money now to buy implements of war with which our soldiers can defend themselves.

Mr. Speaker, when the appropriation bill was passed in the House some 2 months ago and went to the other legislative body, the big budget had been reduced by over a billion dollars. The other body has now considered the legislation and as it goes to the conference committee of the House and Senate it provides for a reduction of only about $550,000,000.

The Republican leadership in that body, joining with Senator BYRD and others, for several days made a strenuous effort for greater reductions, but were not able to overcome the efforts of the administration's leadership. It is regrettable in these serious times that greater reductions could not be made in that body.

All of us realize that as a result of the war with Korea, we will have to appropriate more billions of dollars. The war, however, should not be used to unloose unbridled spending on the home front. It should, and does call for the reduction of every unnecessary expense on the home front. This Congress should cut out every unnecessary expense on the home front, and it should reduce the amount of funds we are giving away as economic aid to other nations.

In 1948 the Republican Congress reduced the cost of Government on the home front to a total of $6,400,000,000 for the departments covered in this bill. For comparable items of domestic spending for these bureaus this year, the President wants to spend $11,600,000,000—an increase over 1948 of $5,200,000,000.

There is no sense in spending this extra $5,200,000,000 in these critical times. Because of the war, domestic spending should be cut back to a total not above what we spent in 1948. If this Congress now controlled by a heavy Democratic majority in both the House and the Senate would have joined with we Republicans, there could have been saved this extra tax load of $5,200,000,000.

In addition, this Congress has voted about $4 500,000,000 for Marshall-plan aid to some 12 or 15 foreign nations. Our economic aid to foreign nations was for the purpose of helping to raise their living standards to the level those countries enjoyed prior to World War II. All statistics and evidence prove that those nations on the domestic fronts have recovered to a point of about 25 percent above the living conditions they enjoyed before that war, with the exception of Germany, and possibly Austria.

It is my opinion we should reduce this foreign-aid spending in this budget by at least $1,800,000,000.

The Congress on home-front spending, should have cut it back from $11,600,000,000 to $6,400,000,000. This would save $5,200,000,000, to which a saving in Marshall-plan funds of $1,800,000,000 would effect a reduction of $7,000,000,000. Another billion or more could be saved by approving more of the Hoover recommendations.

The President is asking for new taxes in the amount of $10,000,000,000. Had these savings been made, we could turn this money into the war effort and the President would only have to ask for $2,000,000,000, instead of $10,000,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, it does not seem fair to me to increase the taxes on the American people, and to continue to lavish bountiful financial hand-outs to the civilian economy of the other nations. In fact, we are now up against a battle for the survival of this Nation.

If we refuse to economize on the home front as to Government expense and continue to build up a greater horde of money-burning political bureaucrats here in Washington, we will be playing right into the hands of Stalin who has predicted that this country would spend itself into financial bankruptcy, making it an easy prey through cooperating w[illegible] the Communists here to take over this country.

Unbearable debt and taxation can destroy our solvency, and if we do not reduce nondefense home-front spending wherever we can, we will hasten such a national disaster.

Our debt today is $260,000,000,000. That is a danger signal that should be heeded—even by this administration.

The Propaganda Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM BENTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial called The Propaganda Front, from the August 1 issue of the Reporter, published in New York. It is written by Mr. Max Ascoli, the editor, an Italian scholar who went into exile because he could not endure the Mussolini regime. I have admired Mr. Ascoli for years, though our acquaintance is light, and most recently for his efforts to pioneer with his magazine, the Reporter, a magazine which I commend to the Congress. In this editorial, Mr. Ascoli puts his finger on an important point concerning the debate now going on about our propaganda. Some people argue that we cannot preach freedom to people who are living in misery. Mr. Ascoli says: "We must see to it that the largest possible number of people find out by themselves that freedom is the imponderable, all-persuasive element which leavens their lives. It has been so in America; the technical skill and productivity of the American people have developed at about the same pace as their free institutions. There is no reason why this should not be so elsewhere. Now the time has come when other people must have a chance to go through the American experience, with whatever changes and adaptations local circumstances may demand."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PROPAGANDA FRONT

We are engaged in a limited war that is kept from turning into a total war by the respect that the United States and Russia have for each other's power. This is a sample war, between ourselves and the Russians, in which our country fights as leader of the United Nations, while Russia sends in weapons but not men. Our military preparedness is being tested and found wanting. Our prestige in the civilized world has proven greater than we ourselves, and certainly the Russians, had ever thought. Anything that happens in a limited war is a portent that strongly influences the thinking and the decisions of men. A limited war is the propaganda equivalent to total war, and may prove to be a substitute for it.

This is indeed the time for propaganda if the bloody effort of our soldiers in Korea is not to prove irrelevant and meaningless. Our propaganda cannot be just a containment of Communist lies. It must carry the same poised determination and quiet courage that have charcterized the political decisions of our leaders. It must spell out what our actions imply: that with their next aggression, no matter how disguised, the Russians will bring total war upon themselves. At the same time, as the leader, but by no means the master, of the United Nations, we must state the basic conditions that we deem essential to the reestablishment of peace.

OPERATION TRUTH

The need for an intensified propaganda effort has been quickly felt by some of our outstanding national leaders. Men like Secretary Acheson, General Eisenhower, and Bernard Baruch testified at the congressional hearings on Senator BENTON'S resolution calling for increased funds for the Voice of America. General Eisenhower spoke of "a new kind of general staff"—presumably composed of high-ranking propaganda experts and technicians of persuasion. Mr. Baruch proposed that a "body of thinkers," similar and possibly related to the National Security Council, be set up to direct American propaganda abroad. Every speaker at the hearing was most eloquent on one point: that truth must be the keynote of our propaganda.

This insistence on truth is both heart warming and disconcerting. Whatever we say to our own or to foreign people must be guided by respect for truth, but truth alone cannot determine the aim of what we say. What we say about the future organization of the world must be decided by our intelligence and our will—the intelligence to find out the causes of the world's misery and the will to attack those causes at their roots. After we know what we want, we must tell it to the people of the world with absolute candor, but, first of all, we must have objectives that people everywhere will understand and share. Truth is an invaluable weapon in our propaganda armory, but it is a tactical rather than a strategic weapon.

Moreover, there is something rather disturbing in the insistence that with a hundred million dollars' worth of radio programs we can effectively counteract Communist propaganda. The Moscow radio may be powerful and there may even be some people in our country who listen to it. But Radio Moscow is hardly the main vehicle, or even one of the most important vehicles, of Communist propaganda. In every non-Communist country the Voice of Russia comes through native residents rather than through radio sets.

THE BERLIN MANIFESTO

A "body of thinkers," to use the expression of Mr. Baruch, met recently in Berlin. After a 5-day debate on freedom and peace, eminent writers from all over the non-Communist world finally launched a manifesto addressed to all people—east and west—but primarily to their peers—the craftsmen of expression. In it they tried to summarize their common beliefs—the beliefs that they must defend not for themselves alone but for all those whose thinking and whose emotions are influenced by their work, for it is the function of writers and thinkers to be the caretakers of other people's spiritual life.

In defining freedom, the manifesto is concerned "first of all," as it says, with the "right of the individual to form and express his own opinion"—a right, the manifesto says, that should be enjoyed by everybody with the exception of those who, like the Communists, do not tolerate views different from their own. This is undoubtedly an important aspect of freedom, of particular relevance to opinion-molding or opinion-addicted people. The largest possible variety of different contradictory opinions seems to be the main aim of those who signed the manifesto. Opinion, incidentally, is defined by Webster as "belief stronger than impression, less strong than positive knowledge"—a sort of tentative knowledge, a half-finished product of the rational mind.

But what about those countless human beings who haven't the leisure to form or even understand opinions? What about all those who are so degraded by age-old misery that all their energy is spent in the effort to keep alive? The opinion makers of Berlin seem to have no answer to the plight of those who cannot afford to be consumers of opinion. When it comes to what the world most urgently needs and what thinkers, in a body or individually, are supposed to provide—the beliefs and plans of action that will defeat communism—the manifesto has this to say: "The defense of cultural freedom imposes upon us the duty of creating a culture which shall constitute a positive answer to the questions posed by the revolution now in process throughout the world." This seems to mean that totalitarianism must somehow be contained, while the cultured people are busy looking for the "positive answer." All this does not have much to do with freedom, the patrimony of all men. Rather, it seems to be designed to protect the craft interests of opinion-mongers.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

No "body of thinkers" will ever succeed in giving men the burning beliefs that this fight to a finish demands unless the thinkers themselves become convinced that freedom is essential not only to their own but to every type of labor. Hundreds of millions of human beings need to be given the evidence that freedom pays, that it is an essential condition for the attainment of the things they care about most: Physical survival and improvement of their lot. Men can be free to have different opinions as to the use of what they have or what is available to them only if they have something at hand or within reach. Too many millions of people in the world today need to acquire the minimum conditions of well-being that come before the making of any choice.

The largest possible number of men must have work that allows them to make the best of their lives and gives them, aside from their sustenance, a margin of privacy and of independence. If this margin is enlarged and made secure, if men have leisure enough to figure out how their lot can be further improved, then they start realizing what freedom is. Men can then do better work, for they can acquire a broader view of the things that affect them. They can stop being just toilers and become citizens. The road to freedom doesn't start until men have some work to do, work that brings them profit, develops their individuality, and gives them some independence. There are huge masses all over the world who have not yet started on this road and who under the pressure of evil men may rush to their own destruction.

A relentless attack on misery all over the non-Communist world, wherever some progress can be made, should be the main strategic aim of our leaders and the theme constantly hammered at by our propaganda. We must see to it that the largest possible number of people find out by themselves that freedom is the imponderable, all-pervasive element which leavens their lives. It has been so in America: The technical skill and productivity of the American people have developed at about the same pace as their free institutions. There is no reason why this should not be so elsewhere. Now the time has come when other people must have a chance to go through the American experience, with whatever changes and adaptations local circumstances may demand.

In these days of limited war, the attention of the world is focused on us, on the decisions our leaders make, on the way our soldiers fight, and on the steps we take for both war and peace.

This is the time for the greatest propaganda effort we have ever made, backed up by the example that we set. This is also the time when our bodies of thinkers should emerge from the tumult of opinions and suggest how free institutions may become workable everywhere in the world; for freedom, far from being the particular business of their craft, is everybody's business, and it is their job to prove it.—MAX ASCOLI.

Long Beach, Calif., Junior Chamber of Commerce Wins First Place Nationally in Field of National Security Committees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 1, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I have just received word that the Junior Chamber of Commerce of my home city of Long Beach, Calif., was awarded first place at the Chicago convention on the important subject of national security committees.

It appears that Nation-wide these junior chambers of commerce have voluntarily reactivated their membership in this important and imperative field of national security. The digest of the activities of the Long Beach committee shows clearly that it has stayed on the job and been vigorously and vigilantly active in the important matter of national defense as it came their way. The variety of subjects from No. B to XI, inclusive, clearly indicates their voluntary and valuable cooperation in this important field.

Mr. Speaker, no doubt you, too, would like to have the privilege and opportunity of seeing the text of the total report by this winning committee. But, as I only have a digest, I am honored and pleased to present it for the information of yourself and of all my colleagues. I also specifically call your attention to paragraphs A and B and III:

DIGEST OF JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE PROJECT IN THE FIELD OF NATIONAL SECURITY—FIRST PLACE WINNER IN THE UNITED STATES

I. GENERAL PLANNING AND PROCEDURE

A. Committee organization: Committee composition, 30 members. The committee is presided over by a chairman elected by the membership. Other elected officers include a vice chairman, a secretary, a public relations chairman, and a special events chairman. The board of directors at the time of the committee's inception authorized two honorary memberships for each armed service: Army, Navy, Air Force, Coast Guard, Marine Corps, and the California National Guard. The holders of these honorary memberships are, in fact, working members of the committee. Their cooperation has proven of vast aid to the committee. Weekly meetings were held to follow the general pattern:

1. To aid in any way possible the formation of a sound plan for national security.

2. To discuss, investigate, and develop new projects along the above line.

3. To have members and invited guests meet to discuss and investigate all projects in which the committee may aid the community and/or Nation in any way to formulate or carry out any plans for the general security of this area and/or Nation as a whole.

4. To increase the membership and efficiency of the committee.

B. Scope of the national security plan: To act as an effective informant. To inform the public and obtain public support of the program or programs that have and are being formulated by the committee and various other groups for the defense planning of this area and/or Nation as a whole. Also to aid the community in any worth-while endeavor. This broad general plan was carried out as follows:

1. Save the Long Beach Naval Shipyard: A resolution was drafted and sent to Members of Congress, the Secretary of Navy, the Secretary of Defense, and the President of the United States. This project was not successful although a great deal of time and effort was spent on it. Perhaps the reason nothing could be done to save the shipyard was due to the fact, in the words of the Honorable Francis P. Matthews, Secretary of the Navy, "because of the unpredictable nature of the subsidence and the lack of meals for determining the future rate of subsistence."

2. Membership on the Armed Service Commission: The National Security Committee is represented on the Armed Services Commission by the committee chairman.

3. National security to be in charge of aircraft observation posts: The committee was asked by the Long Beach Disaster Council to organize and supervise the men necessary for this project. We feel this is one of the most important tasks a committee of the Long Beach Junior Chamber of Commerce has ever been asked to do by the city of Long Beach. In the future one member of the committee will be appointed to head this project for a period of 1 year and that will be his only duty for that year.

4. Membership on the Long Beach Disaster Council: The Long Beach Disaster Council was formed in 1934, immediately after the Long Beach earthquake, to aid in the time of floods, riots, earthquakes, fires, war, and other civil disturbances. The committee, along with the heads of the various departments of the local government, is represented on the council.

5. Opposes closing of the Long Beach Naval Hospital: A resolution was adopted and sent to all interested parties, i. e., Secretaries of the Navy, Defense, the Veterans' Administration, the President, etc., vigorously denouncing the closing of the naval hospital. As yet no final action has been taken by the Government.

6. Distribution of Army Day and Coast Guard Day posters.

7. Members of committee aid services in Reserve program: Radio broadcasts and newspapers were used to inform the public of the Reserve programs.

8. National Security Committee rifle team: Team organized April 1, 1950. Meets once a month for practice and competitive shoots.

9. Veterans' information service set up by committee: This service was set up in cooperation with the Veterans' Administration, manned by members of the committee, on a voluntary public service. The purpose of this project was to help the veteran obtain the information he desired with the least possible red tape and delay.

10. Committee works for release of Chief Smith and Sergeant Bender: The National Security Committee worked in conjunction with other local organizations to publicize the plight of these two men held prisoner by the Chinese Communists; also to bring pressure to bear on the State Department to hasten their release.

11. Military and naval members of the committee in the news.

12. Last year's award winning scrapbook: This committee's 1948-49 scrapbook won the second place award in national competition.

II. PARTICIPATION

No financial support was necessary. Financial gain was not an objective. The full committee, including honorary members, participated in many programs and projects.

III. BENEFIT TO THE COMMUNITY

The Long Beach area is a generally attractive area to an enemy attack for many reasons. For this reason the committee has devoted a great deal of time and effort to the formation of an efficient disaster plan. The committee has been in close contact with the Long Beach Disaster Council and hopes to have a complete attack protection plan to present to the public in the near future. The foregoing digest of projects (I. General Planning and Procedure; B. Scope of the National Security Plan: Items 1 through 11) will give a fairly complete survey of the projects completed by this committee that we consider of benefit to the community.

IV. BENEFIT TO ORGANIZATION AND MEMBERS

The fruits of the committee's labor have been fully appreciated by the community as a whole. Belonging to a committee which is active in a most worth-while way is most gratifying and is in itself a great reward. The organization is proud of the committee's achievements and will realize the full extent of the many contributions made to the Nation's security and well-being by the National Security Committee of the Long Beach Junior Chamber of Commerce.

Respectfully submitted.

LONG BEACH JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE
NATIONAL SECURITY COMMITTEE,
BENNETT H. JACOBS, Chairman.

This digest furnished me is signed by Bennett H. Jacobs, chairman of this important Junior Chamber of Commerce Committee. It is a pleasure for me to know this able, vigorous, and vigilant young man personally—a successful young merchant in his own right—as being typical of each and every other member of this committee. I congratulate him as chairman. I congratulate the entire committee personnel. And I congratulate the Long Beach Junior Chamber of Commerce on this further achievement in this timely field.

The Vanishing American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 9 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech delivered by the Honorable Malcolm McDermott, professor of law at Duke University, before the Virginia State Bar Association at White Sulphur Springs, W. Va. This able address is entitled "The Vanishing American."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE VANISHING AMERICAN

A few years ago there came from the pen of one of your talented fellow citizens a delightful volume entitled "The Vanishing Virginian." It was read with keen enjoyment by all your neighbors, as I can testify, not because we were intrigued with the idea of the approaching extinction of the species "homo Virginiensis," but rather because of the charming manner in which Mrs. Williams gave us an insight into the wholesome family life of Virginia at the turn of the century. One could not lay the book down without uttering the prayer, "God forbid that this manner of living should vanish from the earth," for here was real American life—lived by truly American characters.

Virginia, which has given so much to the formation and molding of our national character, must see to it that in this unhappy era of false doctrines the fundamentals of your State's greatness shall not be lost to the Nation. It may well be that by the preserving and holding up of these, America may yet be led back into paths of sanity and saved from the course that now threatens her undoing. As one who has long admired and been grateful for what your State has done, let me say that I hope you will never cease to take pride in her history. You are entitled to it. By cherishing and preserving that noble record of the past you will keep aflame a beacon light so desperately needed in these times of confusion.

I rejoice, therefore, whenever I see manifested the spirit of Virginia. It was exemplified in a delightful story told me recently about a young Virginia girl who had been invited to her first dance at West Point. Naturally, she was the belle of the ball. Her escort and numerous admirers kept pressing her for expressions of admiration of the beauties and atmosphere of West Point. Finally, she voiced her approval by sweetly stating that "it might even be called the VMI of the North." You just can't beat that for inborn loyalty—the kind woven into the very fabric of the character of your people. I cannot believe that those fine qualities which have marked your citizenship down through the years are really being lost; nor do I think Mrs. Williams meant to imply as much. Mere changes on the surface do not go this deep. As the outsider views Virginia, he is struck with the continuity of its high-minded, intelligent leadership among the States, motivated by a spirit of patriotic service. The very fact that this has persisted from the inception of the Republic makes me secure in the hope that it will abide through the years to come.

Nevertheless, there is something that is vanishing from our national life about which you and I may well be concerned, and deeply so. That is why I have ventured to paraphrase Mrs. Williams' title and elected to address you upon the subject The Vanishing American.

Anyone, however casually familiar with our country's history, cannot fail to note the striking change that has come about in American character within the past two decades. It is not the mere exaggeration of an alarmist or pessimist when one states that those elements of self-reliance, independence, diligence, and thrift that marked American character in earlier days are fast vanishing from the national scene. This is but a statement of plain fact, and one about which I take it little difference of opinion can exist. There are many who glory in this change. There are those of us who mourn it.

Sophisticated leaders of the first group glibly tell you and me that America has outgrown her past, and all that is old must now be discarded for something that is new. My first answer to this arrant nonsense is that this country of ours is not old. As nations go, she is very young indeed. The late James Beck, that scholarly lawyer and statesman of our own time, had a way of emphasizing this fact. Some of you may have heard him on this point, for he was fond of adverting to it at bar association gatherings. Mr. Beck died only a few years ago. He might well be alive today had his years been extended a bit beyond the usual span. He used to say that during his boyhood in Philadelphia there still lived in that city, at an advanced age 'tis true, that great leader of the early American bar, Horace Binney, and that Horace Binney could recollect in his boyhood seeing Washington and Franklin as they entered and left Independence Hall in attendance upon the Constitutional Convention of 1787. In other words, here was a man known to us who in his youth knew a man who in his youth saw Washington and Franklin at the very birth of the Nation. Just two full life spans have intervened. That gives you some idea of how youthful America as a Nation really is.

One might have some patience with these wise men who are wont to talk of changed conditions and new problems as calling for new foundations for our national structure, provided they could show wherein the original foundations had failed us. This they cannot do. On the contrary, what was conceived and put together 163 years ago, has proved the greatest boon known to mankind. It succeeded beyond fondest expectations in preserving liberty and bringing happiness to the most fortunate people in all human history. It has become the last hope of freedom-loving men everywhere.

Despite these indisputable facts, you hear men and women, even in high places, some ignorant, some misguided, some downright corrupt, blithely ridiculing or lightly brushing aside the basic principles of the American Constitution. So persistent have they been, so plausible their arguments, and so seductive their promises, that not only have they gained an ear, but power as well.

If what I am saying to you today sounds trite, I make no apologies. It must be said again and again, by all who hold dear this blessed heritage of ours, until the rank and file of our citizenship becomes aware of what is happening here.

To make clear my meaning I bring you a simple message. It has but two points. The first relates to the stripe of men who made, who built, and who preserved this Nation. The second is concerned with the sort of citizen now being substituted as the typical American. The contrast will be obvious, the conclusion as deplorable as it is inescapable.

What manner of men were the founding fathers and those who held up their arms? The descriptive terms that at once flash into your minds are such words as "stalwart," "self-reliant," "independent," "sturdy," "freedom-loving," and the like. Such was the stuff American patriots were made of.

Let it not be thought that these men were lawless insurrectionists. On the contrary, they were inherently loyal to the mother country. Those of you who have read Lynn Montross' very recent book, Reluctant Rebels, will have been reminded of this fact, and will recall how loath those men were to sever the political bands that held them to the land of their origin. It was only bitter resentment of despotic government that drove them to the step. Having taken it, they were equally determined to set up a government of their own whereunder the individual citizen should be entitled to his unalienable rights, which included not only life and liberty but also the pursuit of happiness, according to his own dictates. These men proposed to plan their own lives, provide their own economic security, and to assume responsibility for their own destiny. To this end the individual was guaranteed the right to order his own life, whether for good or ill, without interference by governmental bureaucracy however well-meaning.

These men were steeped in all the philosophies of government. They were experienced in all the pitfalls and dangers of governmental power. They knew the corrupting effect of such power. Thus it was that after their independence had been won, and they were engaged in the difficult task of constructing the machinery of their own government, the immortal Jefferson wrote these wise words:

"In questions of power, then, let no more be heard of confidence in man, but bind him down from mischief by the chains of the Constitution."

Out of their own experience they knew that in last analysis "government" is nothing other than a man or group of men, and that such men on being elevated to posts of power do not thereby become saints. Many of them are weak, exceedingly weak. In the nature of things they are subjected to manifold temptations. One taste of power creates a lust for more power, and quickly engenders the notion that any tactics are justifiable in holding onto and enhancing that power.

If the smart gentlemen who today so readily talk of changed conditions as warranting new concepts in our organic law, think this inherent trait of human nature has changed, then let them look around, both abroad and at home, for the answer. Governmental power is the most dangerous force known to man. From the dawn of civilization it has plagued the race. No sooner have men entrusted it to their rulers than it has been made the instrument of tyranny and oppression. With full understanding of all this unhappy experience did our forefathers set about to construct a Government against which the individual should be protected, no matter what political party or group might gain control of the machinery.

This was truly an experiment in the art of government. Washington in his inaugural address so denominated it. Lincoln repeated it in his memorable address before Congress at the outbreak of war in 1861. Visitors who came from abroad in the early years of our history to observe, and later to write of their impressions, adopted the term "experiment." It is well that Americans of today should thoroughly understand the nature of that experiment. The gist of it was that government should be restricted to the business of governing, while citizens enjoyed the fruits of their labors and rose or fell according to their merits. It was not enough that governmental officers and agencies should be selected either directly or indirectly by the people. An equally important factor was that after being thus chosen their sphere of activity was restricted by laws designed to guarantee to the citizen a maximum of personal freedom of action.

How that experiment worked, how it opened up a new continent and new vistas for freemen everywhere, how it produced a citizenship that repelled every attack from without, and repressed every upheaval from within, is the history of America, and needs no repetition here.

Early visitors who wrote of their travels in America, such as Captain Hall, Mrs. Trollope, de Tocqueville, and Charles Dickens have much to say of the American's inordinate pride in his country. They were often irritated and even disgusted by what appeared to them as a spirit of swashbuckling and boastfulness. But those Americans were entitled to a high degree of satisfaction, for at long last the basic problems of government had been largely solved. The key to that solution is set forth in the preamble of the Constitution. There the true functions of government were succinctly stated: "establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense," and thus "promote the general welfare." The business of life was left to the citizen himself. The avowed purpose of this scheme of things, as aptly stated, was "to secure the blessings of liberty unto ourselves and our posterity." The liberty they here meant was individual liberty, free from encroachment by their own government as well as by any foreign foe.

World history has nothing to compare with the record of achievement by these men and their descendants under such a system of government. Of course, all was not smooth sailing, nor did all men fare equally. The fact that difficulties were faced and overcome is the significant thing. The further fact that the worthy, the diligent, and the thrifty generally succeeded, while the indolent and the unworthy suffered for their weakness, explains the development of a citizenry that made America strong. Out of all this has come an economy that is the marvel of the ages, one that has produced the highest state of well-being any people ever knew, one that has produced armies and the sinews of war that twice within our own time have literally saved civilization.

Consider now the amazing change that has come to pass. By devious methods it has been brought about that the Central Government now holds unlimited power to tax, unlimited power to spend, and virtually unlimited power to regulate the daily affairs of the citizen, even unto his hours of labor and his wages. Such financial and economic controls alone mean complete domination of the life of the individual, for whoever controls these can ultimately determine the destiny of a people. Not only are these powers now conceded, but they are regularly exercised in increasing measure. Moreover, they are being exercised for all manner of purposes, many of which are purely political. For example, hundreds of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money are spent annually to buy up food which is later destroyed or becomes worthless, for no other purpose than to promote scarcity, increase the price of farm products to the consumer, and thus give the farming class the benefit of high prices. The plain political effect of such a policy is to buy the farm vote at public expense. Other wholesale expenditures, such as purchasing silver at a price far above its true worth, paying out benefits, bonuses, and pensions to politically powerful groups, have made of Government a farce and have prostituted it, so that the candidate or the party that now makes the highest bid stands to get the vote of the recipients of this form of bribery.

As I have watched this evil process develop apace, I have often recalled those splendid words of honest Grover Cleveland in his message to Congress back in 1886, when he said:

"When more of the people's sustenance is exacted than is necessary to meet the just obligations of government and expenses of its economical administration, such exaction becomes ruthless extortion and a violation of the fundamental principles of a free government."

Not only are the unrestrained taxing and spending powers of the Federal Government being used in this fashion, but the regulatory power as well. If an office seeker today wants the support of organized labor, he must stand for an ever higher minimum wage, and for the enactment of laws designed to give special privileges to labor at the expense of the public.

Time will not suffice to point out all the instances of similar kind. They are legion, and are rapidly extending into every department of the Nation's life.

What is vitally significant is that the American conscience has come to tolerate this nefarious system. It carries an infectious poison that seems to stupefy our sensibilities and warp our better natures. I talked with a farmer recently trying to explain to him the iniquity of Government's so-called aid to agriculture, which had just reached him in the form of a check of considerable size. His reply was as follows: "I know all of this is wrong, but the other fellows are getting theirs, so we farmers might as well get ours." The sad fact is that this attitude has become common among the farming class that once stood as the very bulwark of stalwart Americanism.

It might seem odd that these different groups, none of which constitutes a majority, should be able to push through such measures designed for their special benefit. Here comes into play another political process that must never be overlooked. It was best described by that remarkable Virginian, John Randolph, of Roanoke, a master of telling statement. In one of his powerful speeches in Congress he on one occasion referred to the "cohesive power of public plunder." We ought never to forget that phrase. It carries a world of meaning, and tells the sorry story of pork-barrel, log-rolling and welfare legislation. It explains how politics does make strange bedfellows.

Thus it is that politics in this country has long since forsaken principle, and has degenerated into a mere game of selling the taxing power to organized groups in return for their votes.

Do not think I speak in any spirit of partisanship, for these methods have been resorted to by all parties, and have been adopted by candidates regardless of party labels.

The point I make is that public plunder has become the order of the day. It was started under a guise of emergency. It was carried further because of wartime necessity. It is now tolerated, if not accepted as an established national peacetime policy.

Were there nothing but dollars involved, I should not view the situation so seriously. Unfortunately, there is more here than meets the nose. At the urging of demagogues, agitators and ambitious office seekers, the American people have been led to turn to Government for the solving of all their problems. When this is done and Government assumes the task, such measures are called liberal.

I often wonder how it is that the usually clear and practical mind of the American citizen has not long since discovered the jokers in this sinister game being played at his expense. Let us take a look at a few of them.

The very process of having Government assume the role of guardian or father of its citizens is regularly held up as something novel and progressive in political science. In truth it is as old as government itself. Practically every king, dictator, and benevolent despot of old professed to operate a welfare state. He claimed the right to function as a father and thus to make his subjects his children. That is the very system that our American forefathers would not tolerate. Reverting to that system, cannot be liberalism, nor is it progress. It merely means a reversion to the age-old philosophy of government that cursed humanity until the American experiment lighted a new way.

The next joker follows as a corollary to the first. The paternalistic state cannot function as such unless the citizens surrenders his freedom of action and becomes a child. I venture that most men when they clamor or vote for regulation out of Washington fail to realize this simple fact. Every whit of paternalism on the part of government calls for a corresponding surrender of freedom of action on the part of the citizen. When such surrender reaches the basic activities of life, then the citizen becomes truly a helpless child whose only course is to obey his master. Then despotism is ready to set in.

The third joker consists in this, that not only does the citizen surrender his freedom, but his substance also. He must pay and pay dearly for all the petting paternalism he gets. Government first says, "Let us do the job for you," then calls for payment of the cost of the job, plus Government's inflated expense in doing it. That is why taxpayers to their consternation were denied any substantial relief after the close of the late war. They were rudely made to know that they must go on paying the cost of the vast paternalism already built up, with more to come.

The last joker I present is the relevation of whom we are surrendering our freedoms and our substance to. With pious face the professional bureaucrat will say you must have faith in the great American Government, and that you dare not discredit that noble institution. Let me remind you again of what our forefathers found out, and that was that Government means men, and men in matters of power cannot safely be trusted. Let us get this matter clear and straight. When you and I are asked to surrender our liberties and our property to the control of and use by Government, we are surrendering them to men, just plain ordinary men, who generally belong to the class called "politicians." Many of them are mediocre men or worse, who have never succeeded at anything beyond corralling votes, and often by questionable methods. The hoax is that such men, under the high-sounding title of "government," are held up as being qualified to spend the citizen's earnings and to regulate his life better than he can do so for himself. Two evil consequences flow from this surrender. Politicians thus surfeited with power can and do traffic in the very life substance of private citizens, as if this were a commodity to be bartered for votes. At the same time the short-sighted citizen who has been led to think only in terms of some immediate benefaction bestowed upon him, readily gets the idea that such is the only meaning and purpose of government.

In closing I leave with you what has ever seemed to me the most significant story that came out of the late World War. The incident occurred in those heartbreaking days of June 1940, when French troops were crushed and fleeing before the oncoming Germans. One young French officer pressing southward came to the cottage of an old peasant who had been his father's friend and companion in arms years before. He paused for a brief respite from his headlong flight, and while conversing with this old family friend he said to him, "Tell me what has happened to my country that she now lies broken and conquered. You with my father fought for France in the days of her glory. What is the meaning of this her downfall?" The old peasant promptly replied, "My young friend, I can tell you the secret of France's collapse. In the days of our generation when your father and I served and fought in the legions of France, the dominant spirit and only question in the breast of Frenchmen everywhere was, What can I do for France, what can I give to my country? While in this your generation you and your fellows have been thinking only in terms of, What can I get out of France, what can France be made to do for me?"

Yes; France collapsed long before her armies went to pieces. She collapsed from within, and when her sons began to think only in terms of what they could force from her. Here before our very eyes has been demonstrated the tragedy that can come to a people, a people with a great army and a great navy, when this creeping paralysis sets in.

As one contemplates the Vanishing American his soul is troubled within him. He wonders whether the fate of France awaits his country.

Where Is the Economy Under the Reorganization Act of 1946?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent heretofore granted, I am inserting some interesting statistics furnished by Paul O. Peters under date of August 8, 1950, with reference to alleged economy under the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946:

LEGISLATIVE REORGANIZATION ACT OF 1946 ECONOMY DUD

Public Law 601, approved August 2, 1946, popularly known as the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, was enacted for the declared purpose to provide for increased efficiency in the legislative branch of the Government has turned out to be a dud when when it comes to saving money for the American taxpayers.

If the efficiency of the legislative establishment has been increased, and this is a matter upon which judgment is reserved, there is no disputing the fact that the costs of the legislative branch have increased by leaps and bounds since 1946, as illustrated by the following table:

Expenditures by fiscal years for the legislative branch of the Government

1946	$22,815,830
1947	39,584,898
1948	43,126,172
1949	46,506,024
1950	56,028,687
1951 (estimate)	70,655,064

The budget for 1951, estimates the appropriations for the legislative branch, as follows:

Senate	$11,840,391
House of Representatives	21,804,970
Legislative miscellaneous	268,715
Architect of the Capitol	15,177,400
Botanic Garden	196,500
Library of Congress	9,369,200
Government Printing Office	19,052,736
Permanent appropriation, Library of Congress	86,495
Total general and special appropriations	77,796,407

Further proof that the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, which, by title II, section 206, directed the Comptroller General to make an expenditure analysis of each agency in the executive branch of the Government, failed to live up to expectations, may be found in the fact that no appropriation has been made by Congress to enable the Comptroller General to carry out this directive.

As the so-called watchdog of the Treasury, the Comptroller General was specifically authorized by law as follows:

"SEC. 205. The Comptroller General is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study of restrictions placed in general appropriation acts limiting the expenditure of specified appropriations therein, with a view to determining the cost to the Government incident to complying with such restrictions, and to report to the Congress his estimate of the cost of complying with such restrictions and such other recommendations with respect thereto as he deems necessary or desirable.

"SEC. 206. The Comptroller General is authorized and directed to make an expenditure analysis of each agency in the executive branch of the Government (including Government corporations), which, in the opinion of the Comptroller General, will enable Congress to determine whether public funds have been economically and efficiently administered and expended. Reports on such analyses shall be submitted by the Comptroller General, from time to time, to the Committees on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, to the Appropriations Committees, and to the legislative committees having jurisdiction over legislation relating to the operations of the respective agencies, of the two Houses."

In view of the fact that the Federal Government has operated on a deficit basis for 18 out of the last 20 years and total expenditures have amounted to $577,541,437,902, it is important that the Congress implement its directive to the Comptroller General and have at hand a comprehensive analysis of the past expenditures to determine whether or not they have at all times been economically and efficiently administered and expended.

A good starting point would be on the $91,548,245,781 in expenditures for national defense during the past 5 years.

Then, too, the Comptroller General might find out and report to Congress just who authorized the procurement of a 93-year supply of fluorescent light tubes, a 247-year supply of binders and carloads of similar easy obtainable articles now cluttering up Uncle Sam's warehouse space in various parts of the country.

But most important of all, if the Reorganization Act of 1946 is ever to reach its prime objective, the Congress must stop appropriating more money each year than the bureaucrats have been able to spend.

The Congress willing, economy in the Federal Government is not impossible.

Russians Slow Export of Strategic Materials to United States to a Trickle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WESLEY A. D'EWART
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, as I have said many times in this House, one of the most important strategic materials our Nation needs, in war and in peace, is chrome.

The Senate has now adopted an amendment to the general appropriations bill which will aid materially in the development of our chromite resources in Montana, where 75 percent of our domestic supply is found. In order to point out further the importance of developing this domestic resource, and ending our dependence upon far-away places including Russia, I include the following newspaper article dealing with imports from the Soviet Union:

RUSSIANS SLOW EXPORT OF STRATEGIC MATERIALS TO UNITED STATES TO A TRICKLE

The Russians have demonstrated that they know how to use export controls, too.

When the United States in March 1948 instituted a ban or quantitative restriction on some 2,300 commodities for shipment behind the iron curtain, there was no immediate reaction by Russia.

There were only two strategic materials we normally had imported from Russia—manganese and chrome ore—but they were extremely important. Both are essential to the production of steel and are being stockpiled.

In 1948 Russia exported 427,000 tons of manganese ore—some of the richest in the world with a content of about 35 percent. That was an increase of 96,000 tons over their 1947 shipments.

RUSSIA REACTS SHARPLY

The picture was about the same for chrome ore. In 1948 the U. S. S. R. exported 351,755 tons to the United States, compared with 236,699 tons in 1947.

Last year the Russians reacted sharply. While not banning entirely the sale of the two vital metals, they cut down sharply. The 1949 figures were 81,500 tons of manganese ore and 95,653 tons of chrome ore.

So far this year there has been only the faintest trickle. In fact, last week the first 1950 shipload of chrome ore from the Soviet arrived in Baltimore—6,700 tons of it. Only 6,500 tons of manganese has been received, with 7 months of the year elapsed.

The United States produces less than 10 percent of the manganese it consumes and this is low grade. Last year our output was 126,000 tons. We consumed 1,360,042. The bulk of what we now get comes from India, the Gold Coast, Brazil, and the Union of South Africa.

TRANSPORT IS PROBLEM

Officials say there is plenty of manganese in the ground in these places, but that the problem of transportation from the mine head to the seacoast is the stumbling block.

United States steel companies reportedly are pouring money into Brazil in an effort to step up production, and American transportation experts have been working in India to improve the situation there. Once this is done the United States won't have to worry about manganese, whether for war or peace, it is said.

As for chrome, American production is negligible. Last year the output was 433 tons. Our total consumption was 1,204 344 tons. Government spokesmen say, however, that chrome is no problem, either for current needs or stockpile purposes. In fact, stockpile requirements of one grade (refractory) already have been met. Our principal sources are Turkey, southern Rhodesia, South Africa, Cuba, and the Philippines.

FURS ARE BIG ITEMS

Furs made up more than half the Soviet exports to the United States last year, as they usually do, and are the biggest dollar earner for the U. S. S. R. We bought $24,000,000 worth in 1949 when our total imports from Russia totaled $42,000,000.

(An ECA official, commenting on this, said it was ironic that furs—a luxury item for capitalist America—help finance the Communist Party here perhaps as much as any other one item.)

Metals and manufactures took second place among Russian exports to the United States in 1949, totaling $8,000,000.

The Real Issue in the Knowland Amendment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, in view of a statement sent to each Member of the House by the Honorable WALTER LYNCH on the Knowland amendment, I should like to keep the record clear by pointing out:

First. That his statement is an indictment of every other member of the 12-man conference, as every one of them signed the report adopting the so-called Knowland amendment;

Second. That his statement is an indictment of our State legislatures, our State administrators, and our State courts, for it assumes that unless the Secretary of Labor has unbridled authority over the States—

a. Workers will be deprived of benefits for refusing to sign yellow dog contracts, accept sub-standard work, give up their union membership and join company unions.

b. That the appeal process of the States is unfair in that it takes some time to pursue the remedy in the approved State law; and that therefore the Secretary of Labor should be permitted to step in and coerce the State to follow his ruling instead of following their orderly process before he tries them for noncompliance with the Federal standards;

Third. That our States are so inherently vicious in their administration and court rulings, that the Federal standards contained in their own laws will be disregarded and nullified, and that requiring the Secretary to wait until the State court has spoken—to quote him "will break down the standards established by Congress."

If these accusations are true, we are wasting time in considering the amendment recommended by our State administrators and governors. We are wasting time in considering their request to preserve their State administrative and judicial processes. We should be considering the question of abolishing our State systems.

Make no mistake, despite all innuendoes to the contrary, the real issue is not the alleged issue of preserving the standards Congress has written. Rather it is the issue of protecting the States against complete domination in their administrative functions, and circumvention of their judicial processes by the Secretary of Labor.

State administrators and courts can of course misconstrue their law and violate their law today, and if the Knowland amendment is passed they can of course still do so. But our States have a proud record of fairness. They are not vicious, unfair to labor, or interested in violating Federal standards. If they did, they can still be penalized by the Secretary of Labor. The amendment does not relieve our States of compliance with Federal standards. It merely prevents the Secretary from dominating their day to day administration and circumventing the State procedure in the guise of enforcing Federal standards.

Appointment Quotas to Annapolis To Be Cut

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 29, 1950

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, due to a shortage of living quarters, which cannot be expanded because of the defense economy program, the United States Naval Academy will be forced to reduce its appointment quotas beginning next year. Members of Congress have already been advised that their quotas would be cut from five to four candidates for each Congressman and Senator. With the exception of the President's quotas of 75, and the State Department's privilege of naming 20 men from Latin-American nations, all other quotas will be cut approximately 20 percent. At present, 3,400 midshipmen are quartered in Bancroft Hall—which was designed to accommodate 2,750 men—and larger quarters are urgently needed. Under present world conditions it is difficult to understand how this sacrifice in preparedness, with its relatively minor saving, can be justified while the Nation is spending billions for other types of defense, both at home and abroad.

Address by Hon. Edward Martin, of Pennsylvania, at Annual Meeting of West Virginia Oil and Natural Gas Association, Weston, W. Va.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 9 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address which I delivered at the annual meeting of the West Virginia Oil and Natural Gas Association at Weston, W. Va., Saturday, August 5.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF UNITED STATES SENATOR EDWARD MARTIN, OF PENNSYLVANIA, AT ANNUAL MEETING OF THE WEST VIRGINIA OIL AND NATURAL GAS ASSOCIATION AT WESTON, W. VA., AUGUST 5, 1950

It is an extreme pleasure to address this organization of oil and gas producers who maintain the American tradition of rugged individualism.

Yours is a dangerous and hazardous business. It has developed into one of the greatest and most useful industries in the world because men of courage, vision, and initiative took great risks, both personal and financial.

Since that memorable day in 1859 when Col. E. L. Drake brought in the world's first oil well in the hills of northwestern Pennsylvania, the search for oil has gone forward.

It has led men with the spirit of adventure into the most inaccessible places.

They endured hardship and back-breaking toil. They lived and worked under the most primitive conditions. They experienced disappointment and discouragement.

But they went ahead with persistence, resourcefulness, and enterprise. They relied on their own efforts and energy.

They didn't look to the Government for grants, loans, or subsidies. They raised their own capital.

They invented improved machinery. They expanded into new fields of discovery and development. They called upon science for research into new technology and better products.

They created new transportation systems and improved marketing methods to give better service to the public.

Today the average citizen takes all these things for granted. But it should be remembered that the oil and gas industry, of which you are an important part, came up the hard way.

You are familiar with the difficulties which produced the American way of life. Therefore you appreciate the rewards of American achievement—our high standard of living, our splendid cultural and spiritual attainments and above all, our freedom of the individual.

The economic greatness of the United States was not built in legislative halls. It was not established by Government decree. It was not created by the decisions of our high courts. The same courageous spirit of individual enterprise and initiative that is represented in the oil and gas industry built our giant steel production, our coal industry, and our great transportation systems.

The men who contributed most to the economic strength of our country were not hampered by an army of bureaucrats pretending to look after their interests. They were not controlled by Government directives and regulations designed to serve political purposes. They did not encounter Government competition with private industry.

The American Republic was founded by men who loved freedom. The Declaration of Independence was a protest against unwarranted taxation, political interference and big, centralized government.

In drafting the Constitution the founding fathers recognized the dangers of big government. They knew that government could in time become oppressive and could encroach upon the liberties of the people.

They sought to restrict the power of government, to safeguard individual freedom and to protect the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Their ideal was a government that would be the servant of the people and not their master.

Under that concept the United States has made greater progress than any other nation in the world. In less than 200 years we have built the richest and the most powerful nation on the face of the earth.

Is it because we had greater natural resources than other countries? No; that is not the reason. Many other countries have richer natural resources than we possess.

We have about 7 percent of the world's population and only 6 percent of the world's land area, yet we produce one-third of all the world's goods.

Why have we accomplished so much more in 200 years than any other nation in all history?

Why have we been successful in 6 wars?

Why has American inventive genius been able to lighten the labors of workers in all parts of the world?

Why have our men and women served successfully all over the globe as teachers and instructors?

Why have our men and women gone to every island of the seas teaching the glories of Christ?

There is only one answer, and that is because we possess the God-given freedom of the individual.

This freedom imposes great responsibilities. In order to have freedom, the individual must love freedom above security. To maintain freedom of the individual calls for sweat, sacrifice, thrift, hard work, tolerance, shedding of tears and blood, and love of God.

Those qualities have had a prominent part in the progress and prosperity of West Virginia.

Your early settlers had deep religious and patriotic convictions. They wanted to be free. They wanted opportunity. They were willing to work for security and happiness and the well being of their posterity.

Your people are hard-working, courageous and independent. They are strong believers in the free enterprise economy and the American way of life.

Like all real Americans, they are naturally opposed to socialism in any form. They would vote almost solidly against this doctrine if the question was submitted for a direct vote.

That, of course, will never happen, but nevertheless, during the last 18 years we have witnessed a departure from the philosophy of government contemplated by the founding fathers of these United States.

We have become increasingly aware of a dangerous trend in the thinking of some of our people and in the administration proposals which are taking us down the slippery road to socialism.

It is natural to ask:

"How can it happen here when we are opposed to socialism and don't want it?"

The answer is found in indifference, neglect of our civic duties, the desire for an easy way of life, government paternalism and too much government at too high a price.

Let us look at some facts.

In 18 years the Federal Government has increased its number of employees threefold and its cost 10 times. Its debt is increasing daily and now amounts to more than $257,000,000,000.

At $10,000 each, this would drill 25,700,000 wells.

This tremendous debt is destroying the value of the dollar. It is one of the principal causes of inflation.

In the fiscal year ending June 30 of this year Government spending exceeded revenues by $3,100,000,000 dollars.

What has brought this about?

It is the result of increasing and expanding governmental functions. In the beginning the Federal Government looked after national defense, rivers and harbors, banking and currency and foreign affairs.

Now in addition, the Federal Government wants larger appropriations for roads, education, health, welfare, airports, housing, and relief work all over the world.

Federal men are now out on the farms and down in the mines. They conduct health clinics, supervise conservation, and plan for public works projects.

The Federal Government owns or is financially interested in about 100 important business enterprises with a direct investment of about $20,000,000,000.

The Government is engaged in the business of lending money, guaranteeing loans and deposits, writing life insurance, producing, distributing, and selling electric power and fertilizers, operating railways and ships, buying and selling farm products, and smelting and selling metals.

Some of these enterprises invest their surplus funds in Government securities, thus compelling the Government to pay interest on its own investment.

You are all familiar with the Government's plan to extend control over natural gas by regulating prices to be paid independent producers and gatherers in the field.

As a result of all these increased functions, Federal, State, and local governments now cost us more than $65,000,000,000 per year.

We pay Federal, State, and local government employees more than $10,000,000,000 per year in salaries.

More than 25,000,000 Americans receive a regular check of some kind from government.

Let us be fair. It is not all the Federal Government's fault. Hat in hand, with bowed heads, States, municipalities, chambers of commerce, business groups, labor organizations, farmers, and educators seek help from Uncle Sam.

Through governmental hand-outs, subsidies, price supports, loaning of money, and grants to subdivisions of government, we are getting away from individual independence and we are becoming more and more dependent upon government.

Let us look at some other dangers.

There are those who would destroy our way of life and substitute for it a socialistic form of government. That would wipe out the freedom of the individual and make us subservient to an all powerful totalitarian State.

There are those who feel that Government can better operate business, hospitals, schools, and other enterprises than individuals.

My own State of Pennsylvania has made great progress. It has a greater diversity of industry, natural resources, and transportation systems than any other State in the Union. Its development has been the result of private capital.

Pennsylvania, however, has experienced a glaring example of the failure of government ownership. I am referring to the canal system in Pennsylvania.

A little more than 100 years ago Pennsylvania embarked on a great public-works program, financed by public funds, including canals, bridges, turnpikes, and railroads. The canal project alone cost $40,000,000, an enormous sum in those days. The main canal and railroad system ran clear across the State from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh.

The dreamers of that period thought the net profits would pay all the expenses of State government and would relieve the people of all State taxes.

How easily they were fooled. This venture of government in business was so badly managed and was so unprofitable that it almost depleted the State treasury. It placed the whole economy of Pennsylvania in danger of destruction.

Things were so bad as far as the canals were concerned that the general assembly abandoned the project and directed that the State-owned transportation facilities be sold.

Further legislation was enacted, forbidding the State to engage directly or indirectly in any corporate enterprise. To show how deeply the State was involved, it was not until 1913 that all the bonds which financed this system of public works were finally paid off.

Another example of Government inefficiency in business was the operation of the railroads by the Federal Government during World War I.

Government operation extended from January 1, 1918, to February 9, 1920. The railroad revenues during that period accrued to the Government. They proved insufficient to meet the rentals. The cost to the Government for that period was a little more than $1,575,000,000.

In World War II the railroads were operated by the railroads themselves. From December 1, 1941 to August 3, 1945, which was the period of the war, the railroads paid $1,140,000,000 in Federal income taxes and approximately $100,000,000 in other taxes. In addition they paid $873,000,000 in payroll taxes for support of the retirement and unemployment benefits set up by Federal statute. Railroads also paid State and local taxes as well as dividends to their stockholders.

The comparison is convincing evidence of the inefficiency of Government management.

That type of management in our domestic affairs during all but two of the last 20 years has increased the national debt to more than $257,000,000,000.

In all that time, except for the 2 years when the Republican Eightieth Congress was in control, the Federal Government spent beyond its income and failed to balance the budget.

Any private corporation operated in that manner would have ended up in bankruptcy long ago.

The same type of incompetent management in our foreign relations has brought us to a crisis which may explode into the most terrible war the world has ever known.

While we fight for human liberty and to maintain freedom in the world we must remember that we are in danger of losing the freedoms that we prize so highly here at home.

The big question before the people of the United States is how far we can go and still preserve individual freedom as the keystone of the American way of life.

To my mind it is most important to realize that the cost of a long-drawn-out war can destroy individual freedom even though we crush Communist aggression everywhere in the world.

To that holy purpose we must dedicate all our power and all our resources. Every ounce of strength we possess must be placed in the balance to defend liberty against tyranny and enslavement.

We must be prepared to pay any price and make any sacrifice in the supreme emergency that may arise out of the war in Korea.

Such a war could more than double the national debt under which our people are now staggering.

The combat cost of World War II, which lasted 4 years, was $356,000,000,000. About 45 percent of that cost was paid for by taxation. The balance, approximately $215,000,000,000, was added to the national debt.

The price of weapons, equipment, and everything that enters into waging war is almost double today. I have gone into the costs pretty carefully and I have figured out that a 4-year war would call for the expenditures of a minimum of $600,000,000,000.

If taxes were levied to pay 45 percent of this war, as in the last war, we would come out with a new debt of about $330,000,000,000 or a total debt of nearly $600,000,000,000.

Such a debt would put the whole economy of the United States in a straitjacket from which we might never free ourselves. We would live in a planned economy, with regimentation, regulations, and directives controlling all industry, business, agriculture, and labor.

With that gloomy picture before us continued deficit spending on the home front would be dangerous, dishonest, and unpatriotic.

We must, therefore, face the situation with firm determination to cut to the bone all Government spending not connected with national defense.

We must, without delay, eliminate every form of waste or extravagance in the financial operation of the Federal Government.

We must stop at once all spending for purposes which may be classified as nonessential.

Many desirable services which government now provides must be abandoned or curtailed.

In the interest of economy on the home front many normal functions of government must be suspended.

All public works not immediately necessary must be postponed.

The economies I have enumerated will help build America's financial strength in support of the principles to which our Republic is dedicated.

On the other side of the world American boys are giving their lives to defend these principles for us and for the world.

The sacrifices we are called upon to make here at home are insignificant compared to the price they pay so heroically.

Behind the armed forces that have violated the peace of the world in Korea stands the cruel and ruthless power of Communist Russia.

This enemy of God and mankind has conquered a large part of Europe and has brought much of Asia under virtual enslavement. Its evil purpose is to rule the world by terror, tyranny, and bloodshed.

Peace with freedom can be restored only by American strength, fighting to maintain the integrity of free people in a free world.

We will succeed because we fight in a righteous cause.

With prayer for God's blessing and protection we will go forward to save the world from destruction and to assure a future of liberty and progress for all mankind.

Turkish Attitude on Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, August 9 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a recent news release, issued by the Turkish Information Office, in which the Premier of Turkey goes into some detail concerning the aid which Turkey is making available to the United Nations forces in Korea. It is a very encouraging and commendatory statement, and I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PREMIER MENDERES OUTLINES TURKISH ATTITUDE ON KOREA

At a press conference Turkish Premier Adnan Menderes elaborated on Turkey's recent decision to send 4,500 troops to Korea.

In reply to questions put by reporters, Premier Menderes said:

"Let us make it clear at the outset that the decision reached by our Government is not a decision of war; on the contrary it is a decision arising out of an attempt to preserve the peace. In our opinion, it is only by way of decisions similar to ours, to be arrived at by the other freedom-loving nations, that acts of aggression can be prevented and world peace can be safeguarded. As a matter of fact, a sincere attachment to the ideals of the UN requires a belief in this basic principle. The unparalleled calamities and tragedies of the Second World War were the outcome of the belief that peace could be preserved by means of separate and independent efforts by individual states, that taking care of one's own interests would suffice to protect against the disasters that threatened other nations.

"There are those who would have us adopt the irresolute and undecided attitude of certain countries in the Korean affair. We know that between the two world wars countries that were believed to have attained the highest degree of political and diplomatic development nurtured similar dubious hopes and acted in a hesitant and wavering manner; the blunders thus committed caused humanity untold suffering. After these misfortunes, and in view of the experience gained thereby, it would be an unthinkable inadvertency to fall a victim once again to such egotistical sentiments and to believe that the world can be protected against the disaster that threatens it, simply by adopting a course of indecision and vacillation.

"Secondly, let us make it clear that our Government has taken its decision on Korea in full realization of all its implications: our decision would still be the same were we to be faced a thousand times with the same situation. The two great wars, and the experiences of the postwar years, have demonstrated that the existence and freedom of nations are not necessarily defended at their own geographical frontiers. It is clear that we are living in an era that imposes worldwide identity of destiny in war and peace; the unfurling of the Turkish flag at Korea is the outcome of both the most idealistic and the most realistic aims and views. Writings that criticize the sending of Turkish troops to distant lands serve to underline the fact that certain people are employing camouflaged tactics. There is no juridical justification for the assertion that our sons who are called to serve their country may only be employed within Turkey's national boundaries. Such views only go to show what kind of defeatism is adopted by their authors.

"We are convinced that the Government's decision on Korea is in complete conformity with the will and spirit of the Turkish people. That is why we are also certain that the nation has accorded the Government its full and unqualified support, and that it will continue to do so."

Remember Yalta

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ZALES N. ECTON
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, August 9 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Remember Yalta," which appeared in this morning's Washington Post.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, August 9, 1950]

REMEMBER YALTA

The curious think about the rapid warming up of the cold war is that the place of diplomacy in the struggle has grown in significance. There are many blows that can be struck for peace which are available to our diplomacy. We come back to the desirability of denouncing the 1945 compact at Yalta. The document is such a thing of shreds and patches that the principle of respect for international obligations requires of the United States and Britain a denunciation of that instrument and a statement of particulars. Several times the opportunity has been provided; the last was when our new antiaggression policy in the Far East was announced June 26. However, though timing is sometimes all-important, there is no necessity to wait for time and place in exposing a cynical failure to carry out a solemn obligation.

In international law there is ample reason for a denunciation of the Yalta Pact. When a party to a contract fails to carry it out, the other signatory is at perfect liberty to withdraw his own obligation. This is simply the extension of the principle in domestic contracts which makes a contract null and void when it is frustrated. What has happened to the undertakings arrived at at Yalta is now common knowledge. Balkan countries whose independence was pledged at Yalta are virtually incorporated in Soviet territory. Independence has been extinguished, freedom has been denied, and those countries have become vassals of Moscow. In the Far East, the Yalta conferees agreed to roll back the map to 1895 in behalf of Russia. In that year, for instance, the Russians stole from the Chinese rail and port concessions in Manchuria, and these were restored to Russia as a bribe to come into the Pacific War, though nothing could have induced the Russians to keep out. These prizes have become the entering wedge for the russification of Manchuria. Secretary Acheson in his National Press Club speech of January 12 said:

"Armed with these new powers, what is happening in China is that the Soviet Union is detaching the northern provinces of China from China and is attaching them to the Soviet Union. This process is complete in outer Mongolia. It is nearly complete in Manchuria, and I am sure that in inner Mongolia and in Sinkiang, there are very happy reports coming from Soviet agents to Moscow. This is what is going on. It is the detachment of these whole areas, vast areas—populated by Chinese—the detachment of these areas from China and their attachment to the Soviet Union."

It is bootless to lament what happened at Yalta. More constructive is to denounce the pact in behalf of the sacred principle of respect for international engagements. This is an elementary duty. The delay in so doing binds this country to the subversion of the deal as well as to the deal itself, and makes us accessory to both. Denunciation would also bring to the attention of the Chinese people the immorality that the Russians have practiced at their expense. Thus, in addition to putting the record straight, our diplomacy would be doing a service in the struggle with Russia that is going on in Asia. As time goes on Manchuria is bound to become the sharpest point of friction between China and Russia, and anything that can be done to keep the loss of Manchuria before the Chinese people is good diplomacy.

Declaration of Policy Adopted at the Fifty-fourth Annual Convention of the Wisconsin Bankers' Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REID F. MURRAY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 30, 1950

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in the State of Wisconsin we find that business, labor, and agriculture are rather equally divided as to the economy of the State. The watchword of our State is "Forward," and the progress that has been made is largely the result of the cooperation between business, labor, and agriculture. These groups have been able to work together closely for the general welfare of the State, and the results are manifested in many of its programs such as the workmen's compensation, unemployment insurance, and insured farm mortgages.

The Wisconsin Bankers' Association, at its annual convention on July 19, 20, and 21, 1950, adopted a declaration of policy urging, among other things, the reduction of Federal expenditures and the deferment of new welfare programs until it is possible to balance the national budget. They have declared that—

> The policy of the Federal Government to spend more than it receives in taxes at a time of high national income is extremely dangerous to the country's welfare.

They further point out that the banks of the country have sufficient loanable funds to meet all meritorious requests for business loans, large and small, and do not believe there is any necessity for Government to create new credit agencies. They favor an adjustment downward in Federal income tax of 53 percent imposed on smaller corporations and oppose any Federal legislation that would vest in the Federal Reserve Board the authority or power to regulate the reserve requirements of any banks that are not members of the Federal Reserve System.

Atlantic Federal Convention Could Halt Stalin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, August 9 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the fourth of a seres of five articles by Clarence Streit, editor of the magazine Freedom and Union, published at 700 Ninth Street NW., Washington, D. C., and author of Union Now, which have appeared in various newspapers in the United States and Canada, pointing up the urgent lesson that I find Korea teaches, namely, the Atlantic Union resolution—Senate Concurrent Resolution 57—cannot be passed too soon.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KOREA'S LESSON: THE FREE MUST FEDERATE SOONER

(By Clarence K. Streit)

"It would have been far wiser," Freedom and Union said in April 1949—more than a year before the Korean war—"if the United States instead of starting with an alliance with the other Atlantic democracies, had invited them to meet with it in a federal constitutional convention to explore the possibility of uniting in an organic Atlantic union of the free. * * *

"The Kremlin would have faced this difficulty: It could not attack or take a hostile line toward the convention without thereby assuring and speeding agreement on a federal constitution. * * * All this would be particularly helpful to the United States. So long as it has troops in Europe it is bound to be involved in any major European war. The danger is that the Kremlin will continue its expansion in Asia and come into conflict there with the United States.

"We Americans would be much more sure of the backing of the Europeans there if we had invited them to a federal convention with us than if they were merely our allies. The Kremlin would not miss this point, either."

True, in this Korean test our British allies promptly put their far eastern fleet at the disposition of the United States. But the point remains: By relying only on alliance and the UN, each of which permits each democracy to act at the show-down as it sees fit, we encouraged the Kremlin to gamble that the democracies would again remain divided long enough for aggression to win.

After all, the Kremlin had just seen that the Atlantic Pact and the UN Charter had not prevented the United States and Britain from pursuing opposite policies as regards recognition of Communist China. Atlantic federal union clearly would have prevented this, insured a common policy. This being true, the Kremlin is bound to reason that continued refusal of the Atlantic allies even to explore federal union is strong proof that each is jealously preserving the right to do as it pleases whenever it pleases, and that the possibility of winning through division among them remains good. Two world wars should be proof enough that nothing short of federal union can succeed in discouraging aggressors from wishfully gambling on democratic division. Wars, leagues, alliances—everything else but union has already failed, and failed repeatedly, to discourage this gambling.

If we are to halt the Kremlin in good time from going further down this road to world war, the only safe course is for Congress to pass the Atlantic Union resolution in the short period left before it adjourns this summer. Failure to do this now means the resolution must go over to the next Congress, with the probability that the proposed exploratory convention cannot come to grips before 1952 with the problem of constituting the union. Who can assure us it will not then be too late to prevent a third world war, even by union of the free?

To measure how much the situation may change for the worse by 1952, one needs to recall how much it has already worsened in the brief period since the Atlantic Union resolution was introduced in Congress on July 26, 1949. That was less than 1 year ago, yet we have already suffered the following surprises: devaluation by the British, not only sharper than expected, but copied by more countries; a British election resulting in a weak, unstable government, when stability is needed; the disclosure that Moscow has broken our atomic bomb monopoly; the Fuchs' confession; the decision to make the hydrogen bomb; the loss of all China to communism. On March 13, Senator KEFAUVER reminded the Senate of these disasters, and exclaimed:

"How imprudent to assume, as the State Department implicitly does, that the next 10 months will be fair-weather sailing. How dangerously rash to conclude that we must hasten to explore every way to make the hydrogen bomb, but that we have no time in which to explore the free federal way to keep it from wrecking the world. How foolhardy to believe that we can safely wait until 1951 to debate on this floor whether we should begin exploring whether our American principles of free federal union can lead us to peace."

Already we are engaged in a police war in Korea. Where will be in 1951—1952?

Seoul now—St. Louis when?

Again I say, let us lose no more irretrievable time.

The free cannot federate too soon.

The Plain Truth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say that I concur in everything that the editor of the Olean Times-Herald has to say in regard to the lieutenant governor, Joe B. Hanley, of New York State. The people of the Empire State owe much to this fine American for his splendid service. Here is a man who is every inch a patriot, the very type who is needed for leadership in this hour of the Nation's peril. I am inserting under leave to extend, the editorial which appeared in the Olean Times-Herald of recent date:

THE PLAIN TRUTH

Lt. Gov. Joe R. Hanley, hearty and vigorous after reaching the so-called allotted span of threescore years and ten, has led a most active and varied life.

And during the course of that life he has achieved a store of wisdom that, unfortunately, is not granted to all of us.

Moreover, it is an all-embracing wisdom. It applies to men and their foibles and frailties; but especially to government in a democratic land.

And one thing the lieutenant governor had to say the other day at Hamilton College following a 3-week vacation in Iowa far from the madding crowd should be noted by all of us, for nothing ever was truer, and the vast majority of us appear to be completely oblivious to its implications.

"Every time the state steps in and does something for us," said Joe Hanley, "we lose a part of our precious liberty."

At this moment we are actually fighting for our precious liberty.

We are fighting to maintain the principle of human freedom.

We know that if we don't fight for it, and if we don't win that fight, we shall not have any freedom.

We know that our lot, sooner or later, will be that of other peoples who, loving freedom just as much as we love it, have disappeared behind the iron curtain to live at the behest of a ruthless taskmaster.

This fight in which we are engaged will be costly, both in human life and in money.

But we must see it through, in company, with our associates of the United Nations. And we must see it through successfully, if freedom is to survive in this world.

Yet do most of us ever think that "every time the state" - and Mr. Hanley means the national state especially—"steps in and does something for us, we lose a part of our precious liberty"?

Yet it is perfectly true.

It is as true of nations as it is of individuals.

The going is rough indeed, eventually, for the person who has always relied on someone else for virtually everything.

The son who was born with a silver spoon in his mouth and who has had it there ever since invariably goes through a heartbreaking experience when the inevitable time arrives when not only must he fend for himself, but may have to fight a hard and possibly losing battle.

All of us, under such lush circumstances, lull ourselves into a false sense of security. We persuade ourselves that the easy times will last forever; and we let others do more and more for us, and relieve us of as much responsibility as possible.

"Let George do it" has become a notorious American expression.

This country was made great not by governmental paternalism, but by what has been termed, and quite correctly, "rugged individualism."

Its foundations were laid by men and women of courage, endurance, and faith.

They worked hard and long; they had a minimum of comforts and they had an abiding faith in themselves and in their God.

They spent their hardy lives largely by the axiom that the Lord helps those who help themselves; and they built better than they knew.

For the foundations of this great land are sound. Today they are carrying not only America but half the world as well; and they may have to carry more.

But they are stanch and strong; and they will not crumble.

Our concern is the edifice that we shall build on them. Will it—50, 100, 500 years from now—be as rugged as they?

Will it withstand all the shocks of the ages, rocklike against all who would tear it down? Will it continue to be the beacon-light of freedom, and the lodestar of human liberty?

That, friends and neighbors, is something that we and those who shall come after will have to decide; for our destiny lies in our own hands.

And we may well remember the warning of one who has only the welfare of his country at heart—"every time the state steps in and does something for us, we lose a part of our precious liberty."

Illinois Should Keep Lucas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 9 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Illinois Should Keep LUCAS," published in the Chicago Sun-Times of Monday, August 7, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ILLINOIS SHOULD KEEP LUCAS

There are two big reasons why we believe Illinois voters should return SCOTT W. LUCAS to the United States Senate in the election that now is only 90 days away.

1. The American people need men of the caliber of SCOTT LUCAS in Congress. He has shown a straight-thinking appreciation of the problems of this twentieth century world.

Senator LUCAS has grown in stature since he first went to Washington in 1934 to succeed the late Henry T. Rainey in the House of Representatives. Along with Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, Mr. LUCAS is rated by independent observers among the 10 most able and valuable men in the Upper Chamber.

In taking the position that Illinois should keep Mr. LUCAS in the Senate we do not say that we think he has always been "right" in his votes. On occasion, he has disagreed with this newspaper's editorial policy. He sometimes disagreed with President Roosevelt, and he has talked back to President Truman, telling him frankly what was possible to accomplish in Congress and what wasn't. The latest such disagreement was over the Spanish loan question a few days ago.

Mr. LUCAS stands on his record. It shows that he has been on the progressive, liberal side on social and global matters, consistently and courageously. He has mixed good sense, political savvy, and human understanding with independent judgment. We'll have more to say about his record later in the campaign.

2. Our second reason for being for LUCAS is our inability to stomach another of the Chicago Tribune's stooges.

Mr. LUCAS' Republican opponent, Everett M. Dirksen, is, in some respects, an even more unfit candidate than the Trib's last two offerings for the Senate, Dick Lyons and C. Wayland "Curly" Brooks.

They were Trib naturals. Dirksen has executed a flip-flop on political matters to win the Trib's support.

It is always a great mistake for any State at any time to send to the Senate a puppet who responds to the jerks on wires running to any newspaper office.

In all American history there is no better illustration of the danger of political wildness in a newspaper office than the attempt of the Tribune's editor to make a mockery of the policies and ideals of Abraham Lincoln by an editorial decision to quit the Civil War, on the eve of victory, with an agreement to let several southern States secede from the Union and keep slavery within their borders. In that flip-flop enterprise the Tribune office tried to use a Republican politician who had gained prestige and power in Washington as a Member of Congress from Illinois.

Mr. Dirksen is a smooth article. His words, flowing like those of a scholar and a statesman, gave him prestige in the House of Representatives. But he was a different Dirksen then, and the Tribune didn't care much for him. Before entrusting to him the power of a United States Senator, the people of Illinois should carefully examine the record.

In 1933 he was a Republican New Dealer. He supported President Roosevelt's domestic program enthusiastically. Thirteen years later, in 1947, he said those measures were "a great departure from the course of freedom."

In his early years as a Congressman, he had a horse-and-buggy outlook toward world affairs. He was a deep-dyed isolationist.

In 1935 he tried to tie up the United States Navy so that it could never operate more than 300 miles off our shores.

While Hitler overran Europe, Dirksen was against selective service, lend-lease, and other safety measures.

When the war was over, Dirksen was soon back at his old stand. In January 1947, he tried to cut military appropriations. Ten months later, he changed his mind again. He was for strengthening the United States. The following year he was all-out for the Marshall plan and strengthening Europe.

Last year he reversed himself again. He said his vote for the Marshall plan was a mistake. This time, the reason for the latest flip-flop was obvious. Dirksen wanted the undivided support of the Republican Party in Illinois for his Senate ambition. That meant kowtowing to the Tribune.

We believe independent voters as well as great numbers of progressive Republicans will be easier in the mind if they support Mr. LUCAS. At least they know where Mr. LUCAS stands—and will continue to stand—on fundamental matters affecting every American's security.

A Water-Resources Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST W. McFARLAND

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 9 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement regarding a water-resources policy made by Alfred Shackelford, international representative of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, before the President's Water Resources Policy Commission in a hearing at Denver, Colo., in June 1950.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My name is Alfred Shackelford. I am an international representative of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (A. F. of L.) assigned to the State of Arizona. My home is in Tucson, Ariz. Our headquarters office of district 7, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (A. F. of L.), is 1201 Jones Street, Fort Worth, Tex. I report to W. L. Ingram, international vice president, at that address. In Arizona we have 21 IBEW local unions, representing more than 3,500 workers. District 7, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (A. F. of L.), comprises the States of Arizona, New Mexico, Texas, Oklahoma, and Kansas, and in that area there are 105 IBEW local unions.

My presentation to the President's Water Resources Policy Commission will be brief. In order to state clearly and concisely the position of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers with respect to some of the matters on the general subject of water resources policy, let me quote a statement issued May 25, 1950, by the international office of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 1200 Fifteenth Street NW., Washington, D. C.:

"In the interests of the commonweal there is no more pressing need than provision for flood control, irrigation, navigation, and the prevention of soil erosion.

"By reason of geography and the topography of the land such provision and prevention is necessarily and inescapably within the realm of Federal obligation.

"In the fulfillment of such obligation our Federal Government properly conceived the idea of utilizing hydropower for the purpose of generating electricity as a byproduct of soil conservation and irrigation. The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, A. F. of L., heartily endorsed and diligently supported the idea.

"However, in the interval since the inauguration of this program there have been developed and instituted procedures engendered by a false concept of the fundamentals of Americanism.

"The Rural Electrification Administration was brought into being for the purpose of facilitating the transmission of electricity into rural sections. Under the Government power program, however, the facilitating intent has been substituted for by a plan involving what could well be and assumes all the aspects of the first step in the evolution of governmental ownership of the generation, transmission, and sale of electricity to the individual consumers. Under this program the operations of the Rural Electrification Administration combined with the functioning of the Bureau of Reclamation, Department of the Interior, and the Army engineers, have extended the scope of the program to a point that threatens peril to legitimate free enterprise.

"The scope of the program now embraces the generation of electricity by power other than that procured through irrigation and flood control, steam as an instance; the distribution of electric power and the sale of electric power in direct competition with privately owned electric utility companies.

"The Rural Electrification Administration, through its financing of cooperatives, has proceeded to the extent of using public moneys supplied by the taxpayers for the building of electric transmission lines parallel to existing privately owned distribution systems. The progress of this procedure is such as to clearly indicate complete duplication of transmission facilities in competition that can only lead to extermination of private utility companies. Such complete extermination has been accomplished in the State of Tennessee and is rapidly approaching completion in the State of South Carolina and is making rapid progress in the State of Nebraska.

"In pursuing the above policy the Rural Electrification Administration has lowered the quality of work standards and ignored the rights of electrical workers to bargain collectively.

"The resulting situation is anomalous indeed. In the first instance while the fundamental policies of the Federal Government champion the rights of labor to organize and bargain collectively, the administration of the Rural Electrification completely ignores these rights of labor. In the second instance, one branch of Government is engaged in the prosecution of trusts and combines on the premise that the operation of such trusts is inimical to the commonweal. At the same time, a department of the Government is nurturing a governmental monopoly of the generation, distribution and sale of the greatest power man has mastered for industrial production, home necessities, and public convenience.

"The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers does not raise its voice on the subject of public power in behalf of private companies or their management. We have met the abuses of power by these companies in the past and have achieved substantial correction. Today 90 percent of the workers in the privately owned electric light and power industry are covered by union contracts and the IBEW itself represents more than 75 percent of the organized employees in this industry.

"The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers raises its voice on the subject of public power at this time in the interest of organized labor in the electric light and power industry. The subtle transformation of the Government program from the proper purposes of providing power as a byproduct of the initial program and of furnishing a yardstick for private utilities has reached the stage where it threatens free enterprise in this industry. We support free enterprise not only in our capacity as citizens of the United States but also in our capacity as representatives of organized labor. The increase in the area of Government and quasi-Government ownership operation of utilities necessarily carries with it a decrease in the area of freedom for labor as well as other groups.

"Labor cherishes its right to bargain collectively for wages, hours, and working conditions. It fights the abrogation of such rights whether in the form of antilabor laws or in the more complicated form of transferring their status to employees of the Government without any rights to bargain collectively or otherwise exercise their economic strength.

"The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has had drastic experience with the effect of its interests resulting from the transfer of utilities from private to public or quasi-public ownership.

"In a recent case where the ownership of a utility was transferred to a municipality the IBEW was deprived of collective bargaining rights by an order of the court even though the majority of voters of the municipality had enacted an ordinance requiring their officials to bargain with the union.

"Labor does not choose to have its welfare determined by the administrative orders of Government officials no matter how well intentioned they may purport to be.

"Under fascism, nazism and communism the people work for the state. Under the policies inaugurated by the Rural Electrification Administration those employed on electrical properties work for the Government under the guise of cooperatives. It is a distinction without a difference.

"That the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has been cognizant of these developments for some time was indicated by its expressed concern in 1948, when its international president, D. W. Tracy, in an address before the members of the Edison Electric Institute, in the course of his remarks said:

"I would not be talking heart to heart in a manner consistent with my expressed desire in my earlier remarks if I did not say: 'we need and must have more democracy in government and more democracy in business with less government interference in business and in labor. In an effort to prevent possible misunderstanding of my statement I emphasize the fact that the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers endorses, advocates, and defends the profit system. Call it capitalism, if you will, but the fact remains the system is an element of Americanism because it is the economic system of our land and has contributed to the higher standard of living in this country which at once becomes the envy and the hope of common people in foreign lands.'

"The international executive council of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers today endorsed the action of International President Tracy and unanimously subscribed to this public release in defense of freedom of labor, in defense of freedom of legitimate enterprise, the common-weal through safeguarding the elements of Americanism, against assault, by authoritarian or state power on the liberties that have identified America as the country where labor has an effective voice in the establishment of conditions of its employment."

With this statement as a background, we take the position that on all water resources projects:

1. The full rights of labor to bargain collectively should not be abridged in any manner whatsoever;

2. The sovereign rights of States should be respected by the Federal Government; compacts between States should be protected; State water laws should be observed; and, where there is a conflict of interest between the Federal Government and the States, the rights of the States should be given precedence by the Federal Government;

3. Regional authorities or administrations as are presently being proposed should be opposed;

4. All of the benefits, as stipulated by Congress, should exceed all of the costs with the Congress being the final authorizing agent;

5. Where power is produced, it should be sold at wholesale only at its competitive market price, without preference as to distributors, as between private or governmental distributors; it should be made available to all distributors in such manner as will not result in the Federal Government building transmission lines, but if it is absolutely necessary for the Government to build such lines to market power they shall not duplicate existing adequate lines, except where the owners of such lines will not cooperate with the Government; and, the Government should discontinue its program of using subsidized power to nationalize the power business;

6. Power should be used to help defray the cost of irrigation by an equitable plan that will result in maximum benefits to an area in terms of a sound economy;

7. The Federal Government should be required to pay to the States and their subdivisions the same taxes on the power facilities of projects as would be the case if the facilities were owned by private power companies; and

8. The policy should be so drawn as to put the Congress back into the business of making the laws of the land and not some administrative agency of the Federal Government.

Labor has as great a stake in what is done in determining water resources policy as any segment of our society. We appreciate very much the privilege and opportunity of presenting our views on these important matters to the Commission. We trust that our views will be accorded the full weight to which they are entitled in your deliberations as your report on water-resources policy is being prepared for the President.

Respectfully submitted.

ALFRED SHACKELFORD.

Public Utilities Admit Failure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 9 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a most enlightening article from the current issue of the Tennessee Valley Public Power Association News, official publication of the organization of municipal and cooperative distributors served by the TVA.

The article, entitled Private Utilities Admit Failure, makes some interesting disclosures concerning the efforts of the powerful power lobby, through its propaganda agents, to distort the facts about TVA, and to smear the agency with the brush of socialism.

There being no objection, the article was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRIVATE UTILITIES ADMIT FAILURE

(By N. W. Ayer & Son)

The most interesting document received in this office since the formation of the association comes from the most unexpected source. It is a report to the private utilities by their advertising agency, N. W. Ayer & Son. The report is based on a survey made by the Opinion Research Corp. to ascertain the public's attitude on TVA.

"To us, the TVA is a symbol of socialism, Government competition, bureaucracy, and waste. To the majority of the people, who have received much propaganda and little information on TVA, it is a symbol of progress.

"Some fewer people in 1949 approved of TVA than did in 1947 * * * but still, only 10 percent say they disapprove."

This is an admission that we never expected to see from the private utility lobby. In spite of the slurs of socialism and such contained in the quote, the closing 7 words of the quotation are very revealing. The report goes on to say that in 1947 a similar survey showed that 4 percent more people approved of TVA than they did in this report. In some respects this is one of the finest tributes ever paid to the Authority. In spite of the intense campaign of newspaper, radio, motion picture, and word-of-mouth propaganda, only 4 percent have been affected.

SMEAR CAMPAIGN

The report goes on to say, in an effort to explain the failure of the campaign: "It is apparent that to link our fight to the TVA question would run us into a lot of opposition, most of it based on lack of knowledge. But to link our fight to socialism is something else again. The people do not want socialism." The audacity of that admission is rather hard to comprehend. It simply says in so many words that you can't destroy TVA on the facts. You have got to resort to a smear campaign and call it socialism. It is doubtful that most of us in the valley directly concerned with the TVA program fully realized that TVA's record of accomplishment was so outstanding that even their bitterest opponents would admit that the program can't be destroyed simply by presenting the facts.

PRIVATE UTILITY EMPLOYEES APPROVE TVA

There are many interesting things in this report besides these already quoted. It is not our intention to burden you with too many quotes, but we do wish that we had sufficient copies of the report to send to every distributor of TVA power. One of the more interesting things is the fact that 45 percent of the private utility employees approve of TVA. Forty percent disapprove and 15 percent had no opinion. These people who should know the private utilities better than most anyone; these people who have been told times without number that TVA constitutes a threat to their job security; these people who are being told that TVA is a superstate, and socialistic, still approve the idea.

INTENT OF REPORT

Anyone would undoubtedly be puzzled over why such a report was released if it were not for the conclusions at the end of the report. Questions such as this are raised: "What can my company do to change the minds of the people in our communities?" It goes on to say that national advertising provides a persuasive background but doesn't supplement the individual's job. There is another question: "Are you using the mat service?—Is your local advertising program geared to the national program?" It is entirely apparent to anyone what these questions mean. It means a call for more money. It is a suggestion to redouble the efforts to destroy public confidence in the great Tennessee Valley program.

EVERY CHALLENGE MET

It has been our contention for quite some time that the private utilities would never rest until they had seriously damaged or changed the TVA set-up. As long as TVA is as outstandingly successful as it has been, it goes without saying that other sections of the country will demand such a regional development. This the private utilities figure they must stop at all costs. We know what we may expect. We have met every challenge that has been thrown at us so far. We are being attacked from many different points. We do not have the resources to meet 1 percent of the propaganda being thrown against us. Individual effort on the part of people of the valley by sending information such as this to friends and acquaintances outside the Tennessee Valley is the most effective way that we have at our command to tell the real truth about TVA. We do not have to resort to smear campaigns and name calling. We can stand on the facts and win. That is what their own advertising agency admits.

Time United States Replied to Vile Red Lies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT HALE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Bill Cunningham from the Boston Sunday Herald of August 6, 1950:

TIME UNITED STATES REPLIED TO VILE RED LIES

(By Bill Cunningham)

Who speaks for us, and what is he saying?

The charge coming in from important listening posts the world over is that we're suffering bigger and steadier losses in the field of propaganda than any yet suffered in the Korean fields of battle. For one thing, from powerful stations—especially Radio North Korea at Pyongyang—Russia is drenching the entire Asiatic world with the most violent and concentrated abuse the United States has yet received anywhere.

Nobody makes any effort to answer for us. The Russians have the air to themselves. Their lies go unanswered; their claims unchallenged. The peoples of China, India, the Philippines, Indochina, Burma, and even the Japanese are urged to unite against us as murderers and enslavers.

Their endless broadcasts beamed toward the southern Koreans are extremely cunning, and monitors are afraid they are very effective. Completely ignoring the fact that the northern Koreans are responsible for the invasion that started the fight, we are charged as the aggressors—the invaders.

Russia, they say, offers the Koreans peace, while we not only offer them war; we're making war upon them. Ignoring the United Nations, they charge the United States with having tried to divide Korea on the "traditional imperialist theory of 'divide and conquer.'" Russia stands by as a great and loving friend, hoping only that Koreans—meaning North Koreans—will be successful in freeing their entire nation of the American thieves who are trying to seize it, enslave its people and strip it of its wealth.

When victory comes, says this North Korea radio, a real all-Korean election will be held. In that great, glad day, says this monstrous instrument of perfidy, the only dastards not permitted to vote will be "pro-Americans, Japanese, and the insane." That latter is repeated over and over, and it's that that is so insidious, and is possibly so effective.

RELENTLESSLY HAMMERED INTO PEASANTS' MINDS

It hammers relentlessly into the minds of the peasants that any believers in the honest intentions of the United States are to be classed with Japanese, bitterly hated because of their long and ruthless occupation, and the mentally incompetent. It likewise hammers hard at the fact that even if we win, Korea will still be divided at the thirty-eighth parallel.

The Communists, it says, offer unity, the reuniting of the several halves, peace and restored prosperity under the mothering love of holy Russia, while what, it demands, are we offering? What are we even saying? Obviously, it tells these simple people, our tongues are still because our hands are red and our hearts are black.

But the answer, it says, can be had for the looking. The answer is in the native dead, the bomb-blackened cities of both North and South Korea, the crops that are trampled, the villages destroyed, the roads that have been mined, the costly and vital bridges that have been blown.

The fiery finish, of course, is the call to arise, to turn on the white man, join the freedom fighters from the north, kill the invader, spy on him, destroy his supplies, throw him, in short, back into the sea. This booms from the air endlessly, day and night.

We simply shoot and say nothing.

The hard truth of the matter is, we haven't much of any way to say anything. Forgetting Korea, to consider the Russian zones of influence as a whole, there's no way we can get an equal shot at the native ear. We make an effort of sorts through the Voice of America and we've recently activated a powerful "Radio Free Europe" in Germany.

These efforts presuppose the existence of personally owned short-wave receiving sets in the Communist countries and citizens brave enough to risk their lives to listen.

It further assumes that if they listen, they'll believe what they hear and be converted. That's a worthy, but a very vulnerable assumption.

The Russians, and their agent, however, take no such chances. Borrowing an idea from the Nazis, they have a public-address system in every village square and every citizen is required to listen to the daily government harangue. Many of these places, of course, have no newspapers. That's just as well because there are undoubtedly many who can't read. They all, however, can understand the spoken word. All get their daily treatments of the glory of communism and abuse of the capitalistic world, with special attention to us.

SYSTEM USED IN NAZI GERMANY

I saw this system being used in Germany in 1936. At regular intervals along the sidewalks of every important street, even in Berlin, loud speakers were installed on poles after the fashion of street lamps. Sometimes they were silent. They frequently played pleasant music, and not too loudly. But occasionally they'd thunder, "Achtung! Achtung," which means "Attention." Then everything and everybody stopped still in its tracks for that was the government speaking and every German was required to listen.

Every German was thereupon told whatever the "all high", or Herr Doktor Goebbels had in mind right then. These speakers were in every public place, indoors and out. It was a serious offense to turn one of them off. The Nazis took no chances upon the individual listener. They didn't depend upon a citizen's owning his own set.

The Russians are using that same system now, and there's no way we can break into it, hope to blanket it, or even to compete with it. We naturally can't originate, as the radio expression is, over their own facilities, and that's the only way we possibly could reach those loud speakers. We have to gamble on secret reception, dared at risk of imprisonment or death. There may be some of that in the iron-curtain countries. There may possibly be some inside Russia, itself, but it stands to reason that few of the peasants of China, say, have the funds to own and maintain a radio set.

Russia has the full advantage in the back areas of the earth and is endeavoring at the moment to exploit it to the uttermost. There seems to be no way we can compete with it, but we at least should clearly understand what is being done to us.

Over in the other direction, the newest and most intelligent move yet is the so-called Crusade for Freedom recently announced "to combat communism." This is backed by a powerful committee representing national leaders of all faiths and fields, with Gen. Lucius D. Clay as its national chairman.

Its prospectus says: "The Communists are trying hard to make the world think we started the Korean war and that we are a Nation of imperialist warmongers out to conquer the world. It is vitally important that we step up our campaign of truth to blast this false propaganda—to demonstrate before the world our true aims of freedom and friendship for all peoples. * * *"

This goes on to announce what amounts to a national campaign next month to have millions of Americans sign a statement of belief in the cause of world freedom. The symbol of this freedom is to be a great freedom bell, after the idea, apparently, of the Liberty Bell. This 10-ton bell, 8 feet high, has already been cast in England, and is intended for installation in Berlin.

FIRST STEP IN WORLD CAMPAIGN

The dedication, given deep religious significance, will be the first step in the world-wide campaign to establish the ideals of America before the world. The first peal of the new bell will be broadcast world-wide by radio and will be the signal for all church, schoolhouse, city hall and all other sorts of bells to ring all over the Christian world.

"Later," it says, "consideration will be given to the casting of a similar bell for erection in Korea, to ring for freedom in the eastern world."

That's beautiful, and all, but that's not exactly any sure-fire plan for winning native souls from the gloating Russian Satan.

On the point 4 front, they're outselling us completely through what amounts to a mechanical monopoly. But how about the other fronts, the fronts we can reach, and, especially, the most important and most accessible of all fronts at the moment—the tremendous sounding board of that United Nations meeting with the Russian in the chair?

It seems perfectly obvious by now why Comrade Malik returned. Russia called off the boycott and ordered him back to stall, argue, abuse, and dissemble, first, to delay in every possible way further United Nations procedure while the Communists shoot their all for quick victory in Korea, and, secondly, to use his chairmanship as an excuse to preach the twisted Russian gospel officially to the Asiatic, and all the rest of the Russian-fearing world.

His deliberately carpentered lies and his cold abuse of the United States synchronize perfectly with the propaganda broadcasts from that North Korean radio. Here's a man who definitely does speak for his government and who definitely says what it wants him to say. His story is monstrous. He's nothing but a liar, and so is his government, but that is their coldly calculated stand before the world, and for the record.

And who speaks for us, and what does he say?

So far as that body is concerned, our gentleman is the Honorable Warren Austin, and in terms of the ground the Russian Malik is covering, our Mr. Austin hasn't said anything. Every man in the room knows the Russian is lying. There isn't any difficulty in getting the votes necessary to slap down his loaded contentions and proposals. His only support comes from the controlled Russian lickspittles—and, strangely enough, India, a queer people at best.

But why haven't we seized the same opportunity to give the world our message, our side of the story?

Why hasn't our Mr. Austin, instead of accepting the defensive, instead of merely counterpunching, as we say in pugilism, hauled off and slugged the big Russian oaf from the tacks in his heels?

WE'VE FAILED TO DENOUNCE THE VILE LIES

This mouthy apostle of the international anti-Christ has denounced and abused our Nation by name. He's charged us before the world with deceit, treachery, untruth, and murder. In complete perversion of the facts as all the free world knows them, he has charged that we deliberately attacked Korea because we itched for a war, instead of the truth there on the record before him—that we moved only to try to enforce an official ruling of the Council he's now presiding over, and only with that Council's blessing and backing.

The whole of the civilized world is on record against him. The minutes of all the past meetings contradict every word he utters. Yet, ignoring the term "United Nations" entirely, he, in the name of Russia, stands there vilifying the name of the United States, verbally defiling the grave of every American soldier, and directly insulting us all with every foul word he utters.

And where is our answer?

It's apparently choked somewhere in the gullet of Warren Austin, or possibly the Honorable Dean Acheson, because it's taken for granted that Mr. Austin says only what he's told to, too. The telling must come from the State Department, because that's our official control station for foreign affairs. It's got to be Mr. Acheson and/or President Truman. That's the top echelon.

We haven't even mentioned Russia by name. Maybe that should be written, "dared mention Russia by name." Are we afraid? That's the impression we must be selling the Russians, and that can be a fatal impression.

The forthright stand for the United States, as an agent of the United Nations, is to charge Russia officially, and by name, with having broken United Nations law by arming, training, then ordering the Korean Communists to defy the United Nations mandate in Korea. We should demand that Russia forthwith be tried as an international criminal, and we should have challenged the right of Malik even to preside at this meeting of the Council.

We then should go ahead with our present preparation and in the meanwhile tell Russia that we've had all her lies, her abuse, her double dealing and chicanery the Western World intends to take. We should tell her the lie she's trying to establish concerning Korea is disproved, sadly enough for us, by what's happened out there. If we'd deliberately started that trouble, we'd certainly have had, at least, something on hand to see it through.

We should remind the Kremlin—the world listening—that although we've looked bad in Korea because we made the mistake of trusting Russia and weren't prepared for Korea, we are powerfully prepared for the kind of war Russia will be inviting if she takes another step toward us. That's with a mighty air force of intercontinental bombers, that can freight the atomic bomb, and which will—without notice.

We should inform our late allies that, while we cut back our Navy, we didn't sink the ships. We've got a great fighting fleet that could be refloated. There are plenty of aircraft carriers. We, or no nation on earth, could mass the manpower necessary to occupy Russia, but we don't want Russia. All we want is for Russia to leave us alone, and one certain way to make sure of that, would be to bomb it to rubble and leave it to rot.

But who speaks for us? The professionally prissy Mr. Acheson. Or has our President lost his tongue? He was cocky enough when he made that "nonpolitical" tour out to the Grand Coulee Dam back there in May. I remember particularly because I saw him in Chicago at that great revival the local politicians held.

He was full of fight then—but the potential enemy was only a lot of mythical Republicans.

Mr. Truman was full of fight the other day—but it was fight against a fallen brother, a Democratic Representative named PRIEST, who, hard-pressed at the edge of a primary election, said he thought Secretaries Acheson and Johnson ought to resign. Millions of, maybe most, Americans agree with him, but the President took occasion next day to hurl a rebuke at him, and then assured the Nation, and the world, that the Messrs. Acheson and Johnson will remain in office as long as he, Mr. Truman, does.

That makes them one with that beloved military hero, Gen. Harry Vaughan—and by the way, whatever happened to him, except that he's still attached to the public udder? There was never a time in history when one who formerly said so much has recently said so little. In fact, he's been mute ever since the deep freezers and the molasses came back to haunt him.

The President will stand up for his friends, an admirable trait under certain circumstances, but when will he start to stand up for his Nation? It's being blackguarded and vilified in the ears of the world, deliberately lied about and placed through its very silence, on the defensive. After watching Mr.

Austin, I have some personal doubts about his being the proper person to serve as the mouthpiece. He lost his temper pretty clearly in the proceedings the other day, and while that's understandable, it's likewise a sign of weakness. The British representative, Sir Gladwin Jebb, does the more professional job. He drives the cold steel with a disarming smile.

It's not yet too late. Malik has succeeded in stalling action for exactly a week, giving the North Koreans that much more time. At last reports, however, they hadn't won the victory, and the Security Council goes back into session on Tuesday. The United States should go in then strictly on the offensive, take no more back talk, demand that Malik hold to the facts, or give up the gavel, charge Russia by name as an international criminal and demand that the case go on trial. There's no other policy consistent with honor, courage, and truth.

Some Views on Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, granted by the House, I include therein a statement on the subject of inflation.

I recommend it to my colleagues in view of the present situation in the world, and especially the condition of our own domestic economy.

The specter of inflation is again spreading its deadly wings over our fair land. With a consumer's price level already 44 percent higher than 1946, when a Republican Congress had temporarily halted inflation and the average wage level in manufacturing industries only 30 percent higher, we face an ever-widening gap between what a man earns and what he has to spend to maintain his 1946 standard of living. This gap will widen if our money is further cheapened to pay for this war in Korea.

When the Democrats went off the gold standard in 1934 they unhitched the dollar from gold. Not only did the Government confiscate 41 percent of the gold value of every dollar in circulation on January 31, 1934, but it made it unlawful to buy gold with dollars. So that raising the price of gold in dollars became meaningless as an effort to raise commodity prices. As the gears were changed to increase the speed of the driving wheels in relation to the speed of the engine, at the very same time the driving shaft was disconnected. We have had a free-wheeling dollar ever since, which has fluctuated absolutely independently of the price the Government pays for gold.

Prices did not rise as expected by the amount we had raised the price of gold which was 59 percent. Instead by 1940 the wholesale price index stood at 78.6 as compared with 74.9 in 1934, only a 5 percent increase. In 1941, however, they had jumped to 87.3, a 140 percent increase in 1 year over the increase of the entire previous 6 years. At present they stand at 163.0, an 87 percent increase over 1941. The reason prices shot up in 1941 was due to the sale of war bonds. These acted just like money and this increased the velocity of the circulating medium in relation to the velocity of the movement of goods. This spells inflation. The purchasing power of the dollar is cheapened and all persons on fixed incomes, all holders of bonds, life-insurance policies, all pensioners, in fact all persons except the labor racketeers who hold the public up for wage increases and the commodity and stock-market gamblers, who profit in each price rise, suffer a set-back in their standard of living.

The other day we received advice from two sources. One was that veteran adviser, Mr. Bernard Baruch. The other was the President's Economic Advisory Council. Their advice was miles apart. Mr. Baruch proposed that we establish drastic controls that would prevent further inflation as a result of the Government spending necessary to defend ourselves against Russian aggression. He wanted us to raise taxes "higher than a cat's back." The President's Economic Advisory Council, however, saw no need for such drastic controls and this is reflected in the President's recommendation that only about half of the $10,000,000,000 he requests, should be raised by taxes.

Opposed as I am to high taxes, I am more strongly opposed to inflation. Unless we raise taxes and cut out unnecessary Government expenses to fight this war we must further inflate the currency and this may in our present condition bring on an inflationary spiral that would lead us down the road to disaster.

I am perfectly familiar with the economic philosophy of the President's Economic Advisory Council. It is the philosophy of the expanding economy. This is just a fancy way of saying "inflation." As I have shown, wage increases have lagged behind price increases since 1946. And under our present free-wheeling dollar they must continue to lag, because each increase in wages is immediately reflected in an increase in prices. The dog never catches his tail. The gentlemen who advise the President, however, are like the man who wants to increase his volume of business in order to offset his net loss on each item he sells. If we are lagging 14 percent behind 1946 today in real wages, let us inflate and inflate and boost and boost both wages and prices, they advise, until in some mythical future year with ever-mounting prices we will have reached a total national income of $500,000,000,000 per year. It makes no difference to these gentlemen whether our larger national income involves a 14-percent loss in real wages on every dollar we earn. We will all be making more money, even though we will be spending still more to live. In that path lies national bankruptcy.

I cannot go along with the President's program of inadequate measures of control over prices and wages. The time to freeze the inflationary spiral, that will surely follow our appropriations of $10,000,000,000 and the many billions more that must inevitably follow to finance the war against communism, is not 6 months from now, but now.

We owe it to the farmer, to the worker, to the businessman, to the school teacher, and others on fixed incomes to assure them that their dollar in 1951 will purchase just as much as it does in 1950—not 14 percent less but just as much. The only way in which we can assure them that further inflation will not set in, is to tax as we spend, establish adequate controls over prices and wages and freeze our economy in its present position for the duration of this emergency be it 10 months or 10 years.

Do not imagine that Mr. Stalin is acting blindly in waging this satellite war of aggression in Korea. Do not imagine that he is goading the Chinese Communists to invade Formosa, despite our warning, without a purpose. Do not imagine that he is rattling the saber in Berlin, Iran, and Bulgaria just for the fun of it. Mr. Stalin knows that the greatest test for this Nation at any time is not on the battlefield, severe as that may be and may still become. Mr. Stalin is fighting our American way of life. That way of life, that high standard of living which we have reached, once it begins to totter will invite every Communist rat in this country out of his hole to gnaw at the vitals of our weakened economic body. It is here, thanks to Mr. Stalin, that the ultimate victory of communism can best be achieved. While our boys are fighting the North Koreans and the 10,000,000 Communists in China, we must not permit inflation to undermine the American system. The American dollar is the symbol of our economic strength just as the American flag is the symbol of our military strength and national honor. If our dollar loses more of its real value, in an upward spiral of inflation, then the flag must inevitably dip in ignominious salute to the Reds. We are fighting communism to maintain our way of life. But that way of life can be easily undermined, our standard of living can drop and drop, as it has already in the last 4 years, unless we plug every crack in the dike against the disastrous flood of inflation.

Our Little Helpers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following pertinent article from the Washington Star by Constantine Brown, one of the Nation's foremost writers on international affairs:

WILL THE NEXT NATION TO BE ATTACKED BE ONE THAT SENT REGRETS ON KOREA?

(By Constantine Brown)

The real testing ground of the United Nations today is not at Lake Success. It is on the beaten-up peninsula of Korea.

Conceived in high hope, the United Nations was founded on a determination to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war and to defend the equal rights of nations large and small.

The United States took a leading role in this magnificent conception. The United States, never an aggressor nation, has taken a lead role in trying to make this conception a fact of life in the world. With patience, even if not always with best judgment or soundest wisdom, the United States, or more importantly the American people, has tried to guide this collective effort in the direction of peace.

There has been one recalcitrant nation, Soviet Russia. Working out of a pattern which was clear even before the United Nations was founded, Russia has followed a policy of aggression, of conquest and even of genocide in the envelopment of neighboring nations and peoples. It is confirmation, perhaps, of the stated ideals and objectives of the United States that Russia during the postwar years has recognized and publicized our country as its real target.

Aggression in Korea was a Soviet move, a calculated gamble that peace-loving America would not react to a point of armed intervention. If Moscow had been right it could have ridiculed the softness of purpose of the United States, played to advantage the propaganda line that America was a friend only of the great western powers. But Moscow lost as the United States threw its resources of blood and steel into defense of a weak little republic far removed from the perimeter of our own territorial or economic interests.

WE SHOWED THE WAY

In so doing, the United States showed the way to the United Nations to make this cause a collective one, one which could serve to hearten many other nations who live today too close to the shadow of the iron curtain. It led and it joined the United Nations in calling upon the other member nations, large and small, to do their respective shares in this effort.

There was no thought in this country that ours would not be the major effort, that we would not supply most of the manpower, most of the money and most of the material. We have reached out in the past 5 years to assume the major burden of rehabilitating and strengthenening the free world.

But this endeavor has been far from a selfish one, and when an overwhelming majority of the United Nations accepted the challenge of aggression in Korea we had reason to expect that there would be friends on the firing line as well as at the message centers.

To date the results have been disappointing. Elements of air and naval strength of other nationalities have appeared in the combat zone, a few promises have been received of ground troops to come, a scattering of other offers have been acknowledged and some regrets have been filed.

Today American men are dying in Korea and new billions of American dollars are being ploughed into the armaments of war, the vitals of defense of others as well as of ourselves.

STRENGTH HAS LIMIT

Perhaps it is presumptuous to lecture the other free nations on what they should do. But it is not inappropriate to point out to them that the United States is not a bottomless reservoir of military and economic strength, that our astounding success in placing fighting men in a far off field in a matter of days and weeks is not matched by promises of the men of other nations in 3 months or a year, and that the American people are being confronted constantly with the persuasive suggestion that we might more profitably and justifiably concentrate on conserving and strengthening our own internal defenses and economy.

Tomorrow some other nation of the free world may be the target of Soviet aggression. If such happens, the victim can look nowhere but to the United States for aid. Will it be a nation that offered and speeded all it could to the collective effort in Korea? Or will it be one that expressed regrets?

The WCTU and the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AIME J. FORAND
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the Richmond (Va.) Times-Dispatch of Monday, August 7, 1950. The editorial follows:

THE WCTU AND THE WAR

It is hardly surprising that the energetic ladies of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union already are urging, in the light of the Korean crisis, that legislation be passed to curb liquor sales in the vicinity of Army posts.

Mrs. D. Leigh Colvin, national president of the organization, says: "Our boys are entitled to protection from brass hats and politicians who seem to think that booze, immorality, and gambling are essential to military morale."

Reasonable regulations to control the recreational activities of men in the armed services are, of course, greatly to be desired. At the same time, one may be pardoned a bit of skepticism concerning the program of control which the WCTU might be expected to favor.

For the word "temperance," as used as part of the name of that organization, doesn't mean "temperance" at all; it means absolute prohibition. The WCTU wants prohibition of all forms of alcohol, and is evidently not concerned with the fact that the "noble experiment," of fragrant memory, failed utterly to prohibit when it was on the statute books, and merely produced a huge new crop of lawbreakers, hypocrites, and grafters.

The WCTU would, if it could, prevent every man in uniform from having so much as one glass of beer on leave. If this organization really believed in temperance, as the word is commonly understood and defined, that would be important. Temperance is one of the most desirable of the virtues, and one of the most essential places for its cultivation is in the use of alcohol, for overindulgence in alcohol has produced a vast amount of misery. Unfortunately, this sort of temperance is not to be found in the lexicon of the WCTU.

Of course, all Mrs. Colvin and her compatriots are saying at the moment is that our boys in the Army camps should be "protected." What they really have in the back of their minds is the "protection" of everybody through the enactment of another prohibition law.

In contrast to this program there is that of the Temperance and Tolerance Association of America, founded by a former leader in the WCTU, Mrs. Ida M. Thurber. Mrs. Thurber had been a WCTU leader for nearly half a century when she decided in 1944 that she could not go along with that organization in its campaign for State-wide prohibition in her State of Nebraska. She concluded that prohibition was an evil, and she took an active part in fighting the effort to bring it back.

Despite her nearly 50 years' work for temperance, she was expelled from the WCTU. So she founded the Temperance and Tolerance Association of America, with headquarters in Lincoln, Nebr. Among those active in it are the Reverend Alson J. Smith, a Methodist minister, and the Reverend Harold J. Hamilton, a Baptist. The organization says it has members in 46 States.

Its program is far more realistic and sensible than that of the WCTU and its allies. Temperance, in the true sense, and tolerance are goals for which every citizen of good will should strive. Prohibition can only be a malignant farce.

Voice of America: Is It Effective?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted by the House to extend my remarks, I include therein the statement appearing in the Evening Star of Washington for August 7, 1950, by Julius Epstein.

It is difficult to believe that the Voice of America withholds facts because they might be offensive to Russia, but such is the contents of the article I am inserting herewith, by one who knows something of the subject:

SOFT-SPEAKING VOICE

I want to express my gratitude to The Star for David Lawrence's column of July 18, on the ineffectiveness of our psychological warfare.

Mr. Lawrence is certainly dead right when he states that the absolute incompetence of our Voice of America cannot be explained by lack of funds. I agree completely with him when he says: "But the truth is that even if $100,000,000 is appropriated, it would be ineffective if our Government fails to express itself forthrightly in the propaganda field." I want to contribute a recent example of what he is talking about.

A few weeks ago, Count Joseph Czapski visited the United States. He is not only a great Polish writer and a good painter, but also one of the very few survivors of the mass slaughter of more than 15,000 Polish officers during World War II on Russian soil. He was invited to address the Polish people through our Voice of America. When he submitted the draft of his speech to the New York office of the Voice, he was advised to omit any mention of Katyn, where many of the Polish officers had been slain.

This fits perfectly the answer I was given by high officials of the Voice and the State Department when I inquired some months ago, why the Voice did not broadcast the speech delivered by our former ambassador to Poland, Arthur Bliss Lane, and his letter to Russian Foreign Minister Vishinsky, both issued at the occasion of the formation of the American Committee for the Investigation of the Katyn Massacre, Inc. Those gentlemen told me: "It would create too much hatred of Stalin among the Poles."

I asked the gentlemen of the Voice: "What do you want to create among the Poles? Love for Stalin, at the expense of the American taxpayer?" There was no answer to this question.

There are still too many of the old OWI (Office of War Information) employees working for the Voice, both in this country and overseas. I mean those writers, translators and broadcasters who so wholeheartedly and enthusiastically tried for many years to create "love for Stalin," when this was the official policy of our ill-advised wartime Government and of our military government in Germany. There is no doubt that all those employees were at that time deeply convinced of the absolute correctness of that pro-Stalinist propaganda. How can we expect them to do the exact opposite now?

Even if they try to do the impossible—they certainly do not want to lose their well-paid jobs—they cannot change their skin and speak with the same power of persuasion against the bloody monster in the Kremline as they spoke for so many years in its favor, when they ardently tried to sell the story of our "gallant ally," the "democratic and peace-loving Stalin."

As long as the officials of our Voice of America are afraid "to create hatred against Stalin," the real embodiment of evil on earth, and as long as those old friends of Stalin, now in the disguise of weak anti-Stalinists, are allowed to run the show, no good can come from it and the money spent on that enterprise is wasted.

Modern Success Story

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, attached hereto is an article from the August 7 issue of my home town newspaper, the Greenville Piedmont, Greenville, S. C., which recalls the Horatio Alger stories of long ago. I should like to make it a part of my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

It has been my privilege to know "Gene" Stone and his family through the years and I can personally vouch for his outstanding record. This is another example that there are still opportunities in this great country of ours under its system of free enterprise. Frequently I go through the Greenville plant with Mr. Stone, and have been impressed with the friendly relationship existing between him and his many faithful employees. We have few labor problems. If others would emulate Eugene Stone and his associates then contentions and dissensions would eventually disappear. I am honored to bring you, my colleagues, this interesting and inspiring story:

GREENVILLE INDUSTRY—STONE'S IS MODERN SUCCESS STORY—COOPERATION BETWEEN MANAGEMENT AND EMPLOYEES KEYSTONE OF SUCCESS

(By Leonard Turnbull)

Trillions of stitches make millions of sunsuits, ladies' slips, aprons, men's woven shorts, pinafores, creepers, western shirts, and pants every year for the Stone Manufacturing Co., of Greenville.

The local industry drives for production on an assembly-line basis. As President Eugene Stone III explains it, "We're in a highly competitive business. We've got to do things better and faster than the other man."

Today Stone Manufacturing Co. has spread outside Greenville. In addition to two sewing plants and a warehouse here, the firm has a sewing plant in Columbia. Over 1,200 workers run over 1,000 machines from 8 a. m. to 5 p. m., 5 days a week.

Gene Stone was 24 years old back in 1933 in the rough days of the depression. Yet on July 9, 1933, the young man had confidence enough to open a plant at 154 River Street, employing five workers.

Jersey bloomers and cotton slips were the only clothing varieties offered by the Stone firm during the first years of trial. Young Gene went on the road, selling all the bloomers and slips his struggling firm could produce.

By a policy of consistently adding machines each year and increasing employees, Mr. Stone expanded his organization. He built up a sales organization throughout the South, "and in a few years nationally."

ANOTHER EXPANSION

In 1942, the Stone firm moved from River Street to the present plant on East Court. The American Cigar factory there had decided to call it quits in Greenville.

A total of 200 machines were set up in the new plant. Workers made these hum.

Another enlargement came when the firm bought a plant at River and Cox Streets. Cutting many strips of cloth at a time is done here. The cutting plant has been enlarged twice in the last 2 years.

Three years ago marked the construction of a plant at Webster and Calvin Streets that frankly is the apple of Gene Stone's eyes. This model plant is air-conditioned, "and is the last word for this section," Mr. Stone said.

All testing and trying out of new numbers is carried out at the new plant. Its 250 workers "see what is best and the most efficient manner of making it. All equipment is brand new," Mr. Stone said.

Finally, for Greenville, there is a warehouse off Buncombe behind the Piedmont Shirt Co. Here garments are stored which are fabricated off season like sun suits which are switching styles right now, the executive added.

AT COLUMBIA CAPACITY

The plant in Columbia was purchased 3 years ago, brand new. A garment manufacturer had become worried over a minor recession in the business at that time. Stone took over with over 200 workers under the direction of Miss Quincy Coggins of Greenville. "Now we've reached capacity of production and have got to expand," Mr. Stone said.

The life of Mr. Stone is the story of a young man made good. He was born in Spartanburg, moving here in 1918. He attended Fishburn Military School in Virginia, Georgia Tech, and the University of South Carolina. He started his business here shortly after schooling. His firm's expansion tells the rest about the man classed by Life magazine as one of the South's millionaires.

Sun suits for children is the main fare for the firm. It is known as one of the largest manufacturers in the world of such. Approximately 25,000 dozen different garments are produced each week by the company.

A trip through the East Court Street plant proves the high production element stressed. Women employees have their own individual machines. "That's why we can't run but one shift a day—a girl gets used to her machine and doesn't want anyone else to run it."

Sewing machines buzz like king-sized bumble bees. Stitches are taken at the rate of 5,000 per minute with the super-fast sewers. The average housewife has a slow poke in her average home machine by comparison.

NOTHING IS WASTED

Workers are on the piece-work basis. "They'd have it no other way," Mr. Stone explains. Nothing is wasted, i. e., cloth strips are turned into slip straps, etc.

Buttons are put on in one operation. Another worker turns a buzzing machine loose on making button holes in one operation, including the cutting. Another sews in fast half moons (ask the average woman how hard it is to sew a curve).

Through all the Stone organization there is a feeling of cooperation—of everyone working together. They have to—workers become expert on one operation. Another worker takes the phase to the next step, and on up until sun suits, slips, and the like are ready to be boxed up and shipped to all points of the compass.

Another big help for unity of spirit is building up of a recreational area for workers above Caesar's head. Over 1,000 acres there are fast becoming a beautiful network of roads, four artificial lakes filled with crystal-clear water, playgrounds, picnic areas, and everything for a good outing.

NOT ONE-MAN OUTFIT

Workers can go up any time. It's free. Mr. Stone recently was told, "I can't believe you have made such a beautiful spot out of a wilderness, but you certainly have."

Stone Manufacturing Co. isn't a one-man outfit by any means. A brother, Ward Stone, does most of the purchasing and handles upkeep of property. Mrs. Juanita Young, one of the first employees, is in charge of all Greenville plants.

Machinist Bright Few is priceless for giving an edge on competitors with new machine parts made in his plant shop. Then there's a "whale of a lot" of workers who receive service awards each year for service up to 5, 10, and 15 years with the firm.

Cotton Crop for 1950 36 Percent Below 1949

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, August 9 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Cotton Crop for 1950 36 Percent Below 1949" by John W. Ball, published in today's issue of the Washington Post.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COTTON CROP FOR 1950 36 PERCENT BELOW 1949

(By John W. Ball)

The Crop Reporting Board yesterday broke the bad news that this year's cotton crop will be 36 percent less than last year, and about 3,000,000 bales—or about one-third—short of normal domestic requirements.

The shortage resulted from a confused cotton acreage allocation law passed late last year. Varying interpretations put upon its provisions in different States resulted in only about 18,678,000 acres being planted instead of about 21,000,000 its authors promised.

NO SHORTAGE SEEN

Cotton experts last night said there was little danger of an acute shortage, however. Heavy carry-overs from the 1948 and 1949 crops, totaling about 7,000,000 bales, are considered ample to meet all foreseeable demands. Normal requirements are for about 9,000,000 bales for domestic consumption, and 5,000,000 for export.

The estimate was for 10,308,000 bales, or 5,820,000 bales less than the 16,128,000 bales harvested last year.

New York futures shot up as much as $8.45 a bale (500 pounds) before profit taking trimmed the gain. They closed from $4.15 to $4.50 a bale above Monday's close. New Orleans spot cotton closed $4.05 a bale higher than on Monday.

At the same time, the Agriculture Department revealed that Government price-support loans and Government inventories of cotton have melted like snow in the last few weeks.

Out of 3,190,150 bales of 1949 cotton that had been put under Government price-support loans, more than 2,600,000 have been redeemed. On July 27 only 500,637 bales were under loan, and at least a third of these have been redeemed since that date, officials estimated.

BALES UNDER LOAN

A total of 5,271,000 bales of 1948 cotton were put under loan. Farmers redeemed 1,490,000 bales. The Government placed the remainder, 3,781,369 bales, in a pool. By July 26, the Government had sold 612,169 bales of the pooled 1948 cotton. Since that time sales have been held every other day. Estimates last night were that total sales now may reach 1,500,000 bales, leaving only about 1,600,000 on hand.

Total Government investments in cotton, which on April 30 were about a billion dollars, are expected to have declined to about one-third of that figure.

The cotton-pooling law, which operates on a heads-I-win, tails-you-lose formula, was put through Congress during the war by the potent cotton-State lawmakers. When World War II broke out, the Commodity Credit Corporation had tremendous stocks of cotton it had bought to maintain prices between 1935 and 1941. It sold this cotton, largely to other Government agencies, at a substantial profit.

Now, however, when the Government forecloses a price-support loan on cotton, it must pool that cotton. Each bale is stored with the grower's name attached. If CCC sells the cotton at a profit, even to another Government agency, it must return the profit to the original grower, even though he gave up possession of it through foreclosure of the loan, years before. If, however, the Government should sell the pooled cotton at a loss, the Government must assume the loss.

Will the Korean War Teach Us a Lesson in Foreign Policy?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the Korean situation today is a direct outgrowth of the policy of the Democratic administration which had its inception in the recognitzion of Soviet Communist Russia in 1933.

At that point, on November 17, 1933, a date which must go down in history as an infamous landmark which changed the course of our great Nation, the socialistic planners of America began to bore from within setting in motion the forces which took us into the alliance with Russia during the last war and prodded our leaders into the series of agreements and treaties which perpetuated the strength and growth of communism through Russian expansion, and set the stage for the present American dilemma.

Never in history has the leadership of a great Nation demonstrated such complete failure to protect and safeguard the interests of the people through lack of ability and judgment at the best—or deliberate nefarious motivation at the worst.

During the last war, there were voices raised in protest against our alliance with Communist Russia, there were protests against our enormous lend-lease program which supplied Russia with materials for war and which sent American technicians to train Russians in the methods of mass production without which no Nation could hope to produce the tools for a world-wide conflict.

But these voices were brushed aside by the administration and labeled traitorous as giving comfort to the enemy. And the aid to Russia continued.

Today the results of our alliance with the nation termed by the administration as "democratic Russia" are apparent. We are faced with a struggle for survival in which every citizen may be required to surrender a portion of his personal liberty, to make sacrifices, even to face loss of life itself, if America is to survive.

And the greatest tragedy of all is the fact that is now finally starkly apparent to every American. The fact that this could have been avoided, should have been avoided, and would have been avoided if we had had competent leadership in our Nation.

Even now with the complete failure of our State Department to conduct an aggressive foreign policy which could have brought lasting peace out of our victory in 1945, we find the Chief Executive condoning every mistake and challenging all criticism with a flat statement that the present leadership in the State Department and in other branches of the administration shall remain unchanged as long as he holds the Presidency.

For the blunders of the State Department and of the executive branch of the Government, American boys are dying in far-off Korea. And the average American citizen now asks, when will the blunders end? How can we win a war of global proportions, if that comes, when we must depend upon the same men to lead us, men who have already proven that they have neither sound judgment nor ability, and have consistently failed to profit from experience?

The administration's blunders in the Korean affair are now self-evident. Russia, after staying neutral in the war against Japan, was permitted to declare herself an ally of the United States in that conflict for a total period of 6 days for which she gaind in return and with the full consent of the administration a foothold in China and Korea.

President Truman agreed to the division to Korea at the thirty-eighth parallel with Russia occupying the northern sector. That total communization of northern Korea would result could not have been a surprise to Mr. Truman. Nor could he have expected anything less than the development of a puppet state in northern Korea which could be expected in the future to respond to the will of the Kremlin.

After this initial Korean blunder, others followed with alarming regularity. Our foreign policy in China, or rather our complete lack of one, resulted in the fall of all China to the hands of Communist troops. The State Department took no action to deter communism in China, and President Truman early this year announced that the United States would not become involved in the civil conflict in China.

Danger signals were flashing in Korea but the administration declined to heed their warning. In July of 1949, Congress voted $10,230 000 for military aid to the Republic of Korea. Under the administration only $200 worth of supplies were actually sent.

On June 13 of this year, William C. Foster, Deputy Administrator of the Economic Cooperation Administration, further declared the administration's attitude concerning Korea when he testified before the Senate Appropriations Committee as follows:

> I am happy to tell the Appropriations Committee, that, in my judgment, the trend of events in South Korea is more favorable than it has been at any time since the liberation of that country in 1945.
>
> The reasons for optimism are military, political, and economic. It is my considered opinion that in the face of great difficulty the government of the Republic of Korea is now steadily gaining in each of these three sections.
> A rigorous training program has built up a well disciplined army of 100,000 soldiers; one that is prepared to meet any challenge by North Korean forces.

On June 25, just 12 days after Mr. Foster made this statement before the Appropriations Committee, the North Korean Communist forces attacked South Korea sweeping the defenders before them. The South Koreans had no adequate arms to meet the invaders. Arms for which funds were appropriated by Congress were never sent to Korea. They were not sent because the administration disregarded the action of Congress and made no effort to deliver them to the Korean Republic for defense against an invasion.

At the same time the administration made serious errors in the maintenance of our own Armed Forces, errors which have resulted in our defeats on the Korean battlefront. Reduction in our Marine Corps—which incidentally was saved from extinction by the Eightieth Congress—was a serious error. The scuttling of our Navy and our naval air force was another.

The lack of sufficient carrier-based planes and planes specifically designed for use in conjunction with ground troops and in support of them during combat have seriously handicapped our fighting forces and has been responsible at least in part for our military reverses.

No one can doubt the final outcome of the Korean war. We will win. But it will be costly. American boys who can never be considered expendable by the American people will be sacrificed. Our resources and material assets will be drained.

Victory in Korea may not bring any decisive results. It is probable that even if we go beyond the thirty-eighth parallel to the northernmost boundary of Korea, a free election may result in a Korean Communist government. This will be a defeat of the purpose and intention of the American people.

It is also becoming more evident that recognition of Communist China by the United Nations in spite of the protest of the United States will be Russia's price tag for temporary peace in Asia. If this recognition becomes a fact, then our efforts in Korea will have been in vain and the final results the same as if this Nation had never entered the war.

So long as the threat of aggression remains, we must prepare for our defense, and as a result of this preparation, our economy will be changed, our standard of living lowered to what extent no one can foresee, and our liberty will be curtailed for an indefinite period which has been estimated by some at not less than 10 years.

These are the results of incompetent leadership in our Nation. We cannot rectify past errors, but we can, and must, prevent their recurrence.

We must have competent leadership in our Government now. This is as important as the need for more men in uniform, control of vital materials, and regulation of national economy.

If the Executive refuses to dismiss men who have blundered and lost the confidence of the American people, it is then necessary that Congress assume leadership in behalf of the American people. As the representatives of the people, the Members of Congress must produce legislation which will solve the problems we now face as a result of the miscalculations of the administration, and which at the same time safeguard our American principles of liberty and individual freedom.

This is a big job, but it must be done effectively by Congress if our Nation is to survive the outside aggression of communism and the onslaught of socialistic planners at home.

Panic Buying and Hoarding

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 9 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, within the past several weeks there has been a rather frantic buying of lumber and other building materials, which has resulted in rather panicky conditions in that entire field, causing many grades and classes of lumber to go very high in price and in many instances making it quite difficult to obtain the required lumber.

In the August 4 Washington Letter of the National Association of Home Builders of the United States, the national president, Mr. Coogan, has written to all of his members a letter in which he cautions against such procedure, and urges them to cooperate in every way possible to cut down on that type of frantic buying and price boosting. I commend the letter to the careful reading of all Members of the Senate, and ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A MESSAGE FROM PRESIDENT COOGAN

This is another plea for cooperation and straight thinking by the membership of NAHB. I have asked the builders to do their buying on a day-to-day basis. Please do so. If you and your friends keep your heads there will be enough materials to go around and suppl, everyone on a reduced program.

Panic buying, hoarding, outbidding your competitor for scarce materials will have only one result—control and price fixing. You know and I know how vicious and dangerous these controls are to our industry. We can avoid them by voluntary action—please cooperate with us and let's see this thing through properly.

If this becomes a full-fledged war or if the President decides on an expanded defense policy we will have to divert our energies from home building to war housing, or some other defense work. Remember, the President has better sources of information than we do—even better than the columnists—and so far he has called for only limited controls. Let's use our heads to operate within this framework.

Remember—things are different now than in 1941. Our economy is vastly expanded, our production capacity is tremendous, and instead of just emerging from a fearful depression, when people had little money and few durable goods, we are now finishing our fifth year of prosperity. The people generally are well equipped; our plant capacity is high; our food larder is running over, and we don't have to feed the rest of the world. In reverse, American manufacturers are placing machine-tool orders in France, Sweden, and Switzerland. In our materials industry production is high and will continue so.

If builders will refrain from panic buying our supply lines will catch up with our curtailed production. There are only two real shortages—gypsum boards and cement—and they are almost seasonal at this time of year.

The credit controls imposed on us are reasonable, but they will reduce housing starts drastically for the balance of the year. When the President receives authority from Congress (not granted as yet) he will impose similar curbs on private credit and commercial building. It is my opinion that unless the war situation becomes extremely worse, or unless you make it necessary, we will not have additional controls.

We are busy denying all sorts of rumors regarding cut-offs, limiting orders, curtailment by FHA and VA. Needless to say, these are not true. Do not believe rumors—we will keep you advised—do not repeat rumors.

Your country needs your industry on a sound basis. We accept willingly any curtailment required for the war effort. We pledge ourselves and our membership to the aid of our country as it may be needed. Meanwhile we will continue to do our job as we have in the past.

Special Committee Needed To Investigate Veterans' Education and Training Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOE L. EVINS

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, on July 18, last, I introduced a resolution (H. Res. 710) calling for a complete and impartial investigation and study of the veterans' education and training program under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act. I introduced this resolution following the shocking disclosure of a number of instances in my own State of Tennessee where the benefits under this meritorious program were being abused. The resolution which I introduced in this connection, as I have said, followed the disclosure of abuses in my own State but it was drawn up with the full knowledge that abuses were by no means confined to the State of Tennessee, but were, in fact, even more flagrant and harmful in a large number of other States.

Mr. Speaker, the veterans' education and training program has proved to be one of the greatest acts which the Congress has ever passed in the interest of men who have served their country in time of war. Many thousands of young men have received under this program untold benefits which have fitted them for useful careers and professions. It is therefore of the utmost regret that such a program should be tarnished in any way by bad practices such as have been revealed. We all know that the instances of abuses are by no means common—but the existence of any abuses at all of this great program is sufficient reason for the Congress to undertake an examination of the program as a means of clearing away any suspicion on the part of the public that the program is not being administered properly. We can do this only by seeking out the offenders.

My resolution was introduced for the purpose of protecting, first of all, the interest of the public; and next the interest of legitimate and meritorious training schools and the interest of our veterans themselves. I sincerely trust and I strongly urge that the House take favorable action in regard to this resolution at an early date. There should be no whitewashing of abuses. The true facts should be made known.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I desire to have included with my remarks four editorials from daily newspapers of my own State of Tennessee which express the interest of the public in this proposed investigation. I urge the reading of these editorials by the Members of the House as they call for needed action in this connection.

An editorial, entitled "No Whitewash Here," from the Nashville Tennessean of July 16, 1950 follows:

NO WHITEWASH HERE

Mr. Carl Gray, head of the Veterans' Administration, has invited Tennessee members of Congress to meet with him Tuesday to discuss the final report of his investigation on the conduct of the veterans education and other GI programs in Tennessee.

Reprehensible practices on the part of a number of the GI training schools operating in Tennessee already have been revealed by Representative JOE EVINS, of Smithville, a member of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee. Whether criminal acts by officials of the Nashville regional office of the Veterans' Administration were involved in violation of regulations by these schools was not clear from Representative EVINS' report.

There is no doubt, however, from the Congressman's statements, which were based on facts uncovered by VA investigators, that severe disciplinary action is indicated both against the schools and the Veterans' Administration officials responsible for their supervision.

The fact that irregularities in connection with the handling of some veterans' claims also were reported uncovered by the investigators from Washington indicates that the laxness on the part of local VA officials extended beyond the educational program.

The sourest note in all these revelations from Washington and from Representative EVINS was the Washington report crediting to a Veterans' Administration spokesman the statement that "the VA can whitewash the whole matter."

The cynicism implied in such a statement is an affront to the veterans of Tennessee and to all the people. The fact that the so-called VA spokesman also outlined as possibilities the turning-over of the investigators' report to the Department of Justice for criminal prosecution and civil-service action against responsible officials does not lighten the effect of his remarks.

The fact that $40,000 in taxpayers' money was involved in an overcharge made by a single school is indicative of the degree of mismanagement of the veterans' program in Tennessee.

Administrator Gray and the Tennessee Congressmen who meet at his office Tuesday do not need to be informed that the citizens of Tennessee will resent any efforts at a whitewashing where such items as those disclosed by Representative EVINS are involved. The situation obviously is one that cannot conveniently be shushed. It must not be.

An editorial entitled "VA Facts Must Come Out," from the Nashville Banner of July 19, 1950 follows:

VA FACTS MUST COME OUT

Veterans are citizens and taxpayers, and necessarily concerned as such in two things:

(1) Adequate facilities, intelligently established and operated, and on a basis equitable to all concerned, for fulfillment of the program designed for veterans. The so-called GI bill of rights, that is.

(2) Protection of that program from abuse in any particular—which is to say, any reprehensible treatment embracing any of the several rackets that have been alleged from time to time over the Nation.

No information has as yet been released to pin-point charges filed in Tennessee, and highlighted yesterday by Veterans' Administration action at Washington suspending 10 VA employees here and elsewhere in the State. They are serious charges in the aggregate if in the judgment of these authorities they justified this step, and the investigation is proceeding on a wide scale.

The public is entitled to all the facts available, this being a matter of public business. Those inferentially accused are entitled to a full review, and the opportunity to answer charges, in the interest both of clarifying the facts and of vindicating those who are innocent.

Representative JOE EVINS undoubtedly is right in his resolution for a full-scale investigation of the whole program, not just in Tennessee but everywhere. The fact-finding effort must be prompt and thorough. The public interest asks no more than that, plus requisite action on any dereliction found. It demands no less.

An editorial from the Nashville Tennessean of July 20, 1950, entitled "Time for a Clean-Up," follows:

TIME FOR A CLEAN-UP

The Veterans' Administration in Washington finally has acted on the 13 weeks' investigation of the conduct of veterans' affairs in Tennessee completed early this summer. The executives of the Nashville regional office and its branch offices throughout the State have been suspended from their jobs and more may be suspended later.

While most of the suspensions involved failure to regulate properly 17 GI training schools throughout the State, National Veterans' Administrator Carl Gray also made the general charge of "irregularities of major proportions," "inefficiencies, maladministration, and general laxness."

Records of comparative performance for regional offices of the Veterans' Administration in the Southeast have shown the Nashville regional office constantly at the bottom in most categories for more than 3 years. The general atmosphere of laxness and inefficiency showed up in the service rendered veterans in repeated delays and alibis even before it became apparent on VA performance charts.

The wonder is that the National Veterans' Administration should have waited so long to send its crew of investigators in to determine the causes of the situation.

The veterans of Tennessee and all of the citizens who are interested in the welfare of veterans are pleased that, at last, the VA has moved to correct these unsavory conditions.

Tennesseans generally do not believe that all of the thousands of VA employees in their State have been inefficient and lax. Neither do they believe that all of the 217 GI training schools operating in the State have connived to obtain overpayment for their services and misrepresented their accounts. In both groups it may be assumed that the majority have faithfully performed their duties and fulfilled their obligations.

We believe that Representative JOE EVINS, of Tennessee, has acted wisely in demanding a full congressional investigation of the conduct of the veterans' training program throughout the country. The operation of some of these schools has smelled as badly in other States as have a few in Tennessee.

Such an investigation should serve to clear the air and to stamp out unsavory practices at a time when the confidence of the people in the way the Government will treat future veterans' needs to be bolstered to the maximum.

An editorial from the Memphis Commercial-Appeal of July 19, 1950, entitled "Keep After This One" follows:

KEEP AFTER THIS ONE

Suspensions have been handed out to 10 Veterans' Administration employees in Tennessee pending investigation of what are termed "irregularities of major proportions." The suspensions include the manager of the State headquarters of the VA, his assistant, and the man in charge of the Knoxville office. While the whole story has not yet been told, it is indicated that overpayments of $60,000 to two so-called GI training schools are involved and it is understood still other schools are under investigation.

This move brings into the open a matter that has been the subject of suspicion in Tennessee and many other States in the Nation. Rumors of all sorts of scandalous shenanigans and worse have been rife. In the beginning of the GI training program, designed to equip trainees for making a living, there was a ridiculous range of choice. It was so absurd, however, for the Government to be paying for dancing lessons and the like that some adjustment in the program was obtained.

In numerous cases schools have been organized almost overnight to offer training to veterans, and it seemed to us that the value of the subject matter was frequently subject to question, not to mention the quality of instruction available. Unquestionably there has been some prostitution of one of the most sensible and commendable proposals made for the postwar period. It has been charged that trainees went from one course to another, sometimes to the number of four or five alleged vocations.

The cost to the taxpayers has been great, though there has been no widespread feeling of resentment, because the basic notion was so sound. It is the more despicable, therefore, if any conniving people have taken advantage of the program to feather their nests, to graft and cheat. This is one piece of business that should be pushed through swiftly, vigorously, and effectively in spite of the national emergency. Speedy discovery of guilt where it exists and drastic punishment would be a form of reassurance the people need as they face another all-out effort for defense.

Representative JOE L. EVINS, of Tennessee, is proposing a Nation-wide investigation of such cases, and Congress should set it up and follow it up without hesitation or delay.

The Knowland Amendment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOWARD W. SMITH

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

AUGUST 9, 1950.

Hon. HOWARD W. SMITH,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am writing you because I am deeply concerned over a statement made yesterday by the Honorable WALTER LYNCH on the Knowland amendment. If it did the things suggested in this statement I, too, would oppose the Knowland amendment.

He states that if the amendment were adopted, a worker would lose his unemployment insurance if he refuses work on a job where he is required to belong to a union or where he might be required to resign from, or refrain from, joining a bona fide union.

These matters are covered by the Federal labor standards. Under existing Federal law every State is required to have specific prohibitions against this being done. Every State law contains these provisions. The Knowland amendment does not touch this requirement. If the Knowland amendment is passed exactly the same penalty will continue to be visited on any State which would take one of these safeguards out of its law.

Under the present law it is, of course, possible for a State court to misconstrue one of these provisions, and the Knowland amendment does not change this possibility in any way. Our courts will be no more likely to misconstrue these standards than they are today if the Knowland amendment is adopted. For exactly the same penalty would be imposed as under existing law. The Knowland amendment does not take away the Secretary's power to hold a State out of compliance when the State court vested with final jurisdiction issues an opinion which he finds would fail to comply substantially with the Federal standards.

The State administrators of every State are bound in their administration by their courts application and interpretation of State law, including its labor safeguards. The amendment the State administrators requested Senator KNOWLAND to introduce is basically to preserve this State requirement and procedure. If the States are allowed to have any judicial review, the State administrators must be allowed to follow their own courts in interpretation of State laws and not in interpretation of someone else. The amendment only allows the State courts to act before the Secretary can step in.

It leaves him free to hold a State out of compliance but only after the State court has acted.

I know you will appreciate the fact that our States have as much integrity as the Federal Government in preserving the rights of citizens and in interpreting the law—including the labor safeguards of their unemployment compensation laws.

In my opinon if the Knowland amendment did what it has been accused of doing, no State administrator would be for it. They do not want State systems broken down. They do not want labor standards violated, and they will not be. They do feel it is vital to preserve the integrity of the State systems, and know that the Knowland amendment will do no more than this.

My kind regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JOHN G. RHODES, Jr.,
Chairman, Legislative Committee of the Interstate Conference of Employment Security Agencies.

Meat Inspection Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDNA F. KELLY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mrs. KELLY of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter which I have received from Mr. Saul Graff, one of the largest meat wholesalers in Brooklyn. He calls our attention to a fact that so many of us may have overlooked in our efforts to reduce the administrative expenses of the Government. Production in meat plants and in packing houses is being delayed due to the insufficient number of inspectors. On July 1 of this year 346 meat inspectors were placed on forced leave, thereby dropping the total staff to less than 3,000. This is no time to destroy the meat-inspection service of our Government. On the contrary, this Bureau should be maintained at full strength to insure proper inspection of the principal food of the major portion of our population. We are paying the highest prices in history for meat. It does not appear to me that the salaries for 3,000 meat inspectors is too high a price for this Government to pay for adequate inspection. Let us at least have the assurance that what we buy has been properly inspected by the Federal Government. We have educated the housewife to look for the Federal inspector's stamp on all meat. But how can we have adequate inspection if this Bureau is reduced below operating level? The letter follows:

THE J. H. RODMAN-GRAFF CORP.,
Brooklyn N. Y., August 2, 1950.

Hon. EDNA F. KELLY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR EDNA: I wish to add my sincerest protest to the forthcoming cuts in the services of the Agricultural Department, especially in meat inspection, a long-established branch of the Bureau that has for years amply and efficiently protected the health and well-being of the American people. I take violent objection to the action of the past Congress in reducing the personnel of these old bureaus which have not been made a hideaway for political jobs.

I believe that you should sponsor an amendment—or support one—that would exempt this service from the drastic reductions provided in the budget for the coming year. To me, these health services are on a par with other exempted agencies which deal in protecting the well-being of the American people, such as the FBI and other Government health departments.

Ill-advised and untimely is the consensus among my many acquaintances in reference to the drastic economy cuts in these old bureaus, and I would deeply appreciate any support you can give to restoration of these services to their former efficient and morale-building duties.

I speak from my personal experience in the slaughtering business for the past 37 years.

Sincerely yours,

SAUL GRAFF.

Politics Crimps War Effort, So Skip It

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY J. DAVENPORT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Kermit McFarland, from the Pittsburgh Press of Sunday, August 6, 1950:

POLITICS CRIMPS WAR EFFORT, SO SKIP IT

(By Kermit McFarland)

Many of our politicians, especially those running in this year's election, are following the hackneyed, times-are-normal way of going after votes.

That's one fact. Here's another:

Most of the leadership in meeting the national catastrophe welling up on the horizon must come from the politicians.

Let's leave the Washington part of it in more experienced hands, for the moment, and deal with the politicians in our own back yard.

If this war explodes into the cataclysmic proportions it seems destined to reach, there will be an imperative need for steady, skillful, and courageous leadership on the home front—as well as in Washington or on the battle lines.

More than any other war in our history, this one is studded with the twin dangers of internal sabotage and external attack.

RIGHT ON FRONT PORCH

It is unlikely that we can sit at home and listen—however anxiously—to the progress of the war in far-off places. It doesn't take an alarmist to see that this war almost certainly will have its violent aspects right on our front porches.

In that case, responsible public officials and political leaders, at both the State and local levels, will be called on for aggressive, forthright, speedy, and efficient action. If they fumble, it can be costly and perhaps fatal.

And it isn't enough for them to wait until the storm pours down on our heads with all its impact. They should be showing their leadership qualities now—if they have any.

Instead of quibbling among themselves over whether the Republicans or the Democrats are to blame for the mess we're in, they ought to be doing their utmost to get us on the right road.

It isn't enough, in this emergency, for candidates for governor or United States Senator to belay each other with the usual epithets, accusations, innuendo, rumor, and mud.

It isn't enough to be going around the State trying to outpromise each other.

It isn't enough to be hoarding up great gobs of campaign cash, to be spent both openly and surreptitiously. It isn't enough to be handshaking adults and kissing babies. It isn't enough to be making deals with ward and county politicians, and giving away public jobs before the election.

THERE IS ONLY ONE ISSUE

There is only one issue before the voters. And that is how do we get out of the scrape we're in—and how soon can we be about it?

Any political candidate who can't offer something constructive in the light of this single issue is off base—not worth having his name printed on the ballots.

If the voters don't give him short shrift it will be only because his opponent is confining himself to the same type of small-time, politics-as-usual campaign.

It would be a mighty useful thing, in this crisis, if the campaign as such could be called off. And the candidates for public office, instead of indulging in their usual mouthings, were compelled to prove their capacities for leadership in the clutch.

The times call for statesmanship, at least. More accurately, they would seem to call for miracles.

Farmers Home Administration Loans to Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to an article appearing in the current issue of the American Legion magazine by Pitkin entitled, "How the Legion Fights for the Farm Veteran." An editorial comment on this article is carried in the same issue.

In this connection, I am delighted to attach herewith a statement regarding Farmers Home Administration loans to veterans in South Carolina as compiled by R. F. Kolb, State director of the FHA. Much has been done for our veterans and much more must be done to aid them in securing farm homes:

FACTS REGARDING FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION LOANS TO VETERANS

(By R. Frank Kolb)

Here are some facts about service to farm veterans in South Carolina through the supervised credit program of the Farmers Home Administration:

OPERATING LOANS

During the year ended June 30, 1950, there were made to farm veterans in South Carolina 1,557 operating loans totaling $579,330. Our totals since November 1, 1946, through June 30, 1950, are 6,937 loans to veterans amounting to $2,285,436. Administrator Lasseter's 1949 annual report shows that South Carolina ranks seventh among the States in the cumulative number of FHA operating loans to veterans.

On repayments we do not have amounts separately for veterans and nonveterans. However, since the Farmers Home Administration was created (November 1, 1946) through December 31, 1949, our total operating loan advances in South Carolina have amounted to $10,554,712. Repayments during the same period have been $8,778,775 or 83.2 percent of the entire principal amount. An additional $302,629 has been collected as interest. Some of the loans are repayable over a period of years and therefore are not yet due, meaning that the percentage delinquent is quite small.

REAL ESTATE LOANS

Since the inception (1938) of the farm ownership program, 480 veterans have obtained loans for purchasing or improving family-type farms in an aggregate amount of $2,161,394. Even though these loans are amortized over a 40-year period already 83 veterans have paid them in full. Many others are well ahead of schedule. During the past year 100 percent of our initial farm ownership loans in South Carolina from appropriated funds have been to veterans.

We have a substantial volume of veteran business in our two comparatively new real estate activities. Within the last 15 months 20 insured mortgage loans financed with private funds (and insured by the Government) have been made to veterans in the State which have totaled $94,748. Of the 107 farm housing loans made between December 1, 1949, and June 30, 1950, 55 were to veterans for a total of $312,000. Good repayment records are being made by farm veterans with all types of FHA loans. The Farmers Home Administration extends preference to veterans in all its services.

Democracy Versus Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDNA F. KELLY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mrs. KELLY of New York. Mr. Speaker, while agreeing that the security of the Nation must be preserved at any cost, there were those after World War II who opposed a peacetime draft. This was done in the belief that the postwar world should be organized around the principle of cooperation and that compulsory military service would seem to show a lack of confidence in postwar agencies for peace even before those agencies were organized. The adherents of the policy of no peacetime conscription asked merely for time to determine the nature of the postwar world.

Today, the nature of that world has been determined. With a magnificent desire for peace and a patience born of charity and yet with the very human fear of a doubting Thomas, America has lived for the past 5 years in the hope of achieving a just peace and world security. To this end we have given aid of a financial, social, and political nature. In addition we have been prime movers in the setting up of an international organization with constructive, not destructive, intent to build a community of states so that through discussion not argument, through peace not war, this worn-out world may again live in magnificence and splendor to the fulfillment of its God-given days.

"Democracy is the name for a great political discovery—that power can be made effectively responsible." That it has not been properly demonstrated in these United States is admitted. We have in spots been nationalistic and isolationist. That in some other countries of the world, power is not effectively responsible, is likewise admitted and for them no apology is offered. Yet with all our quarrel here and elsewhere with the composition and policies of government, our basic philosophy of life is agreed upon. The western philosophy rests upon the statement of man as a rational animal, a social animal, the creature of God—in consequence of which he has been endowed with many and varied prerogatives; the right to life, bodily integrity, to obtain the necessary means to existence, the right to tend toward his ultimate goal, the right of association and the right to possess and use property. Society is a natural means which man can and must use for the development of all individual and social gifts bestowed upon him. "Society is for man, not man for society." In order to form a more perfect union, to provide for our freedoms, security, and tranquility, we have set up governments deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. We have recognized the distinction between the State and the community. The content of democracy implies the existence of unalienable rights and individual equality which no government has power to abrogate. It recognizes that all men are equal in value but not in function—that there is a hierarchy of society in which men of particular abilities, so recognized by their fellow men are placed in positions of sacred trust in administering the government in whose treasury the rights of equal men are preserved. This, gentlemen, is the natural law, and the law of America.

Today, a nation of the world is seeking to undermine this philosophy of life. Not concerned is she in method of government, of ascertainment of rights and duties in world cooperation, this new enemy seeks to impose on the whole world a new unrealistic, false, and pagan philosophy. For years it was concealed under seductive trappings but the philosophy is based on the false analysis of Hegel, Marx, and Engel—a philosophy of dialectical materialism in which the goal of human existence is a classless society and the progress toward this end, taking whatever violent means may be necessary, is a crusade for the human race.

Its economic factor is based on the idea that in all history men have been faced with nature and the success with which they could produce from nature such things as they needed. The particular form of production determines the whole nature of society. This emphasis on production as the key to all men's activities leads very naturally to the view that man, as an individual, has no great significance. Production must always be a collective act, and the collective—government—is the unit. Man exists merely for the state.

In all societies hitherto existing and existing today—capitalism—the mode of production has been and is imperfect according to the Communist. It has left too many human needs unsatisfied, and so man has imagined to himself another world in which the needs will be met. This "religion" is his opium.

To the Communist there is only one reality, matter—the blind forces of which evolve into plant, animal, and man. By a law of inexorable necessity and through a perpetual conflict of forces, matter moves toward the final synthesis, through class war, of a classless society. No God, no spirit, no soul, no survival of the soul after death, is recognized. The Communist claims that the conflict which carries the world toward its final synthesis—classless society wherein finally even government is unnecessary—can be accelerated by man. To do this they endeavor to sharpen the antagonisms which arise between classes of society, and hence hate and destruction takes on the aspect of a crusade for the progress of humanity, and all obstacles to these violent yet systematic efforts must be annihilated as hostile to the human race. Such is the philosophy of communism.

To the orderly and well-lit mind the philosophy of the west and the philosophy of communism are diametrically opposed. In the strength and danger and falsity of this enemy all other enemies pale. Man, as a creature of God, with unalienable rights and equality, becomes pure matter evolving toward an end, and as such is expendable and valueless. This, "system" is unrivaled in its methods and the grimness of its objectives and its lack of salvation for the ills of mankind.

Just as truer democracy in the political order is the offensive against communism, and prayer is the spiritual offensive against diabolical paganism and materialism, so, in the military order, mobilization is our only offensive against destruction through communism.

God gave America a hemisphere to itself. This insulation was formerly interpreted to mean that our divine destiny was to look to ourselves alone. Steel and steam have long since destroyed our insulation and with it our philosophy of isolation. The freedom of Europe and Asia, the future of democracy, and the rights of man have become to us matters of concern, for we are recognizing our responsibility to God and to the peoples who mothered us and are now struggling in the upward march of civilization. This is the spiritual goal of Americanism.

"The hour has struck for Americanism to rise and meet this destined mission, walking humbly in the sight of God, or else retreat to its Atlantic stronghold, admit the existence of two worlds, and wait grimly for the Ice Age of international relations to set in."

Events show that we have arrived at the greatest crisis in recorded history. It is necessary that we face the future with hope, with courage, and with faith in God. We must square our shoulders and face facts. We cannot fail posterity. We cannot fail those who died that this Nation might survive. We are faced with authorizing billions of dollars for self-preservation and, since the leaders of the Kremlin understand only military might, let us meet their challenge by the means they understand. We must arm and re-arm men of good will everywhere who will freely join us in the struggle ahead.

The military is mobilizing. Economically, we must mobilize; no other course is open. This is a struggle of uncertain duration and cost. Real peace or true peace is remote. Our generation may never live in a peacetime economy, but we will live and must pass on to our succeeding generations the right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, secured and maintained by sacrifices unequaled in the history of any nation.

For our military needs and to insure our economy, I support the President's request for immediate passage of the Defense Production Act of 1950 which is designed to increase defense production and curb consumer credit. The granting of stand-by powers to bring every phase of our economy under control—when and if needed—was not sought by the President, but Members of Congress wisely desire to authorize stand-by controls to check inflation.

Production or Controls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH W. GWINN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Speaker, shall we have production or controls?

This is a desperately serious war. Therefore, everyone of us is concerned that the whole gigantic productive power of the American people should be turned loose if we are to win war III. It is on that front of production and invention we shall win. There is a real danger in the shock of the sudden change from indifference and unawareness to fierce action. That action may be the worst thing we could do. I refer to the insistent demand that Congress impose price controls, rationing, taxing of profits, and various other so-called mechanics of the all-out mobilization for war production.

How can managers in Washington compel higher production than all of us working voluntarily without control and restriction will provide?

Everyone knows that our American free-way system gives us higher production for peace than the controlled Russian system. Why on earth then should we swallow the idea that our first duty is to abandon that system when war comes? If freedom gives us more peacetime production, why should it not give us more in wartime? Is it not true that the nations having a free economy outproduced and won past wars against the nations of the planned and controlled economies?

Some talk as if the American economy was a horse which could be turned around and started in the opposite direction—on war production—by putting on a heavier harness and a deadening hand at the reins. The fact is that the American economy is a delicate sensitively balance thoroughbred kind of economy. If you had a thoroughbred horse, and you had suddenly to ride him in desperate need in the shortest possible time, you would not dream of putting him in a heavy harness nor would you turn him over to a rider who knew nothing about horses. Those who preach a controlled economy admit Stalin's system is best. Why fight him at all if Stalin is right; if a controlled economy produces more.

We know controls reduce production, they have never failed to do so. They tried them as long ago as the Revolutionary War; they abandoned them then long before that war ended.

Let us look at the recent record. Do you remember the first year after World War II was over the planners were going to control and guide the building industry so we would build houses. They were going to allocate labor, and they had all kinds of fancy controls over the prices people were going to be allowed to pay for a house, no matter how desperate their need. Do you remember what happened? Building came almost to a dead stop. Even President Truman could not endure his planners any longer, he suddenly removed controls. Then what happened? We built a million new dwellings a year, year after year. Now landlords are advertising for tenants. Tenants have a choice of houses. But in England and France, where the planners were able to keep their feet on the necks of the people only a handful of new houses went up. Controls reduce production. Why?

The New Deal housing planners made builders write paper reports, fill out forms, keep books, and fix prices that failed to meet costs and that made no bricks and built no houses. Now the Government is controlling the price of corn so I cannot feed my dairy cows to produce butter at the price people can pay. So I sell my cows for beef and kill my little calves. Because of that we have had too high prices for butter and beef since 1946. But, you will say, war is different. Is it?

Controlled production did not win the last war. When the war started the administration brought William Knudsen of General Motors down to Washington. He worked out with the Armed Forces and the heavy industries what would be needed and how to retool. Things got under way fast. After we got production going, the New Dealers began sniping at Knudsen. They did not intend to leave any real representative of American free enterprise in a key place in the war industries. So they sent Knudsen over to a fancy desk job in the War Department, and Henry Wallace, Harry Hopkins, Robert Nathan, and Leon Henderson took over. Do you think the weekly reorganization of SPAB, FEA, and WPB won the war? What happened was that Knudsen had let American industry have its head, and convert itself to making what their country needed to win the war and even the planners could not wreck our magnificent performance. Freemen will win their wars. The controlled men will lose theirs.

The President's Message Vindicates My Position

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, I listened yesterday to the reading of the President's message on internal security, and again read the message with care this morning.

The only word I know to describe it is magnificent.

Today I sent the following telegram to the President:

AUGUST 8, 1950.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington:

I beg leave to offer my most sincere felicitations on your magnificent message to the Congress on internal security yesterday. There is not a word in this splendid statement with which I disagree.

I am especially gratified because I find in your message complete vindication and support of my own position on proposed legislation already pending in the area of internal security.

Most important of all, your message is reassurance to the people of the United States and of the world that our faith in democracy is so great that we do not fear the assaults of hell itself.

ARTHUR G. KLEIN,
Member of Congress.

I HAVE SAID THE SAME THING

Mr. Speaker, over and over, in the face of criticism and even of suspicion, I have stated the same things. My only regret is that I am not so gifted as to have said them so well; yet I can take comfort from the fact that some of the President's phrases are no more clear and vigorous than my own.

My opposition is and has been to the "unwise or excessive security measures" which the President himself condemned in clear and ringing language, and, like the President, my opposition has stemmed from my profound belief in the strength and the glory of American democracy.

Although the President refrained from specifying by name and number certain bills to which he objected, they are readily identifiable to anyone who has followed the legislative program of recent Congresses.

I myself submitted a lengthy statement in opposition to the so-called subversive activities control bill, in which I attempted to make the very same points made in the President's message.

Reduced to succinctness, every useful end which could be acomplished under this proposed measure can be accomplished, and better, under existing laws; and those ends which cannot be accomplished under existing law are themselves either pernicious or subversive.

MORE, NOT LESS, DEMOCRACY IS ANSWER

Our proper answer to the threat of totalitarianism, whether it is the threat of fascism or the threat of communism, is more and better democracy.

This great country of ours was conceived in the minds of our forefathers as a dream of a citadel of freedom and equality. They could not have foreseen our vast material strength; but the genius of Thomas Jefferson mapped our road to political freedom and equality under law.

President Truman's message to the Congress yesterday could have been written by Jefferson himself—certainly it was animated by the living spirit of that great exponent of the democratic way of life.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot remember a time when I have not been proud to be an American and proud to be a Democrat; but on some days I am doubly proud, and yesterday was one of them.

Pass Price Control Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAY J. MADDEN
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, during the debate on the rule for consideration of the pending bill I called the attention of the Members to the ridiculous increase in prices for life's necessities, since the Korean war started.

A letter from M. H. Thorsen, director of child welfare in the public schools of Hammond, Ind., is a sample of hundreds of communications which I have received protesting profiteering in the Calumet region of Indiana:

HAMMOND PUBLIC SCHOOLS,
Hammond, Ind., August 7, 1950.

Hon. RAY J. MADDEN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MADDEN: This noon I stopped at the grocery store to pick up a few groceries. A 5-pound bag of sugar that 6 weeks ago sold for 39 cents was marked 51 cents today, and that was no special sale either. At the same time Secretary Brannan says that more sugar than we will ever need is in storage in the United States and Cuba.

Today, a widow with a crippled child and on relief called to ask if this department could give her a little food at the end of the month because she knew that she was simply not going to come out.

Over in Korea we are blowing the guts out of youngsters trying to preserve our democratic principles. Everybody is preaching war. If all these circumstances are true, and there is no question but what they are, why does it take the House and Senate so long to establish war regulations and retain at least a sensible economy even at high levels? Surpluses, subsidies, profiteering on a national scale are not only undemocratic in time of war but they are wholly unpatriotic.

You people have in your command the power to do something. What are you waiting for?

Sincerely,

M. H. THORSEN,
Director, Department of Attendance and Child Welfare.

The Knowland Amendment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 10, 1950

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, I intend to support the motion on H. R. 6000, the social-security bill, to be made tomorrow by Mr. Lynch to recommit the report with instructions to the House managers to insist upon the House provision for total and permanent disability insurance and to reject the Knowland provision in the Senate amendment.

What does the Knowland amendment do? In my opinion, the Knowland amendment undermines the entire unemployment insurance system. It—

First. Makes it possible for a State unemployment compensation agency to deprive a worker of his unemployment insurance benefits for refusing to be a strikebreaker.

Second. Makes it possible for a State unemployment compensation agency to deprive a worker of his unemployment insurance benefits if he refuses work on a job where the wages, hours, or other conditions of the work offered are below those prevailing for similar work in the locality.

Third. Makes it possible for a State unemployment compensation agency to cause a worker to lose his unemployment insurance benefits if he refuses work on a job where he is required to belong to a union or where he might be required to resign from, or refrain from, joining a bona fide union.

Fourth. Compels an unemployed worker, aggrieved by an unfair or unjust ruling of a State administrator to go to court and exhaust every legal remedy in the State courts before the Secretary of Labor may act. To my mind unemployment insurance benefits should be given during the period of unemployment—not 2 or 3 years later, after every legal remedy in the State courts has been exhausted, and at his expense.

Fifth. Will break down the standards established by Congress and will substitute therefor the interpretations of the law by the courts of the 48 States.

Sixth. Is a threat, in the present Korean crisis, to manpower mobilization, as most of labor, especially skilled labor, must, of necessity, depend upon uniform interpretation of the unemployment insurance law.

Seventh. Is not stopgap legislation as the report indicates. It is permanent legislation—so permanent that it can only be terminated by repeal legislation.

I also favor including permanent total disability insurance in the social-security bill. This provision was in the social-security bill as it passed the House. Thousands of disabled persons would have benefited by this provision which was struck out by the conference committee.

At the present time the State of California is making insurance payments to persons who are sick or disabled for a period of 26 weeks. But persons who are disabled for longer periods of time also need insurance protection.

The social-security bill as it passed the House provided insurance benefits for persons permanently and totally disabled after the first 6 months of disability. This was a very desirable provision. It should be restored. We should not forget our disabled people. They have needs too. The welfare of our disabled people is a responsibility which we should not avoid.

A Lesson to the Communists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD D. DONOHUE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a very timely editorial entitled, "Appeals Court Upholds Communist Conviction," which appeared in the August 4 issue of the Worcester (Mass.) Evening Gazette. The article follows:

APPEALS COURT UPHOLDS COMMUNIST CONVICTION

Because the principle of freedom of speech was involved, the case of the 11 Communists aroused great interest. They said they were only expressing opinions, one of which was that the working class should eventually take over the Government by violence if necessary. They said they couldn't be jailed for that.

But the decision of the circuit court of appeals in upholding their conviction showed that the law is flexible enough to accommodate an obvious threat like that of these 11 Communists ("obvious" in the sense that most of our people and the Government see it that way) without changing its essential safeguards.

Two points should be remembered in connection with the decision. The first is that "precedents" in cases of freedom of speech are not the potent factor that they are in other types of cases (though many of them were cited). We can be sure that each case on the border line between legitimate advocacy and actual danger to society will be handled on its merits as of that particular time. Because the Communists are convicted it doesn't mean that any intellectual heretic will be jailed. Sometimes—as in the Terminiello case—the decision goes in favor of the radical advocate, sometimes it goes against him.

The second point follows the first. The laws has proved to be pragmatic. It keeps up with the times. The decision will go against the advocate when the condition of society and the history of recent events demonstrate that it should. Judge Learned Hand in his decision went so far as to mention the Berlin airlift, and he used the phrase "the accepted mores of society." Society recognized that these Communists were a threat, so they wind up in jail. An anarchist shouting from a Battery soap box would not be the same kind of threat, and would probably go free.

Pragmatic law has caused concern to many people. During the New Deal stage the Supreme Court "kept up with the times" so much that many people feared the Constitution had become meaningless. But in a case like this one the concept has been of great assistance. The Communists tried to stick by a narrow construction of the letter of the law; the Court saw the real situation.

We need not fear that freedom of speech has been "chipped away" by this decision. The Communists existed in great enough numbers and had great enough influence to be a threat to our society. They were proved to have conspired to advocate the violent overthrow of the Government. So, as a "clear and present danger," they were convicted. But that doesn't mean individuals still cannot advocate change in our existing structure if they want to.

We Need Clean Air

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 10, 1950

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, how to obtain clean air for America is a problem which vitally concerns citizens throughout the Nation. In October 1948, at Donora, Pa., 20 persons died during a prolonged smog. Five thousand nine hundred and ten others became seriously ill. Only a few weeks ago scores of people in Baltimore had the same frightening experience. For a period of 2 or 3 years, the Los Angeles area, which has been sorely plagued by air pollution, has been spending more money than any other area in the country on its own problem. Despite its ample resources, Los Angeles must call on outside help.

Smoke damage alone, according to a national survey conducted last year, causes an annual loss of one and one-half billion dollars. That is about one thousand dollars for every person in this country. But our cities now spend only about 7 cents per person for control activities of polluted air.

Air pollution can be controlled. The Nation-wide drive for cleaner air and elimination of unsightly, smelly, or poisonous industrial wastes has now become one of the country's most pressing industrial problems.

The problem has grown in importance. Industrial production during the last decade has grown tremendously—it has increased more than 200 percent in dollar value. To accomplish this tremendous expansion in output, many new plants had to be built and many workers had to be hired. All this expansion means that new industrial communities have sprung up and that more objectionable materials are discharged into the air. Many plants that once sat quietly in thinly populated areas, or were located where smoke fumes or wastes did no harm, have surprisingly discovered themselves near or in the heart of populous communities.

When smoke, dust, and fumes are discharged to the air in an area faster than they are removed by natural cleansing forces—then you have air pollution in that area. Many communities are having this experience for the first time.

High officials, including the President of the United States, have expressed concern over the problem of air pollution. In a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, President Truman, on December 10, requested the calling of a United States technical conference on air pollution.

In this letter, he warned that—

> The contamination of the atmosphere and its potential adverse effects on health, industry, agriculture, and natural resources are causing wide concern. The agencies of the Federal Government are being called upon to assist private, State, and municipal interests in finding a solution of air-pollution problems.

The importance of the conference, which took place at the beginning of May here in Washington, appears from the large number of people who attended: over 750 outstanding scientists, representatives of universities, industry, and of Federal, State, and local governments through the United States, Great Britain, Canada, and the Netherlands took part. The conference urged the Federal Government to support attempts to solve the air-pollution problems.

The President has said that he considers corrective action and enforcement to be a local responsibility. With that I agree. Primary responsibility and authority for effective action rest with State and local governments, because the needs for control of air pollution vary from locality to locality.

However, because the problem is Nation-wide, because air pollution recognizes neither State nor even national boundaries, and because only an overall campaign can be effective, with the cooperation of the States, local governments, and citizens groups, an organization should be formed which would assume responsibility for initiating, promoting, and coordinating a national campaign. Furthermore, there is need for the Federal agencies to compile information and to undertake the more expensive Nation-wide research that will provide the local areas with a proper approach to the solution of the problem.

For this reason, I have drafted, and am submitting to the Congress a bill which assigns to the Public Health Service and to the Department of the Interior through the Bureau of Mines, responsibility for the public health and engineering research aspects of this problem, respectively.

The medical and public-health aspects of air pollution are more complex than the engineering phases of the problem. For this reason, the medical aspects require more time for the accumulation of substantial information. The public is interested in the health aspects of the problem, but it is on the engineering processes that correction or mitigation of the problem depends for ultimate success.

If we grant the relatively small amount of funds provided in this bill, these agencies will be able to assist the local governments materially in advancing toward the elimination of this cause of increasing damage to property and this threat to public health.

The bill I have introduced will provide the technical information.

While we still need much additional information for a successful conquest of air pollution, we do have enough data on hand now to begin the planning of the attack. We cannot afford to wait until we have all the information that could conceivably be compiled on the subject, either on its health or its engineering phases. We must now face the serious danger and the continuing damage caused by air pollution.

Passing laws is not enough. It is essential that on the local level all the groups interested in civic welfare become increasingly aware of the problem; that they learn as much as we now know about air pollution and the methods of combating it. Local governments, women's clubs, church groups, and fraternal organizations should place emphasis on this program as one of the real contributions they can make to their communities. Since the sources of air pollution are multiple, it requires broad community cooperation and widespread support to eradicate it thoroughly.

It should be easy to arouse this broad support because there are many groups in the community who will directly benefit from the elimination of air pollution. Among the groups who stand to profit most are the industries who spend thousands of dollars fighting lawsuits because of the damage their waste materials have caused; there are the property owners whose property has been damaged; there are the housewives whose curtains have not only been blackened but also chemically deteriorated, leading to eventual decomposition; there are also the people who manufacture equipment to purify industrial wastes so that they will not pollute the atmosphere; and there are consultants who advise industries how to prevent this pollution.

All these individuals and groups who would derive this benefit from the clean-air campaign should be grateful for the opportunity to join civic organizations in a drive to solve this problem on the community level.

Curtailment of Postal Services

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ROBERT J. CORBETT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call to the attention of the Congress a recent survey of the effects of the post-office-service curtailments. This survey appears to be highly objective and informative. It is certainly worthy of study and consideration.

The survey follows:

EFFECTS OF POST OFFICE SERVICE CURTAILMENTS—REPORT ON SURVEY CONDUCTED JULY 13-21, 1950, BY THE COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK, INC., NEW YORK, N. Y.

On April 17, 1950, the Postmaster General issued an order directing local postmasters to effect curtailment of several established postal services and complete discontinuance of others. The changes were to become effective not later than July 1, 1950; and all curtailments and discontinuances were fully operative in New York City by June 1.

Changes in New York postal services were:

1. Delivery: In residential areas deliveries were reduced generally from two to one per day, including Saturdays.

Business areas continued to receive three daily deliveries, except Saturdays, when they received one instead of two. (Deliveries became slower, arriving from 30 minutes to 2 or 3 hours late.)

Parcel post was reduced to one delivery per day, except in such business areas where parcel-post volume necessitated additional deliveries.

2. Collection service: Since May 15 daily mail collections have been made from street- and chute-mail boxes so that mail might reach the post office not later than 8:30 p. m., requiring deposit in such boxes not later than 6:30 p. m.

3. Window service: All carrier stations or branch post offices are now open to the public only during the hours of 8 a. m. to 5:30 p. m. on Mondays through Fridays and until 12 noon on Saturdays, and are closed on Sundays and holidays. Post office finance stations render service between 9 a. m. and 5 p. m. on Mondays through Fridays and are closed at all other times.

The general post office, the Church Street Station, the Grand Central Station, and the Bronx and Brooklyn central post offices operate from 8 a. m. to 6 p. m. daily, including Saturdays. After 6 p. m. daily, and on Sundays and holidays, these stations maintain one window for acceptance only of fully prepaid first class and air mail, newspapers, and emergency matter. No other service is available after 6 p. m.

INCONVENIENCES CAUSED BY CURTAILED SERVICE

Acting on complaints to the association from members, the postal affairs committee on June 1, 1950, rendered a report, adopted by the board of directors, citing the detrimental effects of the discontinuance on April 28 of directory service, and suggested further study of the postal situation after the service changes had been in effect long enough to be fully tested.

Accordingly, on July 13, after more than a month's experience with the postal curtailments, the association instituted a survey.

THE SURVEY

The questionnaire's three principal parts covered outgoing mail, incoming mail, and miscellaneous service items, the last designed to cover directory service, registry, special delivery, parcel post, and other aspects of importance to the membership. More than 500 New York business concerns participated in the survey. Among them were some of the largest volume mail users in the city—publishers, direct-mail firms, mail-order concerns, and others. They represented a true cross section of the city's business community, from small proprietary firms to the big-business corporations, from every field of commerce. A summary of the survey follows:

A. Outgoing mail

Three hundred and thirty concerns, or 66 percent of those responding, now deliver their outgoing mail directly to the post office. Many commenced such deliveries only after experience with the new collection regulations had emphasized the necessity for this move.

The vast majority reported delay in receipt by addressees of first class and virtually every other class of mail. However, delays in first-class mail were fewer and less disruptive than those in other categories, including parcel post, registered mail, and special delivery. The consensus is that from 1 to 2 days longer, depending upon distance, now is required for first-class mail to reach its destination. As to parcel post, packages now are taking from 2 days to a week and more to arrive at destination.

Large quantities of mail are being delivered to branch and other post offices by senders now in an attempt to beat the closing deadline either of 5:30 or 6 p. m. At branch offices particularly resultant congestion has caused confusion, messengers', and truckmen's overtime pay, and little, if any, decrease in mail delays.

For outgoing service the most frequent complaint revolved about the shortened working hours.

B. Incoming mail

The survey evoked a variety of complaints concerning incoming mail service, with which the respondents have more direct contact than with outgoing mail. Some are mentioned in connection with the discussion of miscellaneous services below.

Delays in receipt of both first-class and other mail appear to fall into the same relative pattern, with delays ranging from a fraction of a day up to a week or more.

C. Miscellaneous services and operations

Service through the various post offices in the city is far from uniform. A sharp difference among them was noted, with the Church Street Station evidently rendering the best service. Of the people served by Church Street, a greater number were satisfied with outgoing mail service than complained of delays.

Most complaints arise from among those served by branch or carrier offices.

1. Effects of Shortened Postal Hours on Business Operations

Numerous firms reported that the first daily mail is received so late no work can be done with it before 10 a. m., resulting in loss of 1 to 2 morning hours. To get outgoing mail into the post office in time for handling that day, all mail must be ready for delivery to the post office by 4 p. m., cutting the business day by 1 to 2 hours. In addition, it was indicated that even when mail is delivered by hand to the post office at 5:30 p. m., it often is set aside until the following morning, because it is physically impossible for the post office to handle current daily volume of mail on the day it is received.

Many firms now are picking up their mail at the post office, especially the first morning mail. However, the branch offices, which serve the great majority, do not open to the public until 8 a. m., by which time long lines of mail messengers, all assembled for the same purpose, create just as much daily delay as would the current postal delivery.

Many firms found special delivery had lost its utility, taking as long as an ordinary letter to arrive at destination. Other firms found it necessary to utilize special delivery where first-class mail formerly would have sufficed, to insure delivery in the time formerly required for ordinary first-class mail. This condition prevails particularly with firms (such as real-estate management, insurance, etc.) sending large volumes of mail to areas classified as residential, with only one daily delivery, where timely delivery is essential for both addressee and sender. This situation has resulted in an inordinate increase in mailing costs (which must be ultimately reflected in higher consumer charges).

Under the new rules registered mail also has created a problem. In the foreign-trade field many firms must utilize registered mail to transmit important documents, such as letters of credit, notices, and shipping forms, with the time element of paramount importance. In innumerable instances documents must be prepared upon just-received advices for action the same day. In order to have them in a branch post office for such action they must be sent in by 4 p. m., since any later posting results in a long wait because of the pile-up of similar business at the post office. The resultant queueing up to meet the 5:30 closing hour creates a danger that, because of the volume of final hour business, registered pieces may be held over until the following day before they are handled. Many firms, therefore, have discontinued using registered mail in favor of hand delivery, resulting in an increase in cost to the sender and a loss of revenue to the post office.

2. Intracity Mail Service

Since June 1 there has been a noticeable increase in the time necessary for mail to get from one place to another within New York City. This condition appears to exist in all classes. First-class mail from a mid-town address has been known to take as much as 2 or 3 days to reach a business address in the downtown area. Similar delays are noted in mail going from one borough to another. Only the fact that shorter workdays have increased the daily volume of mail in each individual post office or station, making it impossible for postal employees to handle a full day's mail within the usual time, can reasonably account for this condition. A contributing factor may well be curtailment of deliveries in some districts. Whatever the cause, these delays have created serious disruption in ordinary business operations.

3. Directory Service

As pointed out in the report of the Postal Affairs Committee on June 1, 1950, the discontinuance of directory service is severely burdensome on many New York business concerns. In the import and export field, much mail from abroad, frequently carrying important shipping documents, is received with incorrect addresses. Untold thousands of dollars in foreign-trade business might well hinge upon whether such mail is received or "returned to sender." Large retail establishments with extensive mailing lists essential to their business now find that mail is returned to them, in some cases to the tune of hundreds of pieces per month, because directory service is no longer available. Since the directory service normally was applied only to first-class mail, and since first-class mail always has been self-supporting, no logical reason, in the interest of economy or otherwise, seems to justify its discontinuance in New York.

4. "Business" and "Residential" District Service

Because the Postmaster General's order provided that deliveries in "residential" districts would be restricted to one per day, the city was divided into "business" and "residential" districts. Some unusual results of this apparently arbitrary division have been noted. A large office building has been included in a "residential" area, although its 40 or more tenants all are engaged in business or professional activity, and notwithstanding that it is surrounded on all but one side by business and professional property. Similar instances have been reported where "business" and "residential" postal zoning has resulted in clear inequities, requiring review without delay.

INDICATED ACTION

From all of the facts gathered as a result of the survey, the following conclusions have been reached:

1. In New York City service curtailments effected by the Post Office Department have had a disruptive effect and have increased costs of business operation out of all proportion to the probable economies to be realized. While businessmen generally approve the Postmaster General's desire for economy in a governmental operation, they feel that the postal service to the general public is the last place where economies should be attempted.

2. Reevaluation of services rendered by individual branch offices in New York City should be made at the earliest opportunity. As revealed by the survey, certain branch offices are more important in some respects within the area served than even the general post office. For example, the Bowling Green and Wall Street stations are called upon to handle a large volume of mail, including much special delivery and registered business, generally too great to be handled properly or adequately within the curtailed working hours. They serve by far the greatest part of two business fields, both of which depend upon adequate and efficient postal facilities—export-import and the securities market. They should be authorized to remain open for business during the same daily hours as were effective prior to June 1.

3. A reappraisal, particularly in Manhattan, of what constitutes a business district entitled to three daily deliveries, and a residential district limited to one daily delivery, is clearly indicated. Of the first 20 questionnaires received from business firms located within areas classified as residential, no less than 16, or 80 percent, properly complained they should be within business areas; the 4 noncomplainants were hotels and similar institutions.

The very nature of a city, particularly New York City, requires progressively increasing decentralization by business and industry to areas removed from the business hub. As businesses have moved they have encroached upon and entered into predominantly residential areas; to restrict them to residential service is not only unfair but may well result in future disinclination on the part of new enterprises to locate in available areas outside the limited confines of Manhattan.

4. Second-, third-, and fourth-class mail, and particularly parcel post, have suffered serious setbacks, particularly because of time between dispatch and delivery. No valid reason has been advanced why it should take anywhere from 2 to 7 days for a parcel to travel from one zone in New York City to any other New York zone, yet such delays have become so much more frequent in the past month as to indicate that action is required to expedite this class of mail.

5. Intracity mail procedures must be examined to discover why properly addressed first-class mail should take from 2 to as much as 4 or 5 days in transit from one city office to another. Even assuming heavier daily volume, caused by shorter working days, creates some slowing down, pneumatic tubes carry a large portion of the city's internal mail; and, whereas a letter may be expected upon occasion to arrive 1 day late, more than 1 day's delay (an occurrence only too common since June 1) is inexcusable.

6. Directory service is essential primarily in large urban areas, which are relatively few in number. As an important adjunct of the first-class mail, this service never has caused appreciable drain upon postal revenues so far as may be determined from published figures. In view of its clear importance to the city's business community the directory service should be reinstated in New York as a normal part of first-class service.

7. New York businessmen during the past 5 weeks or more have attempted, through innumerable expedients, to surmount the difficulties raised by early branch office closing hours, all to no avail. Among other methods, they have tried trucking mail to branches other than those customarily used, only to run into parking difficulties, new crowds of mailers, and similar conditions; they have utilized employees' autos to carry parcel post to outlying residential districts for mailing, only to run the dangers attendant upon keeping parcels overnight in the autos before they may be posted; and they have used local mail boxes and chutes, necessitating use of ordinary stamps instead of their postage meters. None of these has been efficacious and all, naturally, have added needless expense to business operations.

8. The association, with almost unanimous spontaneity, is convinced that postal economies and an increase in postal efficiency can both be attained, but not by such cutbacks in service as those now in effect. They point to the Hoover Commission report as the solution to postal problem of service with economy. The Hoover recommendations for streamlining the Post Office Department along realistic, modern lines offer the blueprint for practical economy and efficiency, and adoption is strongly advocated by our membership.

Communism in Yugoslavia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE L. HAYS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including a newspaper article and an editorial, both from the Washington Daily News of August 10, 1950.

Having been in Belgrade last October with the Special Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, I can vouch for the truth of the material in the article by Andrew Tully.

The editorial expresses my sentiments toward Tito exactly, and I agree that America should be very, very careful in dealing with this bloody dictator.

I think both the article and the editorial are worthy of reading by every real American. They follow:

BIG BUICKS FOR YUGOSLAVIA'S BIG WHEELS

(By Andrew Tully)

BELGRADE, August 10.—Only two kinds of autos are seen on Belgrade's streets.

There is the modest, medium-price job driven by Americans and assorted other foreigners, and there is the big Buick with heavy silk curtains affected by top drawer Yugoslav bureaucrats.

These Buicks are glaring symbols for all to see of the contrast in the living standards between the Yugoslav man in the street and his Communist bosses.

While the average man in this "people's republic" walks or rides overcrowded trams on an empty stomach to his one- or two-room apartment shared with three or four other persons, the bureaucrat roars about town in his Buick, eats hearty meals and shacks up at the state's expense in premium housing.

Under the law, top bureaucrats aren't supposed to make more than 10,000 dinars, or $200, a month. There is a strong suspicion that this law is winked at, to put it mildly, for the bureaucrats live on the scale much more lavish than would be possible on 10,000 dinars a month in a town where an omelet for two costs $16.

Even if they stay within the law, however, the bureaucrats can do O. K. They get free housing, and no state functionary is going to try to palm off a slum tenement on an official who may some day occupy a high, dangerous position. Their servants are furnished by the state. They have expense allowances, the details of which are never disclosed, and then there are the Buicks.

In a way, these Buicks are amusing. They represent a throwback to the old European tradition of royalty being too bright for the eyes of the masses. Thus, in this "people's republic," those heavy silk curtains. They are even on convertibles. They expose the phonyness of a state in which men are supposed to be comrades existing on a common level for the good of all.

Marshall Tito himself, of course, is the prime example of this hypocrisy. He lives in splendor that would bankrupt any but the top-drawer kings. In Belgrade, he has two homes—the white palace in town which formerly housed Prince Regent Paul and a villa up in the hills overlooking the city. He summers in Paul's old palace at Bled, has a castle on the island of Brioni in the Adriatic and another villa at Dubrovnic on the lower Adriatic.

Tito is about as close to the people as old Louis XV was to the people of France. He appears in public only after all buildings along the route have been evacuated. Wherever he is, no ordinary Yugoslav can approach any closer than a couple of city blocks. In Brioni, none but officials and servants is permitted on the island while Tito is there, and he is always accompanied by silent, sinister Aleksander Rankovic, vice premier and minister of interior or head of the UDBA secret police.

In fact, there are only two similarities between the people and their bureaucratic bosses. Here, some bureaucrats have steel teeth, like the man in the street, instead of gold ones. And because neckties are considered a bourgeois emblem, the bureaucrats take pride in going about with open collars. The average man, of course, leaves off his necktie because he hasn't the money to buy one.

PLAYING BOTH SIDES

A new term, "Titoism," came into popular usage as a byproduct of the cold war when Yugoslavia was expelled from the Cominform.

In the Communist world it meant treason to Moscow. But outside the iron curtain the term was used to define Communist movements which adhered to Marx but revolted at Russian dictation when it impinged upon national rights and interests.

Wishful thinkers entertained the hope that Titoism, spreading out from Yugoslavia, eventually would undermine the new empire Stalin is building in Asia and eastern Europe.

However, the war in Korea has taken all of the fight out of Yugoslavia's tough-talking dictator and his crew. Begging Moscow for peace, they insist they are not under obligations to or in agreement with any other government or political group—meaning America and her friends. This is quite different from the tune the Titoists sang a few weeks ago when they were seeking loans in this country.

This should be a warning to us to beware of these sudden turncoats who approach us with a tin cup held in bloody hands. For if the tide turns in our favor, the line will form again.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, one of the most beloved and likable Members of the House has decided to retire, J. HARDIN PETERSON, of Florida. All Members of the House are familiar with the devotion to hard work, with the loyalty, with the integrity and capability of Mr. PETERSON.

I had an opportunity to see the high regard and respect that the people of his district had for him, when, several years ago, as a member of the House Public Works Committee, I visited his district in connection with some beach-erosion problems which he sought to have corrected. I found his people devoted to him, and it was easy to see why, because he had for years worked hard to represent them in Congress and had given personal and particular care to each and every problem brought to him for consideration.

Mr. PETERSON'S retirement will be a great loss to the Congress and the Nation. He has served with distinction for years and will leave a void that will be hard to fill.

Communist Propaganda

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. FALLON
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a circular issued and distributed by the Communist Party of Maryland. This circular has been distributed throughout the city of Baltimore and area in an effort to disorganize and cause disunity in our all-out effort to defeat communism in the world. It demands that our American forces be withdrawn from Korea and that we join hands with Stalin and his cohorts. It goes to show what the Commies are doing today and will continue to do. Notwithstanding their attacks upon me in the Daily Worker, and other questionable publications, and their threat to defeat me for reelection, I wish to bring this to the attention of the Members today in the hope that it will speed the enactment of legislation which will control the activities of the Communists and their groups.

The circular represents their same old palaver and follows the Communist Party line of quickly grabbing and capitalizing anything they can get their hands on that will further their cause. In this particular case, it is the statement of a battle-fatigued American soldier which was printed in connection with a war story coming out of Korea.

Certainly we owe it to our fighting men and to ourselves to see that these persons and organizations who are not loyal to this Government be controlled, or deported. While our boys are fighting communism in Korea, the corridors of the Senate and House yesterday were jammed with these very same people who are busying themselves circulating Communist-inspired peace petitions.

It is a sad commentary on the governing body of this country that at a time when our boys are being registered and taken to training camps preparatory to going overseas, that persons of this type on such an un-American mission are permitted to roam the Halls of Congress with their phony peace petitions.

Two weeks ago I contacted J. Edgar Hoover seeking his counsel and recommendations on the type of legislation which would best control communism. I told him that I stand ready to introduce any legislation which he felt would strengthen his hand in controlling subversive persons, or groups, and eliminating by deportation persons who are in this country illegally.

It is the duty of every citizen, and, particularly of their representatives in Congress who speak for them, to establish safeguards that will assure the people of this country freedom from defeatist influences of this kind.

Perplexed United States People Are Wondering Whether To Trust Our Leaders

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEON H. GAVIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Dorothy Thompson from the Washington Evening Star:

PERPLEXED UNITED STATES PEOPLE ARE WONDERING WHETHER TO TRUST OUR LEADERS

(By Dorothy Thompson)

We are on the way toward a general mobilization, economically and militarily. In the event of the continuation of the war in Korea, which if not settled by the United Nations, will necessitate the reconquest of the peninsula, the people of the United States can anticipate total conscription and total control of everything—life, labor, capital, and income—by the state. In short, and by whatever name it is called we can anticipate that coercive military and bureaucratic state collectivism which, when practiced elsewhere, we call communism.

Accompanying this development will be the old demand for unity, the protest "Don't rock the boat," and the urge to trust our leaders. To raise disagreeable questions will soon become tantamount to conspiring with the enemy.

Before this state of affairs is achieved and we are reduced to the condition described in the late George Orwell's 1948, let us then raise a few questions.

WHY TRUST OUR LEADERS?

Why should we trust our leaders?

Have the policies they have hitherto pursued brought us peace, stability, and international security, or have they brought us war, inflation, and international chaos?

We have had a continuing administration in office since 1933, or at least have one now, which has defended all the international acts of its predecessors backed up by bipartisan Republicans. Many of the persons who advised these acts are still advising. It is now apparent that they did not know for what purpose they were leading us in the last war; that they were afflicted with an almost incredible blindness to geographical, political, and social realities; that, for the sake of world peace, they vested the security of the United States in an international organization incapable, because of its composition and structure, of framing let alone enforcing international law, and that now, via that body, we are again engaged in war for the purpose of enforcing peace.

Now, "war" is not "peace," despite the new vocabulary which manages to define things by their exact opposites. Nor are "United Nations" repelling aggression in Korea. Soldiers of the United States are, so far unsuccessfully, trying to reverse an aggression initiated by another member of the United Nations, whose delegate is presently president of its Security Council. Without the Russians, the United Nations was, briefly an alliance against aggressive communism, resting on the real and potential forces of the United States. With the Russians it is a fiction. But for the sake of this fiction real persons—almost entirely Americans—are risking and losing their real lives.

FEELING OF UNREALITY

It is no wonder that bewildered Americans have a strange feeling of total unreality about the struggle, as though it were a dream.

For what is its object—its tangible, not fictional, object? The fiction (as it turned out) was the hope that a decisive action by the United States would, of itself, bring about a halt in hostilities or by putting overwhelming force against an aggressor, he could be halted in his aggression. Well, the overwhelming force was not on the spot, nor is it in existence. What force could be mustered had to be imported, and before it got there the aggressor was in occupation all over the place, and now he cannot be halted he must be driven back, during which process most of South, and perhaps North Korea will be destroyed.

Assuming that this can be accomplished—what then?

Korea (like Europe) is a peninsula of Asia. It is bounded on land by Red China (estimated population 400,000,000), and flanked by the Soviet Union (estimated population with European satellites 300,000,000).

That is three-quarters of a billion, all armed.

Question: Can the United States continue to police the Korean peninsula (assuming that we win the localized war) without an Asiatic ally? Shall we rearm Japan to police Asia in behalf of the white man's peace? Or can we do this with the aid of troops from Australia and South Africa, both of which countries practice white supremacy? Can we police the whole Eurasian continent, three-quarters of the globe, militarily and economically organized from the Russian center, the colossus that now stands astride the great continent, with one foot on the Elbe and the other on the border of India—which stride the policies of our leaders encouraged her to take?

Apparently our leaders (if they are thinking) are thinking in terms of the British policing of the nineteenth century, when naval power was decisive and control of the peninsulas of Eurasia was sufficient to police a divided mainland. Today that notion is idiotic.

Recognition of Communist Russia—the Greatest Blunder of All

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL B. DAGUE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. DAGUE. Mr. Speaker, in any consideration which may be given to the series of administration blunders which have culminated in our present war in Korea priority must be given to our original recognition of Communist Russia. Throughout the terms of three Republican Presidents we steadfastly refused to recognize the Red regime as anything other than a band of lawless psychopaths and continued to deny to them that place in our official intercourse which is reserved for those who follow the basic rules of civilization.

When the New Deal came to power, however, one of its first acts was to extend to these brigands full recognition as a sovereign nation, which we know now was nothing more than an invitation for the Reds to embark upon their studied program of undertaking to sabotage and wreck our free Government and besmirch our democratic way of life.

Today we are locked in a bloody conflict with forces which have been launched by Soviet Russia and it makes even less sense than it did in 1933 that we should continue recognition of this group of lawless killers. Certainly a review of history will reveal that we have repeatedly withdrawn our diplomats from other countries when the provocation was not half so great and it seems to me as only a logical conclusion that we should without hesitation sever all ties with the Kremlin and thus announce to the world that we will no longer traffic with these international pariahs.

There will, of course, be a protesting wail from those who will argue that we will thus lose a valuable listening post where we could keep tabs on the gyrations of the Cominform but to that I would simply inquire as to just what of value we have gleaned from our present official contacts. Certainly, we got nothing which gave us a clue to the plan to invade Korea and certainly, too, continued association with thieves and murderers can only result in the lessening of our stature in the commonwealth of nations.

Incidentally, I feel that there are a great many in the administration today who realize that extending diplomatic recognition to Russia was a mistake. It may well be, therefore, that smarting under the just criticism now being directed at the White House, a move may be made just prior to the election in November to regain favor with a disgusted and disillusioned public by canceling our relations with the U. S. S. R. and it is with that in mind that I am now putting myself on record, as a Republican, as favoring such action.

Truman and His Advisers Were Warned of War in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the Democratic administration had plenty of warning that war was about to break out in Korea. The statements of surprise by Mr. Truman, Mr. Acheson, and Mr. Johnson was a false front to conceal the real facts.

Mr. Ray Tucker, in his column on August 8, points out revealing facts that the people of this country should have. I include the salient statements from his account as part of my remarks:

NATIONAL WHIRLIGIG—DATA SHOWS TRUMAN, AIDES WERE WARNED OF KOREA WAR

(By Ray Tucker)

WASHINGTON.—Documented evidence presented to the House Armed Services Committee by Rear Adm. Roscoe H. Hillenkoetter, head of the Central Intelligence Agency, convinces both Democratic and Republican members of that body that President Truman, Secretary Acheson, and Secretary Johnson were given full warning of the North Korean attack on June 25, but failed to heed it.

The contrary testimony of Admiral Hillenkoetter and Secretary Johnson has precipitated demands for impeachment of the national defense head, for a majority of the members believe the Intelligence Chieftain, on the basis of the factual reports he turned over to the White House, the State Department, and the Pentagon Building for more than a year.

BLAME

They find it impossible to reconcile the facts and figures in the intelligence file with Mr. Johnson's flat statement before the committee to the effect that "the North Korean attack came as a complete surprise to us."

* * * * *

AGREEMENT

Admiral Hillenkoetter's reports on North Korean preparations for war covered the period from February 28, 1949, to June 23, 1950, 2 days before the invasion itself. They were delivered to the three top officials periodically—sometimes daily, semiweekly, or weekly.

The most informative data, which was relayed to the White House and the two other departments in May of 1949, told of a secret agreement looking toward aggression between the North Korean Government and Russia. It leaves no doubt of Stalin's inspiration of the present conflict.

PACT

Under this pact, Russia was permitted to assign 50 military officers to the North Korea capital to plan the strategy. The number was later increased to 100.

Russia also agreed to furnish trucks, tanks, aircraft, artillery, ammunition, and all other kinds of war material.

North Korea promised to build or repair docks, railroads, highways, and warehouses for transporting and storing these supplies pending zero hour.

TESTED

Admiral Hillenkoetter subsequently reported that on quiet Sunday mornings the Communist forces created disturbances in border villages, made feint attacks, and tested the strength of opposing southern forces.

In view of these depredations, he forecast that withdrawal of our occupation army would precipitate a large-scale invasion.

In April of this year Intelligence gave word that the military material promised by Russia under the 1949 agreement was beginning to reach North Korea.

On June 10, Admiral Hillenkoetter told how all civilians had been evacuated from a zone two kilometers deep just north of the thirty-eighth parallel. That is always a routine, prewar precaution.

On June 19, White House, State Department, and Pentagon were warned of intense concentration of troops in this evacuated no man's land, and a massing of material. On June 23, 2 days before the take-off, an invasion within a few days or weeks was predicted.

GOAT

The committee, including such a loyal Democrat as CARL VINSON of Georgia, Armed Services chairman, insists that it has no alternative except to believe that Secretary Johnson, as spokesman for the administration, was seeking to avoid responsibility for the debacle.

Although no high official has dared to hold MacArthur at fault, there have been suggestions by prominent Democrats on Capitol Hill that the blame should be unloaded on our commander at Tokyo. In view of these Central Intelligence reports, MacArthur seems a likely "goat" as Admiral Kimmel and General Short were so pictured in the Pearl Harbor disaster.

RESPONSIBILITY

But "Mac" is too smart to be caught that way. In a public statement, he has made clear that, until President Truman decided to resist the North Koreans' invasion, this area was never included within his command. Every newspaper and magazine correspondent in the Far East has given testimony to that fact.

In short, the accumulating evidence seems to make it impossible for Harry S. Truman, Dean Acheson, and Louis A. Johnson to escape individual and collective responsibility.

Military Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1950

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include at this point in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Boston Herald, Monday, July 24, 1950, entitled "Freedom Legion":

FREEDOM LEGION

Where the Communists have outstripped us is in innovation. While we have fought diplomatically and militarily on traditional lines—even the strategic A-bomb is a classical use of a new weapon—the Soviet has set out radically. In China it helped the native Communists take over an agrarian revolution. In Czechoslovakia it won a nation by infiltration into the government. Even its military flanking maneuvers in Korea are a new use of an old strategy. And its stunt of exhausting the west by multiple crisis is a considerable improvement on the Hitler technique.

Let's take one respect in which we have not failed to use any bold thinking. The west is desperately in need of fighting men, not only in Korea, but to stand ready in any of the half dozen danger areas. Yet we leave millions on our side unarmed.

There are the west Germans. Among them are fine fighting material and able officers. The Communists are arming the east Germans into a powerful military force. Yet we have found no way to arm the men on our side of the border. Even the appeal of Chancelor Adenauer for 25,000 Federal police is understood to have been rejected, in favor of enlargement of the State police.

Of course there are considerable political problems involved: The French particularly are afraid of any renascence of the German military might. But is there no way out?

There are the Japanese—the finest kind of fighting men we could get for Asiatic engagement. Yet we leave them unarmed, adding to the economic difficulties of the occupied nation. Again there are strong arguments why we should not arm them as a Japanese force, in violation of their constitution and in the peril of a revived militarism. But is there no other solution?

There are the hosts of east European refugees in DP camps in Germany, as Edgar Ansel Mowrer indicated on his page the other day. Unquestionably there are anti-Communists in China who have refused to serve the Nationalists but would join some international freedom force.

What to do to gather these millions into such a force organized, weaponed, and officered, is a challenge to our resourcefulness. Perhaps it can be done through the United Nations, by a UN force subject to the assembly where the Russian veto would not apply. Perhaps it could be done through regional organizations, such as the Atlantic Council. It is not inconceivable that it could be an American foreign legion provided with safeguards against its use for any other purposes than those prescribed by the UN.

The point is, here is the enormous pool of manpower ready, even eager, to join the defenses against communistic tyranny. Here are we who desperately need their aid. Yet because there is no conventional method to join the two, we struggle along without them.

The Russians have been outthinking us. They organize a tributary economy to consolidate the productive forces behind the iron curtain, yet we have difficulty working out the minor advances of a steel pool. True, it is more difficult to make democratic nations march together than to regiment satellites, but all it demands is a more imaginative, a bolder, approach.

We let the Germans get away with their propaganda about potato bugs dropped on east Germany, and fail to make the imaginative answer, the shipment of free DDT to the east German farmers, as Senator FLANDERS suggested the other day.

This is a new day in world conflict when the old ways won't do. Communism could win just because we never found a way to unite her enemies effectively.

Will Whittington Retires

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, with the adjournment of the Eighty-first Congress the House of Representatives will lose one of its most valuable and respected Members, the Honorable WILL WHITTINGTON of Mississippi, who has voluntarily elected to retire after a long and distinguished tenure as a Member of the House.

I have had the privilege of serving with him as a Member of the House Public Works Committee, under his competent leadership as chairman of that committee. His knowledge of the many and various bills and issues that have come before that committee for consideration is remarkable. He has been influential in the passage of the first flood-control bill which has been such a great help to the Nation as a whole and to Los Angeles County in particular. I knew of the great and beneficial work of Mr. WHITTINGTON long before I came to Congress, in connection with my services as a member of Los Angeles County Flood Control Board. Mr. WHITTINGTON is held in high esteem in Los Angeles County because many thousands of acres of land, many homes and public highways, and many lives are safer from the destruction by floods on account of Mr. WHITTINGTON's thoughtful consideration of our flood problems when he was chairman of the House Flood Control Committee and later as chairman of the House Public Works Committee.

I personally regret to see Mr. WHITTINGTON retire from service in the House. His competent and capable services will be missed and difficult to replace. It is my sincere hope that he may have many years of health and happiness which he has earned and deserves because of the years of faithful service he has rendered to the Nation.

The Boy Scout Court of Honor, Tyrone, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, it was my great honor and privilege to address the Boy Scout Court of Honor at Camp Anderson, near Tyrone, Pa., on August 6, 1950.

My address follows:

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY REPRESENTATIVE JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, TWENTY-SECOND DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA, AT THE BOY SCOUT COURT OF HONOR, PORTER DISTRICT BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA, TYRONE, PA., AUGUST 6, 1950

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, Scout leaders and Scouts, I am highly honored by the kind invitation to participate in the annual program incident to the Boy Scout Court of Honor, of the Porter District Boy Scouts of America.

In accepting your kind invitation, I am reminded of the fact that the Scouting movement is recognized as one of the finest programs ever conceived for the development of youth and the building of good citizenship.

I recall that it was in the performance of a good turn by an unknown London Boy Scout that paved the way for the introduction of the Scouting movement in America.

It was a foggy night in London in the fall of 1909 when an unknown Boy Scout helped Mr. William D. Boyce, a Chicago publisher, to find a difficult address in old London. Mr. Boyce offered the Scout a shilling as a tip, which was courteously refused in these words—"No thank you, sir; I am a Scout, and a Scout never accepts tips for being helpful."

Mr. Boyce expressed surprise and inquired what the boy meant. The boy in turn expressed astonishment that anyone did not know of Baden-Powell's Boy Scouts and asked permission to take Mr. Boyce to the headquarters of the British Boy Scouts.

There he was told of the experience of Robert S. S. Baden-Powell, later Lord Baden-Powell, when he went to South Africa as a member of the British constabulary during the Boer War, 1899–1902. Baden-Powell was dismayed to find that recruits sent to him lacked the fundamentals of dependability, resourcefulness, self-reliance, and cooperation.

Baden-Powell planned outdoor recreation programs to develop his men and make them strong and reliant.

In 1903, when he returned to England he found that his program was being used by leaders in boys' work. In 1907 he organized a Boy Scout troop and took 20 boys to a camp on Brownsea Island off the English coast to try out the idea. It proved a tremendous success and the Scouting movement became a reality with many more troops being organized.

The motto "Be Prepared" was adapted from the law of survival in the jungle and is inscribed on the Scout badge.

Mr. Boyce, the Chicago publisher, after hearing the story of Baden Powell and his founding of the Boy Scout movement, was so impressed that he secured and brought with him to America a trunkful of literature on the subject as well as uniforms, badges, and insignia.

Forty years ago, on February 8, 1910, the Boy Scouts of America were organized by an act of incorporation as an organization in the District of Columbia. Thus Scouting in America was born in the Nation's Capital. In 1916 the organization was officially recognized by Congress when a Federal charter was approved and signed by President Woodrow Wilson.

Nearly 2,000,000 American Boy Scouts are banded together this year under the 1950 Boy Scout slogan, "Strengthen the Arm of Liberty."

The fine spirit symbolized in the famous Statue of Liberty is not a theory, but an actual practice of the whole Scout family.

For it is in Scouting that you will find Cub Scouts, Boy Scouts, Senior Scouts, and all of their leaders pledged to practice clean living in their daily lives. They provide the strength that is found in the Scouting movement and are responsible for the remarkable record achieved in the development of character and good citizenship.

Many of the Boy Scouts of yesterday have served their country with valor and distinction in two world wars. Tonight in the rice paddies of Korea, thousands of miles from home and fireside, many former Scouts are among the gallant men of our Armed Forces fighting valiantly despite tremendous odds, against the godless communistic hordes that seek to extinguish the torch of liberty and plunge the world into slavery and spiritual darkness.

Kelly, Anderson, Hansen, Donovan, Silberstein, and Warder are only a handful of names of former Boy Scouts whose fame is forever written in the history books of our Nation.

Their names are indicative of the many races and creeds that make up America.

One of the finest tributes ever paid to the Boy Scouts is recorded in the words of Fleet Admiral Chester W. Nimitz when he said after World War II, "Forty percent of the men I commanded in the Pacific had been Boy Scouts. But that 40 percent won 60 percent of the awards for valor."

These words of Admiral Nimitz further justify the ideals and the visions of the early leaders in the Scouting movement.

In paying tribute to these former Boy Scouts as American war heroes, we are reminded that their brother Scouts in Europe and the Philippines also served the cause of liberty with honor and distinction, for the Scouting movement is international in scope.

It is our hope and prayer that the principles of Scouting may be inscribed on the hearts of the youth of all nations and aid in hastening the day when we may enjoy true brotherhood among all nations.

The history of World War II reveals that the first steps taken by Mussolini and Hitler were to subjugate youth and banish the Boy Scout movement.

In Japan the same diabolical tactics were employed by the dictator regime as it captured and enslaved youth in its mad desire for world conquest.

The Japanese in China sank to the lowest depths by encouraging the cultivation of opium and then selling the drug to Chinese youth, mindful that in China boys 13 years of age were eligible for military service.

By contrast here in America during World War II, our youth were more fortunate. It is true that child labor legislation was modified to help the manpower situation and, as a result, there was a marked increase in the use of America's youth in industry. But the employment of our youthful citizens was kept within reasonable bounds.

Boy Scouts in America rendered conspicuous service to their country during World War II by engaging in scores of activities connected with the war effort, among which were the collecting of tin, waste paper, and metal, and the selling of war bonds.

In all these projects Boy Scouts achieved a remarkable record for industry and faithfulness to these patriotic tasks.

Today as we witness the war clouds gathering again over a troubled and anxious world, we are shocked at the realization that the so-called "police action" in Korea may prove to be the first shot in world war III.

It is deplorable to realize that the youth of the world is face to face every few years with devastating wars.

If the principles of Scouting could be inscribed on the hearts of the youth of all nations, the world could look to the future with confidence.

That is the crusade that world Scouting must carry on to a successful conclusion.

Here in America we all have a mission to perform in meeting our responsibilities to the youth of this Nation. I know of no finer means of accomplishing our mission than by continued support and interest in the Scouting movement.

I want to congratulate you mothers and fathers, relatives and friends for the active support you are giving the Boy Scout movement in this area.

Your presence here this evening is a tribute to the Scouting movement for you are giving not only active and moral support in particular to all the Boy Scouts of Porter district, but in general to the Boy Scouts of America.

At these ceremonies today Boy Scouts of all grades are honored and rewarded for the progress they have made and for the credits they have justly earned. These Scouts could not have made such fine progress unless they had Scout leaders who were interested in them and parents and relatives who encouraged them.

Tyrone and vicinity may well feel proud of its youthful citizens for they reflect due credit on their parents, teachers, churches, and the civic and fraternal organizations who have demonstrated a lively interest in their welfare.

These Boys Scouts, junior citizens of today, are the future senior citizens who are going to carry on what you have started.

The boy today will be the man tomorrow who will sit where you are sitting and attend, when you are gone, to those things which you think are so important.

You may adopt all the policies you please, but how they will be carried out depends upon him. He will sit in your legislatures, and occupy places in the courts of your land.

The boy of today will assume control of your cities, State, and Nation; your prisons, churches, hospitals, schools, universities, and corporations.

All your work is going to be judged, and praised, or condemned by him. Your reputation and future are in his hands.

Whether you realize it or not, all your work is for the boy of today. The fate of the Nation and humanity rests with him. Since all this is true, is it not evident that we should continue to pay the boy of today the attention he deserves?

We can do this very thing by continuing to give our wholehearted support to the Scouting movement and its program of building better citizens; and by awakening the interest of our neighbors who may not have had an opportunity to appreciate the widespread benefits that accrue from the Scouting movement.

A boy has been defined as—

A piece of skin stretched over an appetite.

A noise covered with dirt.

Like an iceberg, seven-eighths of him is hidden away, waiting for some explorer to come along.

He is called a tornado, because he comes at the most unexpected times, hits the most unexpected places—and leaves a wreck behind him.

He can run like a deer, climb like a squirrel, bellow like a bull, balk like a mule and eat like a horse.

He is a growing animal of superlative promise—to be fed, watered, and kept warm.

A joy forever, a periodic nuisance, the problem of our times—the hope of a nation.

Every new boy born is evidence that God is not yet discouraged with man.

A Boy Scout has been defined as a youngster from 9 to 16 years of age who belongs to an organization that provides its members with clean fun, lasting ideals, and whose basic job is character building and citizenship training.

The Scout oath requires that a tenderfoot Scout shall promise: "On my honor I will do my best; To do my duty to God and my country and to obey the Scout law; to help other people at all times; to keep myself physically strong, mentally awake, and morally straight."

The Scout law requires that a Scout be trustworthy, loyal, helpful, friendly, courteous, kind, obedient, cheerful, thrifty, brave, clean, and reverent.

As you look into the shining faces of these eager and resourceful Boy Scouts here today, you have a good example of the succers achieved by the Scouting movement. No wonder you mothers and fathers are beaming with joy, for you have a right to be proud of your son's progress in the realm of Scouting.

Certainly there are no problems of juvenile delinquency among these wholesome American boys.

Today, as never before in the history of the world, we need men with the qualities of real leadership It is such leadership that the Scouting movement develops and nurtures

At the same time, it teaches boys the priceless virtue of doing things together in a spirit of cooperation and teamwork. There is no time for grandstand players, because the emphasis is placed on the group. This spirit of cooperation is needed in America today as we face what may prove to be the greatest crisis in the history of this Nation.

Tonight we are part of a world that is in turmoil. Nations still distrust each other despite two global wars that were supposed to be fought to rescue humanity from slavery and to build a world where all of its inhabitants might dwell in peace.

While we survey this unhappy situation we realize that all our confidence and hope for a better world depends upon the youth of today. Meditate for a moment on the potential power the American boy represents with his energy, vitality, and boundless enthusiasm.

If all of these boyish attributes are developed in the right manner we need have no fear of the future when these junior citizens become the citizens of tomorrow.

Our influence on the youth of today is of paramount importance. If we shirk our duty we cannot escape the fact that we are responsible to a marked degree for our failure in building good citizens.

The American boy needs our guidance and support during his formative years because without it, evil influences can corrupt and lead him astray.

One of the outstanding laws of the Boy Scouts is that he must be reverent toward God. Teaching a boy to be faithful in his religious duties and to respect the convictions of others in matters of custom and religion is the sure way of banishing intolerance, bigotry, and racial persecution.

It promotes love of God and respect and affection for our neighbor, and puts in actual practice the divine command "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart, thy whole soul, and thy whole mind—and thy neighbor as thyself."

A godless nation cannot long survive even though it may lull its citizenry to sleep with the promise of an abundant life without the cares and worries that make up the art of living.

In short—we need religion in our daily lives, for a life without love of God is barren and fruitless. In like manner, nations that turned their backs on God crumbled away and their prestige and glory are relics of the dim past.

With this thought in mind, we should be grateful that the 2,000,000 Boy Scouts in America are imbued with love of God and their neighbor.

This deep-seated reverence for divine providence is one of the foundation stones upon which the Scouting movement has flourished in the United States.

In closing, I hope that all of us will take renewed faith in the youth of our Nation from the ceremony we have witnessed here this Sabbath evening.

When we think of the regimentation of youth in Germany, Italy, Japan, China, and Russia, we should utter a sincere prayer of thanks to Almighty God that American youth is not recruited into shirted brigades like those organized by Hitler and other dictators.

Let us solemnly resolve that we shall keep forever before our American youth the great moral principles upon which this Nation was founded and which are encouraged and fostered by that great youth organization—the Boy Scouts of America.

For What Are You Willing To Pay Taxes?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by Willford I. King:

FOR WHAT ARE YOU WILLING TO PAY TAXES?

(By Willford I. King)

It can be taken for granted that you, Mr. Typical Thrifty American, being a patriotic citizen, are willing to pay to any feasible extent such taxes as are required to win the war. President Truman says he needs immediately for that purpose an extra $14,000,000,000. That means around a dollar per day per family—and a dollar missing each 24 hours puts a decided crimp in the average household's spending money.

Being intelligent, you know that there is no possibility of financing the war by soaking the rich, for the present total after-tax income of all of those fortunate enough to get $50,000 per year, before taxes, is probably less than $2,000,000,000, or a mere seventh of the amount for which Mr. Truman is asking. Willy-nilly, you, and I, and other plain everyday Americans are going to be compelled to pay practically all of the war costs.

Being familiar with business affairs, you also know that, in a competitive society, the efficiency of an enterprise is generally indicated best by the size of its profits; and, understanding human psychology, you are likewise aware that burdensome levies on profits (excess or normal), and confiscatory taxes on high incomes take away the incentives which induce the leaders of our great industries to work tirelessly to establish new production records. And, when these keymen slacken their endeavors, output falls, and the volume of sorely needed supplies moving to the front diminishes. You do not want this to happen; hence you will cheerfully pay whatever taxes are required to keep production at a maximum.

Furthermore, you prefer to be taxed openly rather than to have your savings surreptitiously filched away by inflation—a device used to cover up the fact that the national budget is unbalanced. And you are not going to be "kidded" into accepting the view that the rise in the price level which confiscates your savings is the result of hoarding or profiteering by some wicked scoundrels. The Congressmen and the officials who permit a Government deficit to continue are the real villains.

Because you know that efficiency is needed even more in wartime than in peacetime, you naturally object strenuously to paying out your good money to hire a vast army of bureaucrats and clerks to administer price controls, production controls, priorities, allocations, and other devices the prime results of which are to waste the time of people who ought to be helping with the war effort, create scarcity where otherwise there would be abundance, and bring daily weariness to the millions of housewives who must stand in line to get daily necessities.

Yes, you are willing to make whatever sacrifices are really necessary to do your part in winning the war, but are you equally ready to make sacrifices to facilitate the process of turning our country into a socialistic or fascistic state? In other words, are you ready to spend your hard-earned dollars to help our Federal Government take over little by little our school system, our power projects, our banking and insurance business, our medical care, and our housing industry? You are well aware that the socialistic nations of western Europe took over their large industries a few years ago so that their governments could be supported by the profits of these enterprises, thus largely eliminating the need for taxation. How has this arrangement worked out? All the industries have proved to be "white elephants," for they are running huge deficits which the European governments are meeting partly by added taxes and partly by inflation.

Their experience furnishes an excellent illustration of the inefficiency inherent in the business undertakings of democratic governments. Among the reasons accounting for it are the following:

1. Governments must keep prices of their products low in order to catch the votes of the consumers.

2. Governments must keep wage rates high in order to secure the backing of the workers.

3. If appropriations are not fully spent this year, appropriations for next year are likely to be reduced.

4. The bureau chief's pay, power, and prestige commonly depend upon the number of persons working under him; hence he opposes any measures tending to reduce the number of his subordinates.

5. To maintain efficiency in a bureau or office requires constant effort, and the bureau chief does not profit financially if expenses are lowered, and is not out of pocket if money is wasted.

Senator HARRY F. BYRD, outstanding statesman and one of the Nation's most thorough students of Federal finance, asserts in a recently published letter that, by discontinuing various socialistic Federal projects, by cutting out numerous luxury items, and by vigorously eliminating waste all along the line, it is entirely feasible to trim $10,000,000,000 from the Federal budget without in any way hampering our war effort. Cutting the President's demands for new revenue from $14,000,000,000 to $4,000,000,000 would reduce the average family's daily new tax burden from about a dollar to less than 30 cents. Do you choose to have that remaining 70 cents per day devoted to paying for waste, for hiring regulators to hamper production and annoy you, and to further socialistic undertakings, or do you prefer to have the personal privilege of spending it for family needs? Bear in mind that to pay for $10,000,000,000 needless, nondefense expenditure would cost 100 percent tax rise in corporation taxes, or 60 percent increase in all personal income taxes. Do you want to pay this for needless waste in Washington?

Mr. Typical Thrifty American, this is your Government. Even the highest officials keep their ears to the ground. Whatever policy you demand clearly and forcefully, they will follow. For just what purpose are you willing to pay taxes? It is up to you to decide and to express your viewpoint to your Congressman and the President.

The Copper Import Tax Should Be Retained

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN B. BENNETT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, there is no valid reason for further suspension of the import tax on copper.

This important natural resource is as much entitled to tariff protection as any other domestic commodity. There is no basis for singling out copper for chastisement. The special interests which advocate suspension of the import tax on copper are the very ones who would cry most bitterly if there was a general suspension of all import taxes.

Under leave to extend my own remarks, I include a letter which I wrote to the editor of the Washington Daily News on this subject, his editorial in reply to my letter, and my reply to the editorial:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 28, 1950.

Mr. JOHN T. O'ROURKE,
Editor, Washington Daily News,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. O'ROURKE: Your editorial in yesterday's paper on the suspension of the import tax on copper is one of the most unfair and distorted pieces I have read in a long time. The gist of your contention is that reimposing the tariff would be unpatriotic at a time when there is a shortage of copper in this country; and in violation of our good neighbor policy with Latin America. These arguments are ridiculous for the following reasons:

1. The testimony presented to the House Ways and Means Committee on this legislation was undisputed that the suspension of the tariff would have no effect whatever upon the amount of copper imported—it wouldn't increase it or decrease it.

2. Most of our imported copper comes from Chile. The 2 cents per pound tax is the result of a reciprocal trade agreement entered into with Chile in 1947. Since when has it been regarded as an unfriendly act to require a foreign country to carry out a voluntary agreement? The original 4 cents per pound tax was reduced to 2 cents as a result of this agreement.

3. Ninety-six percent of the Chilean copper is controlled and produced by two large monopoly copper companies in the United States. Who is the good neighbor to be affected by the tariff? The Chilean Government—or the American companies who own all the Chilean copper?

4. There is an import tax on lead and zinc. There is also an import tax on other strategic metals. We are importing large quantities of all these metals. Why should copper be singled out for suspension?

In March of last year when the tariff on copper was suspended, the price fell from 23½ cents a pound to 16 cents a pound in a few weeks' time. This precipitous price drop had the effect of closing all of the copper mines in Michigan, and many of those in the western States. During the period our domestic mines were closed nearly 300,000,000 pounds of copper came to the United States from foreign countries. While thousands of copper miners in the United States were walking the streets looking for jobs the Chilean and African copper miners continued in their employment. Is this the kind of good-neighbor policy you are advocating?

Your reference to Korea as a reason for suspending the tariff is a smokescreen. Domestic copper has always been our principal source of supply in fighting wars. When we take down our tariff barriers we put a large segment of domestic mining industry in jeopardy. As a result we make ourselves more and more dependent on foreign sources of supply. Do you think it is wise to place ourselves in that kind of a position?

In fairness I think you ought to have your editorial writer get the facts about the copper tariff, and revise the erroneous statements he has made.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN B. BENNETT,
Member of Congress.

REPLY TO REPRESENTATIVE BENNETT

We print a letter from Representative JOHN B. BENNETT, Republican, of Michigan, in the adjoining column, disagreeing with our opposition to an import tariff on copper at this time.

He says our position is unfair, distorted, and ridiculous.

He is entitled to his opinion.

He says that the copper tax was duly negotiated, and asks since when has it been unfriendly to require performance of a voluntary agreement? Like Shylock's bond.

He says copper mines in Chile, which produce most of our imported copper, are controlled by two American monopolies, and why should a tax on them affect the Chilean Government? Certainly Representative BENNETT isn't serious when he asks that one. The thousands of Chilean miners' jobs involved, the Chilean taxes, the fact that a large segment of the Chilean economy depends on copper make it obvious that there are profound political implications.

Furthermore, we don't understand about those two monopolies. We thought monopoly meant one. If there's collusion between United States companies—and who are we to deny it?—Representative BENNETT should call on the Justice Department and report what he knows about a violation of the antitrust laws.

He says lead and zinc carry import taxes; why not copper. Without going lengthily into the political economics of lead and copper, we wouldn't know whether the cases are parallel or not. We can't answer that one.

He says we fought previous wars on domestic copper. Could be. But it is certainly a fact that today we are using up about twice as much copper as we produce from domestic mines. With world war III threatening, isn't it better to have too much than too little? Right now we have too little. Furthermore, we can't depend on production from high-cost, marginal domestic mines to fill the gap. In that case, the too little might arrive too late.

Is Representative BENNETT fighting for these high cost, inefficient marginal mines that can only operate at an artificially high price? It would seem so.

He says that when the copper tariff was suspended in 1947, copper dropped from 23½ cents to 16 cents. He infers that these events are related. We can find no connection. The depression-born copper tariff was suspended at the beginning of World War II.

It was suspended for the very reasons we urge that the suspension be continued now; to give us more copper, and to stimulate the economy and production in Chile, one of the friendly democratic governments in South America.

Certain inefficient high cost marginal mines may need tariff protection, even in these days of short copper supply, and their owners may contribute to the political campaigns of legislators who may feel as they do about protective tariffs. Furthermore, we agree, such protective tariffs may create jobs for miners in marginal mines.

But that won't get the country cheaper copper, nor more copper.

And, to paraphrase Representative BENNETT, that's not the kind of policy-making we advocate.

We have a suggestion, though:

Continue suspension of the copper tariff for 1 year.

During that year, work out a bill containing a formula providing for reimposition of a copper tariff if, as, and when foreign copper gluts the domestic market and average-cost domestic mines cannot meet the competition. Please note the words, average-cost.

Can anyone quarrel with that?

Yes. Some political champions of owners of inefficient, poor-strain mines can and will oppose it, even if their policies contain a danger to the country.

We assure Representative BENNETT that if mine State Senators logroll the tariff on copper, those mine State Senators and those Senators who helped them will have selfishly and shortsightedly set in motion a whole series of adverse political reactions in Latin America, which can only aid the disruptive Communist activities there, and will have deprived this country of a critical metal in a time of urgent need.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 5, 1950.

Mr. JOHN T. O'ROURKE,
Editor, Washington Daily News,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. O'ROURKE: I do not want to carry on a protracted argument with you about the copper import tax, but I do feel that I should comment briefly on your editorial replying to my letter.

You continue to imply that an import tax will affect the amount of copper imported. Are you not deliberatey ignoring the undisputed fact that the amount of copper imported will not be affected—tariff or no tariff? If you remove that contention from your editorial you would have one argument remaining; namely, that we ought to look to the welfare of the Chilean copper miner ahead of the welfare of the domestic copper miner.

If you eliminate the so-called marginal copper mines which produce about 20 percent of our domestic supply you thus increase our dependence upon foreign copper to that extent. It is true that marginal mines are more costly to operate, because many of them get their ores more than a mile below the earth's surface. Certainly this makes for high-cost production as compared to open-pit mining. But don't overlook the fact that these marginal mines provide large quantities of copper; and they have been desperately needed every time this country has been faced with a real emergency. I want to keep those mines in business, and I want to assure continued jobs for thousands of miners who work in them. I want a copper tariff to protect these miners against the slave wages that are paid the copper miners in Chile, Africa, and elsewhere. The issue is that simple.

You argue that a shortage of copper in the United States justifies the removal of the import tax. That same argument could be used with respect to hundreds of other commodities which are in short supply, and yet you are not contending that there should be an across-the-board suspension of tariffs. There might be some merit to your position if you were urging suspension on every commodity in short supply. For example, I am sure you know there is a tariff on products manufactured with copper. Is it fair to permit the purchaser of raw copper to buy it duty free, and then protect him with a tariff on the articles he manufactures with copper? Do you believe in that kind of rank discrimination?

If you don't want to be fair, at least you could be logical on this issue and urge the Congress suspend tariffs on all articles in short supply instead of isolating copper for this chastisement. That would put the subject in its proper perspective even though it might leave you on the end of a limb.

Very truly yours,

JOHN B. BENNETT,
Member of Congress.

Where Does Our Defense Money Go?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. NORRIS COTTON

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. COTTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the New Hampshire Morning Union, Manchester, N. H., Tuesday, August 8, 1950:

WHERE DOES OUR DEFENSE MONEY GO?

Chairman VINSON, of the House Armed Services Committee wants to know what the Government has to show for the military expenditures of the past 4 years. Since July 1946 approximately $50,000,000,000 has been spent on national defense. This is not a negligible sum. During the last fiscal year, defense costs totaled a sum equivalent to defense expenditures for the 16 fiscal years preceding Pearl Harbor.

Yet the war in Korea finds us short of almost everything that is needed. The President has been compelled to ask for additional appropriations to provide guns and tanks and planes, and to meet our military manpower requirements. It is logical to ask what became of the $50,000,000,000 already spent. Where did it go?

An answer to this question is given by the staff of United States News and World Report in its issue of July 18, following an exhaustive investigation. This answer makes some startling revelations. It discloses that two-thirds of all military spending went for services performed, not for weapons or military supplies. These services include wages, travel, telephone bills, freight costs, rents, pensions, and other services. In addition, eight billion was spent on supplies already used up, such as food, fuel, ammunition, clothing, and materials of all kinds.

Of the defense dollars spent for wages, the United States News reports that eighteen and seven-tenths billion went to noncombat servicemen and civilians, while only six and two-tenths billion went to men in the combat units. Of the eight billion spent for supplies, only about one-fourth went to combat personnel and three-fourths for overhead personnel. In short, as the periodical puts it, more than $2 out of every $3 spent for defense went for housekeeping. Total charges for housekeeping are put at $34,700,000,000, and the total for men and machines for use in fighting at fifteen and three-tenths billion. Of this fifteen and three-tenths billion, eight and two-tenths went for a force of fighting men; four for a fleet of new planes, and three and one-tenth for other war equipment. Only $600,000,000 was spent during the whole period on weapons.

As a result the spending on combat equipment was inadequate to replace worn-out items. No new tanks were bought. Only a few World War II ones were remodeled. No big artillery guns, rifles, machine guns, or new naval guns were purchased. No new Navy ships were ordered. New weapons were still in the planning or testing stage. On land the fighting divisions fell from 17 to 10. Air groups declined from 52 to 48. The number of combat ships fell from 291 to 245, and manpower in the Navy declined from 985,288 to 379,000.

All this prompts the question: What do we maintain a Defense Establishment for? Is it just to support a vast bureaucracy that has no combat value? Or is it to provide men and weapons for defense? Chairman VINSON is on the right track. Before pouring added billions into defense, we had better find out what is being done with the money appropriated and that our defense dollars are going to buy what they are intended for. We have played with this situation too long already.

Some Facts About the Last War, the Peace, and Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I am inserting from the July 26, 1950, Elwood (Ind.) Call-Leader an editorial written by Rowland R. Peters which I believe correctly expresses the thinking of our people.

The mess which the politicians have made of things is appalling. Nothing remotely like it can be found in previous history. Roosevelt and Truman in their fanaticism for communism threw the peace away at Tehran, Yalta, Potsdam, and so forth.

The politicians blundered in extending lend-lease to Russia and to so many other countries. History teaches that allies fall out with each other after they win a war.

Lend-lease was a deliberate fraud. Its purpose was neither to lend nor to lease anything, but simply to give away American war matériel. In order to have Congress pass the Lend-Lease Act the politicians had to put a false label on it. Now, as was the case with the gift we made to Japan in buying her gold at $35 per ounce, the Russians are shooting our sons because of what our politicians gave them during and after the war.

The United Nations is a colossal swindle. It is a Communist organization. Alger Hiss was the secretary-general of the conference which wrote its articles. Assuredly he had much to do in formulating them. And he was not the only Communist at the San Francisco Conference. Would Stalin have accepted and joined the organization if it had not been to his liking, if it had not been a Communist set-up?

And so are all the other international organizations attached to the United Nations Communist organizations, such as the United Nations Economic and Social Counsel, International Trade Organization, International Labor Organization, and so forth.

Do not look to the United Nations for material support to the United States in the Korean war. Some of its members will talk big and possibly send a few token forces to help us, but more than this should not be expected from this organization. Whatever help we may get from the other nations will come because of their self-interest, and this would be forthcoming if there were no United Nations organiaztion. The editorial follows:

LET US FACE SOME FACTS ABOUT THE LAST WAR, THE PEACE, AND KOREA

Wherever Elwoodites gather these days there can be heard utterances of apprehension. We are becoming increasingly alarmed over world conditions with emphasis, of course, on Korea. We have reason to be alarmed. The time has come for all of us to pay mare attention to international affairs than we ever have because we are involved in a tragic situation that can set the whole world on fire. We are, in fact, involved in a situation which can, if the atomic and hydrogen bombs are to be used by both sides, wipe out much of our civilization and set us back centuries.

We are involved in a tragic political situation as well as two-continent war. Some of our politicians are attempting to put out the lie that the Korean conflict is not a full-scale war. Whenever Americans are dying as they are dying in Korea we are fighting a full-scale war, not just an overnight skirmish. Politicians in Washington are putting out news items that we "suffered a few casualties," and in the same news items they say that enemy losses were "heavy." We wonder who those fellows think they are kidding. When fighting is severe enough for heavy losses on one side it is severe enough to inflict heavy losses on the other side. Here is an example of confusion.

We need to consider, too, that the war in Korea is all the proof that we need that we have definitely lost the peace that we won on Okinawa, Guam, Japan, the Battle of the Bulge, and throughout the European theater of war in the early forties. Here we are being governed at the beginning of another war by the same crowd that lost the peace. Common judgment dictates that our affairs in time of war certainly are not in good hands when they are in the hands of politicians who couldn't keep the peace after thousands of our young men died to win it and thousands of others are still in hospitals as a result of winning it.

They won that peace back in 1945, but the politicians have not yet recognized it. The politicians are still clinging to the wartime taxes they imposed "temporarily" to win the war. They permitted months and years to pass without declaring that the war was over. They insulted those who died and those who were injured and those who fought but survived the war. They made concessions to Russia at Yalta when all the time they knew that Russia was not our friend. They even stopped General Eisenhower and his forces at the gates of Berlin so that the Russians could take the city that the Americans had won. They made concessions to Russia to get her into the Japanese after the Americans had that war won and surrender of the Japanese was a matter of days away.

The same crowd is in office. The same crowd is in a position to bungle this war as they bungled the peace. What assurance have we that the crowd that bungled the peace will not bungle this war at heavy and unnecessary loss of American lives and dollars? One by one, the politicians who lost the peace are crying for new taxes, warning us of new controls over our economy. If the war gets bad enough the American people will, as they always have done, be willing to make whatever concessions they must make to help their sons win the war.

The politicians are crying for new taxes on the age-old lie that they want to balance the budget because of the current emergency. They knew this emergency was inevitable when they knew they were losing the peace. Did they balance the budget? No. Instead Harry Truman and his crowd kept piling more and more billions upon the debt. Of all of the silly assertions the politicians could make it is talking about balancing the budget in time of war when they didn't do it in peacetime. They could have slowed down on taking money from those who work to give it to those who do not work, or paying it out in subsidies for which Uncle Sam gets nothing but more and more indebtedness. They say that more taxes will help fight communism, but they keep in office one Dean Acheson, so-called Secretary of State, who said he would not "turn my back on Alger Hiss," an American enemy. They want more tax money to fight communism, but they permit such persons as Senator TYDINGS to steamroller a report condemning Senator MCCARTHY for trying to reveal communism within our Government bureaus.

They want more taxes yet they profess to stand by President Truman who was so naive as to say the Hiss case was "just a red herring," and then refused and failed to admit he was wrong after Hiss was convicted. These are the persons who are pulling the strings while America's young men are dying and those at home are worrying, even those who fought the "last war," the war that was supposed to end wars. They are being alerted again. Among them there are those thousands who were just getting a good start in life when the depression, the result of our own recklessness after the First World War, gave them a jar. That over, they just got a good start again when they had to fight the Second World War. Now they are once again on the way to a normal life and they are being called upon to go back into service. Sure, they'll go because they are loyal Americans, but surely, too, they are getting tired of being kicked around by politicians who lack the common sense of knowing how to get along with each other without having to call upon the young men of their countries to die for their mistakes.

Our Washington politicians have been trying for years to subject us to socialized control, which, in effect, is little different from communism. As Congressman FREDERICK C. SMITH of Ohio, told the House 2 weeks ago: "There is really no quarrel between the forces controlling the United States and those controlling Russia, as regards to mode of government. The real difference between the two countries relates to jurisdiction over lands and peoples. Roosevelt and Truman sanctioned Russia's vast accrual of territory and population. All the subversive forces within and without our Government have built up Russia to its present size and strength."

Yes, we lost the peace and those in control when we lost it are still in control now that we are reaping the results of losing it. There is still one power that favors right over might and right over politics. Our young men of today are in His hands. They may die but He will not let them down.

Blundering Intelligence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL STEFAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following extension from the Omaha Evening World-Herald of August 7, 1950:

BLUNDERING INTELLIGENCE

There is apprehension in this country that Russia may duplicate the Korean invasion in some other part of the world.

If America's record at out-guessing the enemy is any criterion, this worry is unjustified. Our opponents almost never act the way our intelligence services expect them to.

In fact, the record of failure in that line is little short of amazing. Two reporters for the New York Herald Tribune recently compiled a list of the notable errors by American intelligence since World War II and came up with six major blunders, including, of course, the Korean affair of recent and painful memory.

These are the other five:

The fall of Czechoslovakia, which America's best minds thought was only a routine change of government.

Tito's split with Soviet Russia and the Cominform, a defection which was some time in the making but which caught our intelligence people flat-footed. Army G-2 was still busy analyzing Tito in terms of his being Stalin's valet when he had in fact fallen out with the Kremlin.

The fall of Nationalist China: In this case Army G-2 looked good. Other intelligence services "discounted the capabilities of the Communists to overrun China." The Army's minority opinion was, of course, ignored.

Palestine: All American intelligence groups overrated the military ability of the Arabs.

Bogota: A Colombian revolution exploded right under the noses of Secretary of State Marshall and others gathered at the capital of Colombia for the International Conference of American States. Intelligence had said there might be some picketing, but no shooting.

The above would indicate that this country's system for gathering, analyzing, and interpreting information is a bad one. The results discredit it completely and the known facts about its methods and its duplication of effort add up to story of dangerous and costly bungling.

Many Americans assume that because the United States has a Central Intelligence Agency it has a well-integrated system which channels information and analysis to the various Government departments.

This is far from the truth. This country has, in fact, no less than six separate and sometimes competitive intelligence organizations gathering information from abroad and trying to figure out what it means.

Each of the three military services has its own intelligence machinery. The State Department has a set-up of its own. There is the above-mentioned Central Intelligence Agency, which is supposedly a coordinating office responsible only to the President and the National Security Council. Lastly, there is the Joint Intelligence Group, which is the separate intelligence service for the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Too many cooks not only spoil the broth, as the saying goes. They don't seem to know "what's cooking." There is widespread criticism of the caliber of the agents and analysts who make up some of these intelligence services. Our foreign agents seem to be poorly chosen and lack training, compared with those of some other countries, notably the British. Most important, there is no real coordination of the six agencies, no over-all control, no official who is responsible for the terrifying blunders that threaten national security.

Part of the funds and the planning that go into our new expanded military program should be used to overhaul and improve the intelligence set-up. The country cannot afford more such surprises as in Korea.

"How simple," said the foreigner, regarding our two-party system, before it was explained that some Democrats are more like Republicans than Republicans are, and vice versa.

Our Greatest Danger

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY J. DAVENPORT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Pittsburgh Press of August 8, 1950:

OUR GREATEST DANGER

"The United States is today in greater peril than ever before."

That statement comes from the National Planning Association's Committee on International Policy, a group made up of representative leaders from agriculture, business, labor, and the professions.

And that statement is true.

Our country's peril arises, as the committee says, from the fact that "Soviet imperialism is committed to a policy aimed at destruction of the free world, of which we form an integral part."

But ruthless, despotic Soviet imperialism is not all we have to fear.

Our country's peril is immensely increased because too many of its people's chosen leaders do not recognize the terrible urgency of the present situation.

Steps necessary to deal with the menance created by Soviet imperialism are being taken in slow motion or not at all.

Time, the most precious commodity we have, is being squandered by men in Washington whose motto seems to be:

"Be careful not to do too much too soon."

The planning committee urges that America embark at once upon a costly and comprehensive program of which President Truman, so far, has presented merely the preview.

Among the elements of such a program, it lists:

A speed-up of industrial conversion to manufacture of weapons, and diversion for that purpose of a far larger proportion of the national production than has been called for by Mr. Truman.

A building up and training of the Armed Forces on a much greater scale than has yet been announced.

Heavier taxes, elimination of governmental waste and extravagance, and other anti-inflation measures.

And, much as we may dislike it, we should recognize that economic controls have again become a matter of urgent necessity.

In all, the committee displays intelligent awareness of the truth that adequate preparedness to win, if America is forced to fight another great war, offers the best hope of discouraging Soviet imperialism's aggressive plans for world domination and so averting such a war.

But surely, say the advocates of half steps, we can win the war in Korea without need for all-out industrial mobilization, price and wage ceilings, rationing of scarce essentials and other economic controls.

Maybe we could, though that has not yet been demonstrated.

Korea, however, is not the main event. It may be only the curtain raiser for an immensely bigger war which, if it found America ill-prepared could spell defeat and ruin for us before we knew what had hit us.

There is no safety in the plans now being made to be prepared for a major war 2, 3, or 4 years hence. Russia is now readier than we are in most respects, and will spare no effort to increase her lead.

We cannot do too much too soon. Our greatest danger is that we may fail to do enough in time.

Speculation in Soybeans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement:

SPECULATION IN SOYBEANS—VOLUME AND PRICES

The erratic and upward course of futures prices in soybeans on the Chicago Board of Trade since March has been the subject of complaints from trade interests that the futures market was so completely dominated by speculative forces as to be useless for merchandisers and processors in hedging against price risks.

Prices rose sharply in the 5-month period, March to July 1950, the July future advancing from $2.31¾ per bushel to $3.45½, an increase of 49 percent. This rise was accompanied by wide swings in price. On 18 days in this period, the July future reached the fluctuation limit of 10 cents a bushel, 8 times on the high side and 10 times on the low side. In the July future out of 120 trading days, from March 1 to July 22 when trading ceased, there were 83 days in which the daily high-low range of prices was 4 cents a bushel and over.

The wide speculative interest in soybean futures was reflected in the large volume of trading on the Chicago market. Although the seasonal peak of hedging was past, the volume of trading on the Chicago Board of Trade in the March-July period substantially exceeded the previous 5-month October-February period. Trading in the March-July period, totaling 1,926,464,000 bushels, was 40 percent greater than in the October-February period which included the peak of marketing by farmers. Throughout this March-July period, speculative interest in the market mounted, while reported hedging contracts showed a continuous seasonal decline.

MARCH 27, 1950, MARKET SURVEY

The predominantly speculative nature of the soybean market was shown by a survey by the CEA of all accounts in soybean futures on the Chicago Board of Trade as of March 27, 1950. The results of this investigation showed that 87 percent of the 3,096 accounts in the market were those of speculators who held the bulk of the positions on both sides of the market, and as a group were net long. Speculative holdings far outweighed the needs of hedgers for price protection. The tabulation that follows shows the number of accounts and amount of commitments of speculators and hedgers on March 27, as reported by futures commission merchants:

	Traders		Commitments
			Amount (1,000 bushels)		Percent
	Number	Percent	Long	Short	Long	Short
Speculative	2,688	86.8	50,800	40,084	77.6	61.2
Hedging	408	13.2	14,658	25,356	22.4	38.8
Total	3,096	100.0	65,458	65,440	100.0	100.0

JUNE 30, 1950, SURVEY

With the arrival of the delivery period for the July future and the large number of open contracts outstanding in that future the CEA made a second survey of all accounts in the market as of June 30, 1950.

This survey, like that of March 27, showed that the market was predominantly speculative. The number of accounts, and the total of open contracts, had declined considerably with the expiration of the May future, but the general composition of the market was substantially unchanged.

Of the 2,330 traders in the market on June 30, 84.5 percent were speculators and 15.5 percent were hedgers. Commitments of speculators accounted for three-fourths of the long side of the market and about two-thirds of the short side, with hedgers holding the balance. Again, the speculative holdings were considerably in excess of the requirements of hedgers. More than one-half of the short commitments of hedgers were offset by long commitments of hedgers. The following tabulation shows the details of the market composition:

	Traders		Commitments
			Amount (1,000 bushels)		Percent
	Number	Percent	Long	Short	Long	Short
Speculators	1,968	84.5	31,518	24,733	78.8	61.9
Hedgers	362	15.5	8,473	15,260	21.2	38.1
Total	2,330	100.0	39,991	39,993	100.0	100.0

The breakdown of accounts runs the usual gamut of occupations and indicates the extent of public participation found in a highly speculative market. The number of traders and the amount of commitments of speculators and hedgers on June 30, as reported by futures commission merchants, appear in table 1.

DELIVERIES IN THE SETTLEMENT OF THE JULY 1950 FUTURE

July futures contracts totaling 5,624,000 bushels were settled by delivery of soybeans. Of this amount, 3,094,940 bushels represented initial deliveries, and 2,529,000 bushels were redeliveries. In other words, of the initial deliveries amounting to 3,094,940 bushels, 2,529,060 bushels were received by various firms and then turned back again on the market. Deliveries accounted for six-tenths of 1 percent of the total volume of trading in the July future. The remaining 99.4 percent of the futures transactions were offset and closed out without involving any delivery of the actual commodity. This percentage of contracts settled by delivery is not out of line with that usually observed in the larger futures markets. Of the 3,094,940 bushels of actual soybeans delivered on the July 1950 contract approximately one-half were received and held by one account, which will be discussed later. The amounts received by the six largest accounts taking delivery were as follows:

	Bushels
Trader A	1,500,000
Trader B	605,000
Trader C	430,000
Trader D	355,000
Trader E	60,000
Trader F	50,000
Miscellaneous smaller accounts	74,940
Total	3,094,940

MARGINS FIXED BY CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE

In the March–July period initial margins for speculative transactions in soybean futures fixed by the Chicago Board of Trade were changed on five occasions. The schedule of applicable margins over this period is as follows:

Effective date	Minimum initial margin speculative transactions	Margin as percent of price of near future on effective date
Prior to Mar. 13, 1950.	20 cents per bushel for all futures.	8.3
Mar. 13, 1950	15 cents per bushel for all futures.	6.1
Apr. 6, 1950	20 cents per bushel for all futures.	7.6
Apr. 27, 1950	30 cents per bushel for May and July futures.	10.4
	20 cents for November and January futures.	9.2
May 4, 1950	40 cents per bushel for May and July futures.	13.0
	20 cents for November, January, and March futures.	9.0
July 22, 1950	30 cents per bushel for all futures.	12.0

The reduction in speculative margins on March 13 from the already low level of 8.3 percent to 6.1 percent was made in the face of an active speculative market.

The daily average volume of trading in soybean futures between March 13 and April 6 amounted to 15,173,000 bushels, compared to 10,893,000 bushels between February 15 and March 13, an increase of 39 percent. Even the margin rates shown above were not applied to all speculators in the soybean market. The exchange-established margins are not applicable to members of the exchange who execute or clear their own speculative transactions. There are also many instances where the established rates are not required even of traders to whom they supposedly apply.

CHINESE SPECULATORS IN SOYBEAN FUTURES

Toward the expiration of the July soybean future there were rumors and trade comments concerning trading by a Chinese group. The CEA has received inquiries on the subject from the press and from trade interests. On August 7 the Chicago Journal of Commerce carried a front-page item stating that the president of the Chicago Board of Trade had refuted published reports that a virtual corner of soybeans by "Chinese Nationalists interests had been instrumental in causing prices to soar from $2.20 to $3.45 a bushel."

It is not unusual for foreign accounts to appear in the commodity futures markets of this country. In the soybean surveys discussed in this report traders were found located in China, Canada, Great Britain, France, Italy, Mexico, Switzerland, and Venezuela.

In the current investigation it was found that there was very sizable trading by persons with Chinese names, and in some instances with Hong Kong addresses. Because of the extent of these activities, and the inquiries on the subject which have been received by the CEA, the findings so far developed on this aspect of the investigation are being reported and commented on herein.

The market survey of March 27 disclosed a number of accounts with Chinese names. On that date there were 31 accounts of this nature holding 3,145,000 bushels long and 125,000 bushels short in all futures.

Reports on large-scale traders showed that during April a considerable number of new accounts with Chinese names entered the market and those already in the market added to their positions. All these accounts were speculative.

On April 13, 1950, an account with a Chinese name began what developed into a sizable operation on the long side in July soybean futures. The record of purchases in this account follows:

	Bushels
Apr. 13, 1950	195,000
Apr. 15, 1950	195,000
Apr. 17, 1950	310,000
Apr. 20, 1950	500,000
Apr. 24, 1950	1,365,000
Total position, Apr. 24	2,565,000

Between April 13 and 24, while this account was making the purchases shown above, the price of the July future rose from $2.65⅝ to $2.90¼ per bushel. On April 24, when 1,365,000 bushels were purchased, the July future advanced the full 10-cent permissible limit.

From information subsequently developed it appears that this account is that of a Hong Kong commission merchant, and that the purchases of 2,565,000 bushels were distributed among the accounts of 14 customers of the commission merchant. Of these 14 individual accounts it also appears that 9 held positions of 195,000 bushels each. This figure is just one trading unit below the 200,000-bushel reporting requirement under the Commodity Exchange Act.

These accounts retained their positions unchanged until delivery began on the July future. They then took delivery of 2,150,000 of actual beans and sold out the remaining 415,000 bushels in futures. Later in July they redelivered 650,000 bushels of beans and retained 1,500,000 bushels in store in Chicago elevators.

The circumstances surrounding the trading in the 14 accounts carried by the Hong Kong commission firm point to common control and possible common ownership. If these accounts are considered as a group, it will be seen that their long position of 2,565,000 bushels comprised 17.4 percent of the total of 14,759,000 bushels open in the July future as of June 30. This was the largest position held in any one account or by any group of accounts which appeared to be related.

The continued growth in accounts with Chinese names in soybean futures led to a special investigation of such accounts at the end of May. This investigation of brokers known to have Chinese accounts disclosed 49 speculative accounts with Chinese names or with Chinese connections. The extent of their holdings in the July future on May 31, 1950, was as follows:

Number of accounts	Commitments (bushels)		Percent of July open contracts
	Long	Short	Long	Short
49	5,961,000	175,000	31.9	0.9

The survey of June 30 showed that the number of accounts with Chinese names and connections had increased further since the special investigation of May 31. There were 56 accounts of this nature reported holding positions in soybean futures on June 30. The holdings of this group were as follows:

Number of accounts	Commitments
	Amount (1,000 bushels)				Percent of total open contracts
	July		All futures		July		All futures
	Long	Short	Long	Short	Long	Short	Long	Short
July future, 51 (all futures, 56)	6,986	335	7,212	1,610	47.3	2.3	18.7	4.2

The above figures show a considerable proportion of the long July contracts held in Chinese accounts. As previously indicated, a considerable number of these traders show Hong Kong addresses. The others are located in this country. Except for the 14 accounts previously discussed, no indications have so far appeared of any significant connection or common control among the remaining Chinese accounts. Speculation in futures by Chinese is not unusual. Such activities have been observed during previous surveys involving other commodities, although not to the same extent. No previous instance has been found, however, in which Chinese held as large a proportion of the total open contracts in any commodity as in the 1950 July soybean future.

There is, of course, no prohibition against trading in commodity futures on United States markets by foreign nationals. Such traders would be subject to sanctions only in the event that it could be proven that their activities were manipulative, or in some other manner in violation of the Commodity Exchange Act. From the investigation as so far developed such proof has not appeared.

GENERAL COMMENTS AND CONCLUSIONS

Beginning in March and up to the present time the Commodity Exchange Authority has received a large number of complaints from the trade, mainly soybean processors, to the effect that the soybean futures market has recently been completely under the control of speculators and has served no useful purpose to legitimate hedgers. Typical excerpts from these communications follow:

When excessive speculation in soybean futures has about put all the nonspeculative soybean processors out of business because of the squeeze between the value of soybean oil and meal and the unduly high price of soybean futures, in which the processor has his products hedged, then we think your office should start looking into the matter.

On a crop of 223,000,000 of soybeans there is daily more beans traded on the Chicago Board of Trade than all the other principal grain futures. * * * This should be proof enough that most of the daily trades on the Chicago Board of Trade are of a speculative nature.

* * * * *

This rapid upturn in bean prices at this time is helping only the speculator as a large majority of the farmers have already disposed of their farm holdings. This in turn makes the end products higher to the consumer.

Please make just a casual quick investigation of the manipulation that is now taking place in the commodity markets more particularly in soybeans.

As stated in my message to you, the soybean processing industry is gradually being destroyed by excessive speculation in the bean market on the Chicago Board of Trade.

* * * * *

Several of the Chicago commission houses have been putting out very bullish dope on beans since October first and gotten the general public, who do not know anything about the real value of beans, very much excited to the extent that they are buying beans "blindly" and they simply have run away with the market causing processors to lose heavily.

* * * * *

As you know, most of the farmers have sold their beans and they are not reaping the reward of this advance. The speculator or gambler is the only one that is benefiting by the advance, and in most instances at the expense of the processors.

* * * * *

The processors not only have to have their money tied up in plants but have to pay cash for the beans they buy to run these plants, whereas, the speculator on the Chicago Board of Trade is only required to put up 15 cents to 20 cents a bushel, and naturally exerts as much or more influence on the bean market than processors.

Suggest check sudden advance again on soybeans. * * * This whole soy deal is manipulation. Have requested Senate committee investigation.

During the past few months we surely have had an extremely volatile soybean futures market. The speculative element was completely in control. Processors as a whole in the industry have some pretty serious red figures to face. This surely is an unhealthy situation.

* * * * *

Now that the old crop options are expiring, I am just wondering if we are going to experience the same kind of volatile markets in soybeans as we experienced during the past year. Today (July 21, 1950) it begins to look so. Old crop July with only one more day of trading declined the limit almost at the opening, but the three future months, November, January, and March went up abruptly almost a like amount.

These communications were received from responsible trade interests who ordinarily use the futures market in connection with their merchandising and processing operations. Their views as to the market situation which has prevailed so far this year are well supported by the CEA analyses of futures trading in soybeans.

It was found that some trade interests with large holdings of actual beans had ceased to attempt to protect themselves by means of hedges in the futures market. Large stocks were carried unhedged in preference to accepting the hazard of the erratic price movements which occurred from day to day. The wisdom of these processors and merchandisers is demonstrated by the fact that the July future on the Chicago Board of Trade was 6 to 8 cents above the going price of actual beans shortly before the expiration of that future. Obviously the hedgers who had sold futures earlier when the futures price was in proper relationship to the price of beans would have suffered a heavy loss by the subsequent distortion in price.

The predominantly speculative character of this market is further illustrated by the fact that of the 7,463,000 bushels traded in the November future on July 21, 96.5 percent of the purchases and 90.7 percent of the sales were speculative.

No individual holdings were found which appeared to be of the size and type ordinarily associated with corners, manipulation, or market control. The situation appeared to be merely another example of the classical speculative splurge in which a large number of small and moderate-sized speculative accounts enter the market and by their feverish activity aggravate and accentuate the basic price trend.

The Consumer Pays and The Copper Tariff

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BRIEN McMAHON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 10 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in today's Washington Post entitled "The Consumer Pays," and also an editorial published in the New York Times of today entitled "The Copper Tariff."

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of August 10, 1950]

THE CONSUMER PAYS

Testifying recently before the Senate Banking Committee on the administration's defense-production bill, Secretary of Commerce Sawyer said, speaking of copper, "Even without the addition of a new program for military purposes, and without the addition of an accelerated stockpile program, the heavy demands for copper, combined with the low level of working stocks, would mean that supply would be inadequate and consumers would meet increasing difficulty in obtaining supplies. The expanded military and stockpile program will of necessity reduce the amount available for civilian use and will create shortages and hardships to industries dependent on this important material." The result, therefore, of retaining the 2-cent import "tax" on copper imports, suspended in 1947 and restored at the end of last June, would be to give another boost to copper prices which are now about 22½ cents a pound—close to the postwar peak—contrasted with a 16-cent 1949 low.

Since the domestic supply of copper is not equal to the domestic demand, the levy will probably have little immediate effect on the volume of imports, but it will be reflected, no doubt, in higher prices paid by consumers for automobiles, household appliances and other products that call for the use of copper. Furthermore, it is extremely shortsighted to endanger our relations with copper-exporting countries, especially Chile, upon whom we depend to supplement domestic supplies of copper. Finally, it is a foregone conclusion that copper will be one of the basic materials that will have to be subjected to controls, since, with or without the tax on imports, it will be in short supply. Unless controls over allocations are combined with some form of price control, whether voluntary or compulsory, therefore, the stage will be set for a further rise in copper prices that would be accelerated by retention of the import tax. If it should become necessary to stimulate the production of domestic copper, the way to do so would be to subsidize high-cost marginal producers, as was done during World War II, instead of raising prices all along the line and at the expense of consumers and taxpayers.

Nevertheless the Senate Finance Committee has tabled a bill passed by the House to continue suspension of the import tax for another year. Thus the country is confronted by the strange spectacle of a Senate committee approving a procedure that would raise the prices of an important strategic material, while Congress is considering a control program designed to keep prices from rising. Fortunately there is still a chance that the Senate will repair the damage done by its Finance Committee in placing the interests of a special group above those of the Nation by passing the suspension bill in the form of an amendment from the floor to other legislation.

[From the New York Times of August 10, 1950]

THE COPPER TARIFF

On June 30 a tariff of 2 cents a pound on imported copper, suspended during the war, went back into effect. On Tuesday the Senate Finance Committee rejected by 9 to 4 a bill to restore that suspension. This seems to us a short-sighted and ill-advised decision. Copper is one of the most important raw materials in our defense program. The committee has chosen a time when we are facing great inflationary pressure to try to force a out in our copper imports and add to consumer costs. At the same time, the tariff would deal a hard and unnecessary blow to Chile, where copper is the major export. Peru would also be hard hit, but it could stand the blow better.

Chile is one of our true friends in Latin America and a country that has progressed well toward the sort of democracy we like to see. It is Chile that is leading the move to organize the Latin-American countries into a collective effort for the United Nations in Korea. At the moment, Chilean economy is severely extended by inflationary factors and a reduction of her dollar income would be serious.

W. H. Hoover, president of the Anaconda Copper Mining Co., said last month that a restoration of the 2-cent duty on copper would not materially increase United States production. Chilean copper, he pointed out, is as integral a part of the United States industry as domestic copper. The Chilean industry is, moreover, largely owned by American companies. Of course, there are other American copper companies that want the protection and it is the legislators from mining States, or those who are willing to help them, who are now trying to restore the 2-cent duty. It is not as if the domestic producers have to have this protection to keep going; they cannot produce nearly enough for present American consumption let alone the strategic stockpiling that is now more necessary than ever.

From both the economic and diplomatic viewpoints it is wrong to reimpose the copper tariff. Our Good Neighbor policy cannot be measured in dollars and cents, but its value is nevertheless enormous. There is no adequate reason today to harm one of the most important Latin-American countries simply to provide some unnecessary help to a United States industry. The decision of the Finance Committee is not final and there is time to reverse it on the floor of the Senate. It would be the part of the statesmanship and common sense to do so.

What a Layman Can Do

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IRVING M. IVES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 10 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement entitled "What a Layman Can Do," issued by the Laymen's Movement for a Christian World, Inc., and which I feel is worthy of consideration at this time.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT A LAYMAN CAN DO

What can we do in the critical situation developing in our world? The Laymen's Movement through its chairman, Wallace C. Speers, presents the following seven points which suggest constructive action, which any thoughtful person can take to improve our chances of peace over against war. Take these suggestions into consideration as you read your newspaper or listen to the radio, as you talk to friends and business associates, or as you think over the situations alone.

1. Have faith in God, in man, in yourself. Faith is the ultimate victory of right over wrong. Have faith in our leaders and in God's ability to use them for His purposes.

2. Be an island of calm confidence in a world of turmoil—not blind wishful thinking, but belief in the power for right of a God who cares.

3. Be friendly to everyone you meet. Throw a pebble of kindness into the pool of human relations to help overcome hatred.

4. Pray repeatedly, realizing that you are using an overwhelming power for good. Use spot prayers more and more frequently during the day to try to beneficially condition destructive situations as they are reported.

5. Practice the exclusion of doubt and fear from the mind. Keep a record of constructive thoughts put into words during the day and of destructive thoughts not uttered. Be sure the balance at evening is on the positive side.

6. Develop the consciousness that there is a constructive answer—no matter how depressing events may seem.

7. Look upon yourself as a child of God, made in His image—then love your neighbor as yourself.

These suggestions for positive action are designed for wide use—such as office bulletin boards, plant publications, mailing enclosures, church bulletins and for distribution among friends and associates.

Yes-Man Psychology

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, when the editor of the Altoona (Pa.) Tribune on April 19, 1950, said—in his editorial entitled "Yes-Man Psychology"—"There is a dangerous situation here that stems directly from big Government" he put his finger on one of the factors that found us unprepared in handling the Korean crisis.

Yes-man psychology is fully analyzed in Editor Robert Boyer's editorial which follows:

YES-MAN PSYCHOLOGY

It is a strange viewpoint indeed that leads our Government executives to play politics with the defense of the Nation. Yet, that appears to be the situation.

With a vast and inefficient Federal bureaucracy from which to trim, it is astonishing that national defense has been made a major objective of government economy. While there is no real effort to reduce spending in other Government departments, and at a time when our relations with Russia are as dangerous as they were with Hitler in 1939.

There is considerable cause for public doubt as to the adequacy of our defenses. Secretary of Defense Johnson some time ago spoke belligerently on the subject of Russia, declaring we could "lick the hell out of Stalin."

But, the reaction among military men to that statement was one of open skepticism, although none apparently dared take direct issue with him.

Of course the American people don't want any more money wasted. But, they do want to know that with the vast expenditure of public money Mr. Truman proposes that their country is being given the necessary protection—especially in view of Russia's obvious unfriendliness.

There is a dangerous situation here that stems directly from big government.

Representative JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, of Altoona, put his finger on that situation again on April 5, when, in his remarks in the House, he declared that yes-man psychology is ruining our national defense.

The Altoona Congressman spotlighted this situation last summer in the B-36 investigation. He pointed out again April 5 that qualified military men dare not give their expert professional opinion unless that corresponds with the opinion of the Secretary of Defense and the President.

In other words, expert military opinion in our Government has been made entirely responsive to political control, and as such, is well-nigh worthless.

The Congress, as Mr. VAN ZANDT pointed out, cannot discover the true state of our defenses because the qualified military experts are afraid to talk.

Said Mr. VAN ZANDT, "We all know what happened to Admiral Denfeld after he was given assurance by the Secretary of the Navy that he was free to testify and give any information he wished without fear of reprisal."

Admiral Denfeld was fired later because he disagreed with the Department of Defense on Navy requirements.

"And," went on Mr. VAN ZANDT, "on the heels of Admiral Denfeld's dismissal, we have now the transfer of Admiral Joel T. Boone, Chief of the Joint Plans and Action Division, Office of Medical Services, Defense Department, who violated this yes-man psychology when he spoke his own mind before a subcommittee of the House Committee on Armed Services."

The local Congressman traced this authoritarian clamp-down on military leaders to a directive issued by President Truman.

"The President said this to the Director of the Budget, 'When you notify the heads of departments and agencies of the amounts to be included in the 1948 budget, for their activities, I wish you would include a reminder that I shall expect them and their subordinates to support only the President's estimates in hearings and discussions with Members of Congress.'"

The Congressman declared this yes-man attitude was plainly evident when the House Armed Services Committee met to consider budget requirements for the Department of Defense.

The other day Admiral Halsey blasted Navy leaders who deprecated the big carriers, and spoke of our submarine defense in terms of small carriers and sub chasers.

The latter, said Admiral Halsey, are defensive only. And, he declared, a nation can't win a war on defensive tactics. He said the late war showed that big carriers are necessary to wage offensive warfare, and Halsey was the Pacific leader in this type of conflict.

He may have had Admiral Sherman in mind. The Chief of Naval Operations recently spoke of naval preparedness in terms of small carriers and sub chasers.

But, what is Admiral Sherman's professional opinion? Is it the same as Admiral Halsey's?

We don't know. Halsey is retired, Sherman isn't.

Representative VAN ZANDT struck at a vital weakness in American national defense—the enforcement of political opinion, instead of expert opinion on such matters as the Nation's defense needs.

Get Ahead of Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CECIL R. KING
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely trust that before this day is over the House will have adopted the Defense Production Act vital to our mobilization effort and our all-out campaign against inflation. There is every reason for both the legislative and executive branches to act promptly in this emergency. Time is as important an element in our present emergency as any strategic material or armament. Let us act promptly and decisively. In this connection, an editorial appearing in the Christian Science Monitor for Tuesday, August 8, 1950, is most apropos, and appears below:

GET AHEAD OF INFLATION

The American people acting in concert can beat inflation. The best way to beat it is to get ahead of it—by united action. Separate efforts of individuals or companies trying to get ahead of it by hoarding, by raising prices or wages, simply give it a boost. Only by acting through their Government can the people beat inflation. Every day this action is delayed inflation gains ground.

Promptness should be the watchword for Congress now. There has been too much fumbling with an emergency, both in the White House and on Capitol Hill. The House of Representatives wasted a good part of last week concocting a drastic automatic control plan which it then found it couldn't stomach. Much time has been spent in debate over all-out stand-by controls suitable to a general war situation. Meanwhile taxes and controls which would hobble inflation in the current crisis are neglected.

For instance, curbs on installment buying could have been slapped on immediately. So could other controls on credit. Very little machinery would be required for these measures and it is familiar from recent usage—installment controls continued long after the war. The Federal Reserve Board has experience and information. Once Congress gave the word it could be quickly passed along to banks and dealers. One aid to scarce buying and hoarding would be curbed.

Application of priorities and allocation for scarce supplies and those needed by the Armed Forces should not wait until the smart operators have stocked up far beyond current needs.

There is equal reason for prompt assessment of heavier taxes to draw off surplus spending power. This effect will be delayed in any case. President Truman's $5,000,000,000 tax bill should be passed, and an excess-profits tax added. Why there should be objections to immediate application of an excess-profits tax we cannot understand. The same applies to curbs on prices and wages. The sound basis is to declare that tax and control policies shall be aimed at keeping anybody from profiting by a war which requires such severe sacrifices from men who do the fighting.

Part of the trouble is partisan politics—efforts to protect one favored group or another from controls. There are also political maneuvers to get credit for popular measures or attach blame to the opposition for unpopular restrictions. Some legislators are hesitating further between automatic measures and those leaving wide discretion to the executive. But basically the choice lies between early application of selective controls plus taxes to head off inflation and later application of more drastic controls to stop inflation that has already run away.

In the circumstances, the worst hoarders are those who pile up delays, the wisest patriots those who agree on prompt action.

The Smudge-Pot Saint

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHET HOLIFIELD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent I include in the Appendix of the RECORD an article which appeared in the Nation's Business for April 1950, praising the work of the United States Weather Bureau in Los Angeles, and its regional director, Floyd Dillon Young, and the radio station KFI:

THE SMUDGE-POT SAINT
(By Andrew Hamilton)

Anybody can talk about the weather. But only Floyd Dillon Young, regional director of the United States Weather Bureau in Los Angeles, can drive a top Hooper-rating radio show off the air and bring it back again—merely by discussing temperatures, wind velocities, and dew points.

A baldish, 57-year-old man with a tired voice, Young gives away no $50,000 jackpots, doesn't even boast a sponsor. Yet every night during the winter months over KFI, Los Angeles, he conducts the most popular program heard by western listeners.

By giving farmers and nurserymen advance warning on nightly frost conditions, Young has saved an estimated $200,000,000 worth of oranges, lemons, grapefruit, avocados, lettuce, tomatoes, commercial flowers, and other crops. He can light up all 3,000,000 smudge pots in California if necessary.

In the big freeze of 1937, Young urged red-eyed citrus growers to hang on one more night after they'd smudged for 11 consecutive nights. His advice saved 70 percent of the crop. And last year, when snow blanketed southern California, citrus farmers lost only 5 percent of their fruit by dialing Floyd Young.

In 20 years of broadcasting, Young has built an audience of several million listeners, not only the citrus and truck farmers, but contractors who worry about freshly laid concrete, poultry breeders wondering if they should turn up the burners under their chicks, motorists undecided whether or not to drain their radiators.

Young goes on the air with this simple introduction, "We now bring you the station of the Fruit Frost Service. * * *"

If it's a balmy evening, he merely reports, "Above 32 degrees in all districts. No firing will be necessary. Good night."

But if the thermometer is skidding downward, he will predict wind velocities, humidity, and temperatures for more than 90 agricultural areas in California. His monotonous "Pomona, 28; Ontario, 29; Cucamonga, 27; * * *," is as well known to radio fans as the chant of the tobacco auctioneer.

Young shares the 8 p. m. spot on KFI with whatever NBC network show happens to be broadcasting at this time. For every minute he is on the air, it costs the station a cool $125. But KFI is happy to chalk the loss up to public service.

He began to supply frost warnings for radio broadcasts in the 1920's, took over the microphone himself in 1930 and since then has batted consistently between 90 and 96 percent in his frost warnings.

A couple of years ago when his 8 p. m. broadcasts were turned on Sunday nights in churches in the citrus district, an imaginative newspaperman dubbed him "Patron saint of the smudge pots." Somehow, the title fits.

Mission to the Vatican

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following excellent and timely editorial which appeared in the Washington Post this morning, August 10:

MISSION TO THE VATICAN

At his news conference last week President Truman made it known that he is considering the nomination of a regular diplomatic mission to the Vatican. The arguments in favor of this project outweigh, in our opinion, any possible arguments that can be brought against it; indeed, we have yet seen no argument to the contrary that has had any sounder basis than historical prejudice. Since the Lateran Treaty of 1929 the Vatican has been a sovereign state; and though it is territorially insignificant, its ruler commands a powerful influence in world affairs. In the political sphere this influence is being exerted along lines that are in many respects parallel to those of current American policy, especially so in the question of international communism.

It requires more than ordinary confusion of mind to suppose that the reestablishment of formal diplomatic relationships with the Vatican in any way implies an official endorsement of the religious tenets of the Roman Catholic Church, or an encouragement of its temporal ambitions. Nor would the American principle of separation of church and state be compromised by such a mission, any more than is the case with the diplomatic missions to other countries which have established churches or whose heads of state combine the functions of spiritual and temporal rulers. The proof of this is to be found in the fact that the governments of Protestant and anticlerical and even non-Christian countries have found it of advantage to engage in diplomatic relationships with the Vatican. The Imperial Japanese Government, for example, retained its embassy at the Vatican until the moment of surrender to the American forces.

Nor would the creation of an American mission to the Vatican establish any precedent. An American consulate was maintained at Rome from the adoption of the Constitution and the organization of the Department of State until the collapse of the temporal power of the papacy in 1870. In 1848 a full legation was established there and was continued until 1867. It proved enormously useful to Secretary Seward in his efforts to defeat the purposes of the Confederate emissaries who were seeking recognition by European governments. This mission was never formally recalled; but in 1867 Congress, against the protests of Seward and of Rufus King, the Minister to the Papal States, withdrew the appropriation under which the legation had been operating.

At the end of 1939 President Roosevelt appointed Mr. Myron Taylor as his personal representative to the Vatican. He was eager to reach an understanding with the Pope concerning certain aspects of the policies he was about to launch, to offset the influence of the embassies maintained at the Vatican by the Axis powers, and to give the United States the benefit of an ear at the most advantageous listening post in western Europe. In this way Mr. Roosevelt circumvented the necessity of obtaining congressional approval. There is little doubt that the presence of Mr. Taylor at the Vatican throughout the war years was of incalculable benefit to the United States. Mr. Truman saw fit, despite the vociferous opposition of certain organized Protestant groups, to continue Mr. Taylor in this capacity. But Mr. Taylor's resignation has left the post vacant.

It is possible, perhaps even probable, that prejudice may even at this stage of affairs be strong enough to block senatorial confirmation of Mr. Truman's plan to nominate a regular diplomatic representative. But this is the sort of prejudice that the country can now ill afford. Those who are familiar with the operations of diplomacy know very well that matters frequently arise upon which consultation with the leadership of the Catholic Church is either necessary or desirable. These consultations are now held indirectly and unofficially and often through the mediacy of members of the American Catholic hierarchy. But it would be far more satisfactory on all counts if they were held directly with the Pope himself.

General Walker and Our Americans in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IRVING M. IVES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 10 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a poem by Willard B. Golovin dedicated to General Walker and our Americans in Korea, which I feel is worthy of insertion in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL WALKER AND OUR AMERICANS IN KOREA

"We die before retreat"—
Desperate pledge, born of the heat
Of free men's battle, to contain the frenzy
Of uncaged hordes, forced on the loose
By the aggressors, obtuse
To freedom's ingenuity to produce and war
With sinews of free men
To blast open the traps,
Red-webbed, to ensnare a universe
In labor chains of slaves.
Wake, Americans! Demand wise leadership of statesmen!
Eliminate personal aims, party-line claims;
Burn off the fog of inertia shrouding action.
Each and every thinking human
Reclaim for a shrinking free world
The path out of this greed-grown jungle,
Or damnably suffer the aftermath
Of a civilization drained of civility:
Gray morning, dark noon, ever-cursed night of futility.

Address by Hon. Alexander Wiley, of Wisconsin, at Oakfield Veterans of Foreign Wars Celebration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 10 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, recently it was my pleasure to address a fine VFW picnic at Oakfield in my State. I commented, of course, on the critical foreign situation which is a major concern of the American people at the present time. Mentioned also was the vital subject of meeting the needs of our servicemen and ex-servicemen.

I pointed out in particular in connection with foreign policy review that we must bear in mind the Leninist strategy of attempting to bleed America dry.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of my Oakfield address, followed by a gracious editorial published in the August 3 issue of the Manitowoc (Wis.) Herald-Times commending my review of the situation.

There being no objection, the address and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KOREA, COMMUNISM, AND AMERICA

The fiftieth year of this twentieth century may well be the turning point of this and succeeding centuries. The battle now raging around the port of Pusan may well become one of the landmarks of world history—the history of man's fight for freedom against the forces of slavery and aggression.

The staggering series of reverses which we have suffered in southern Korea is the climax of an era of blind attempts at appeasement of the Soviet Union. This was the era in which our officials acted like naive children who sold away the rights of free peoples at Yalta, Potsdam, and Tehran. As a result, Red Russia, controlling 150,000,000 people in 1938, now controls 800,000,000. Our American boys dying in muddy foxholes are now paying the supreme price for the conference table blunders of the past. But, however much we may deplore those blunders, the big question now is, "Where do we go from here?"

WE ARE IN FOR A LONG PULL

The American people must tighten their belts and prepare for a long pull in meeting the world-wide Communist threat. The eventual defeat of the northern Korean armies will very definitely not be the end of our military problem.

It has been predicted that we may be engaged in a long, 15-year struggle of attrition with the Soviet Union, with the military scene of operations shifting constantly. Even the blindest wishful thinker is now aware that the fanatic Communist conspiracy has now entered a new stage of world-wide aggression. The first stage was internal penetration by subversive influences, use of Red propaganda in the schools, in labor unions, in the Army, in the press, and over the radio in every country on earth. This has gone on continuously since 1945 in southern Korea. However, when this penetration did not succeed in itself the Soviets entered stage two.

WE MUST PREVENT RED SATELLITE AGGRESSION

2. This second stage is the use of Red satellite troops in direct aggression against a sovereign and independent republic, established by the United Nations—Southern Korea. This second stage may last for many years all over the globe, as I have mentioned. At any time Red satellite troops in northern Iran, in Bulgaria, and Rumania may load and fire the cannons of war. Only by decisive defeat of the satellite forces which may go on aggression can we hold back the Red tide. It is our hope and prayer that by our success in this second stage we may prevent further satellite attacks, and most important, we may prevent the third stage from ever developing.

3. In the third and final stage Red Russia might use her own gigantic Red army (200 divisions strong), navy, and air force themselves in direct operations against the West. This would, of course, mean a third world war.

REDS WANT TO BLEED US DRY

We must be constantly vigilant against all three of these possible facets of aggression—internal penetration, satellite aggression, or Soviet Army aggression. Two decades ago Nicolai Lenin, founder of the Soviet Union, stated that he expected to be able to bleed capitalistic America dry. Undoubtedly the masters of the Kremlin hope that by having us dissipate our resources defending Formosa, Indochina, Malaya, the Philippines, Iran, Greece, and all of the other countries in which we have military outposts—that by doing this we will, indeed, be bleeding ourselves dry. It is up to us, therefore, to do three basic things:

1. Get maximum support from our western allies so that the United States itself does not bear the entire economic and military brunt.

WE MUST HAVE ENOUGH TROOPS TO DEFEND UNITED STATES ITSELF

2. Encourage the various threatened nations such as Iran, etc., to clean out domestic corruption, to enact land reforms, etc., so that their native populations do not fall sucker to the Communist appeal. We are deeply disturbed by the continued reports of corruption in the southern Korean government, corruption which has made many Koreans turn to the Red banner.

3. Establish in our own country a system of defense priorities so that we know which are the most important areas here and elsewhere and which are least important areas for defense. We cannot scatter every last United States division throughout the world and leave our own beloved country defenseless. Yet right now we have a bare handful of combat divisions to protect the 150,000,000 Americans.

These, then, are the basic challenges to us abroad.

RELIEVING ANXIETIES OF SERVICEMEN

One of the paramount needs of the present day is to make absolutely sure that we relieve any anxiety which may exist in the hearts of National Guard men, Reservists, and draftees who are called to the colors to meet the needs of our Nation in the present Korean emergency.

I believe that one of the vital matters which Congress can and should do along this line before it recesses is to consider the subject of extension of the GI bill of rights to the veterans of the Korean conflict. As you undoubtedly know, the GI bill, known as the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, provided educational benefits, training benefits, and assistance in procuring homes and businesses for World War II veterans. But that bill does not, of course, apply to veterans of the Korean conflict. It should be recalled that the GI bill (of which I was glad to be an original cosponsor) was enacted 3 years after World War II began, and that the Vocational Rehabilitation Act which applies similarly to benefits to disabled veterans was enacted 2 years after the Second World War began. In other words, Congress gave much prior study to both laws.

Now I am glad to report that the chairman of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee has directed inquiry to the Veterans of Foreign Wars among other nationally chartered veterans' organizations, to learn whether they feel the GI bill of rights should be extended to Korean veterans.

VARIOUS VETERANS' STATUTES ALREADY APPLY

I am glad to say that certain of our veterans' statutes, unlike the GI bill, do now already apply to veterans of the Korean conflict, such as the National Service Life Insurance Act, and the Soldier's and Sailor's Civil Relief Act. This latter statute gives protection to any man called into service by suspending the enforcement of civil liabilities such as on debts, mortgages, etc., which he may have on him before going into the service.

Of course, any veteran of the fighting in Korea who suffers a service-connected injury is also entitled to hospitalization under the present laws governing the activities of the Veterans' Administration.

MOBILIZING THE HOME FRONT BY COOPERATION

Aside, however, from specific aid to our servicemen, the greatest means of instilling confidence in them will be to maintain the home front strong and sound. We must remain united. We must set aside minor partisan differences. We must push aside nonessential controversies in order to meet the over-all challenge. We must curb profiteering, hoarding and panic-buying. To the greatest extent possible, we must get voluntary rather than compulsory cooperation at the present time so as to prevent run-away prices and wages. We don't want too little controls, too late; neither do we want too much, too soon.

Of course, it is our prayer that we will be able to prevent the fire in Korea from spreading throughout the world. Whether or not we will succeed in doing so, however, is up to Joe Stalin and Company.

WE MUST PASS STRONG ANTI-RED BILL

For our part we must protect the security of our country against the Communist menace from within. This means the Senate must act on the anti-Communist legislation—the Mundt-Ferguson-Johnston bill—which we on the Senate Judiciary Committee reported months ago—legislation to register and identify Reds and Red-front groups, to prevent them from getting a foothold in government, to prevent them from getting passports to visit overseas to conspire with their associates.

BEWARE OF PHONY STOCKHOLM "PEACE" PETITION

But as for the individual citizen, he personally must be on guard against subversive propaganda wherever it exists—in his labor union or yes, even possibly in his veterans post, in his school or anywhere else. Right now the individual citizen must combat the infamous and misnamed Stockholm "world peace appeal" which was designed by the Communist International to trap gullible citizens into believing that by signing the appeal they would be helping the cause of world peace.

As you know, this appeal is a petition for the destroying of the existing stockpile of atomic bombs, without however setting up international inspection of atomic factories. Obviously it would be fantastic for America to give up her present stockpile (which is one of the few, if any advantages, we have over Soviet Russia in military strength). I caution our citizens therefore not to sign this or any other phony petition. The Communists are obviously playing on the heartstrings of the American people and we dare not allow them to succeed in their iniquitous plan to divide and conquer us, to weaken our Korean effort and to leave our men under-equipped on the battlefield.

NO REASON FOR VIOLENCE ON REDS HERE

At the same time, I caution any overzealous citizens not to take the law into their own hands, nor to attempt to change the opinions of Red sympathizers by cracking their skulls. The Reds love to pose as martyrs, love to claim persecution, love to create riots. Let's not play into their hands. Let us have no hysteria.

I think that there is none of us who has witnessed the events of the last month and a half without feeling a profound sense of humility. Here it is only 5 years since the guns ceased firing in World War II and once again American boys are dying in far-distant lands. We thought at the end of World War II that we were on top of the world. We felt stronger, richer, sounder, better prepared than any other nation on earth. We thought we had the best Army, the best Navy, the best Air Force, the best tanks, the best planes, the best guns, the best training.

Now we learn that a relatively obscure land with a population only a tiny fraction of ours, with a civilization that does not have the barest element of industrialization is beating back our own troops in Korea. Naturally we ask why? Obviously it is because the hand of Soviet Russia has been in this matter from the beginning as regards training, equipping, and directing the North Korean forces.

WE ARE GOING TO HAVE TO SWEAT PLENTY

We have learned, therefore, that although we are the greatest Nation in the world, we are going to have to sweat a good deal in order to put our fighting forces in effectiveness above that of any other nation.

GETTING ADEQUATE EQUIPMENT

I feel the Congress should make absolutely certain that the American people get $1 worth of value for every single dollar we appropriate to our Armed Forces. We are not going to deny our men a single cent to get the finest possible equipment. At the same time, we do have a right to ask what happened to the $50,000,000,000 which we appropriated to the National Defense Department between 1947 and 1950. You will recall, my friends, that after World War II it turned out that the Army had spent money riotously in all sorts of unnecessary fields. We learned that the Army had bought a lot of luxurious swivel chairs and the like that it didn't need, when it should better have devoted its money to buying fighting equipment for our Armed Forces. We don't want that to happen again.

These, then, my friends, are a few of the aspects of this turning point of the twentieth century.

I am sure that great organizations like the VFW will continue their magnificent patriotic contributions particularly in this hour of international crisis.

SOME SOUND ADVICE

United States Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, who is a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, in talk in Wisconsin over the week end has given some sound advice on how to prevent the United States being bled dry by the Communists. He submitted a concise three-point program that sums up the situation in a nutshell and left his listeners with food for thought.

His first point is that our associates in the United Nations should lend us some practical support in the Korean fight to drive the Reds out of South Korea and not leave the entire burden up to Uncle Sam. High-sounding pledges of support from the big wigs in the United Nations does not help much in driving back the hordes of North Koreans trying to push the Americans off the end of the peninsula.

His second thought is that the United States must urge other nations threatened by communism to clean up conditions at home so that the natives at home do not fall victim to Red propaganda.

His most important point driven home was that we must establish a system of defense priorities so we may know the most important areas of defense here and abroad.

"We cannot scatter every last division of United States troops throughout the world and leave our own beloved country defenseless," WILEY warned.

As a member of the important Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs the senior United States Senator from Wisconsin is in a position to know whereof he speaks. He has come forward with three important points, that the administration should ponder in the present conditions at home and in the Far East.

A Forgotten War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Arthur Pruden Coleman, president of Alliance College, Cambridge Springs, Pa. is one of the outstanding authorities on Russian communism. On July 22, 1950, he delivered an address at Jan Kanty College, Erie, Pa., at annual Polish Day sponsored by the Erie Federation of Polish Clubs. These remarks by Dr. Coleman are a valuable contribution to our thinking on communism at this time. I include it as part of my remarks:

A FORGOTTEN WAR

(By Arthur Prudden Coleman)

The recent events in Korea and the ever-growing consciousness of the Communist danger to the Western World may indeed remind us of a frustrated Soviet attempt to dominate western Europe after the First World War.

After the November armistice of 1918, the retreating German Army group Ober-Oct was immediately followed by the Red army which already displayed aggressive tactics by occupying some of the territories claimed by the reborn Republic of Poland. This, naturally, brought them into conflict with Polish troops.

For some 18 months the war went favorably for the Poles, as important elements of the Red forces were engaged in domestic struggle with the counter-revolutionary armies of Denikin and Kolczak. But in July 1920, the Polish front cracked under the onslaught of a gigantic Russian offensive.

There followed 6 weeks of a dangerous retreat which brought the Communists into the very heart of Poland, and within what seemed to be an easy reach of their coveted aim—a world revolution. Behind Poland lay a defeated and discontented Germany, ripe fruit indeed for Communist propaganda. It is doubtful, moreover, whether France, almost bled to death on the fields of a 4-year conflict, would have offered effective resistance to the victorious Soviets. Great Britain, too, was having its full share of postwar troubles and could not be counted upon for resolute opposition to the magic idea of a "soviet paradise," while the United States was relapsing into a comfortable, yet disastrous attitude of splendid isolation. Such was the picture in 1920.

Verily, the last barriers of western civilization were truly symbolized by the thin line of Marshal Pilsudski's soldiers on the Vistula. A hostile attitude on the part of the supposedly liberal German Government deprived them of urgently needed military supplies from the west. Western help took the shape of a military mission headed by a young strategist of the French Army, General Weygand. Yet even Weygand could not perform miracles, and the final question remained whether the Poles were to be able to brace themselves and repulse the Russian invaders. Few thought that they could, and embassy after embassy soon left the threatened capital where the thunder of guns could already be heard. The British Government, significantly, offered its services as a mediator in the conflict, so forlorn were the western hopes.

But a miracle happened on the Vistula in those hot days of August 1920. On the fifteenth Pilsudski threw four of his badly mauled but still eager divisions into the overextended flank of his opponent. In 4 days of heavy fighting the victorious Red march to Warsaw was turned into a full scale defeat. within 2 months the U. S. S. R. asked for an armistice, and the peace of Riga in 1921 delayed the Communist menace to the world for over 20 years. Has the West forgotten Poland's sacrifice 30 years ago?

There are no more Polish armies on the Vistula today to oppose the progress of the world revolution, still the ultimate aim of the Machiavellian planner in the Kremlin. Indeed, the whole of Poland was calmly delivered into the hands of the Russian dominated regimes, for "(allied) unity must not be sacrificed to idealism." I am afraid that this thought has dominated the thinking of too many high officials in the United Nations.

A peace built on such sacrifices could only be a "Pax Sovietica," and such a peace could not last. The price which we paid for it is now being heavily redeemed by the heroic blood of the Eighth Army in Korea, where American youths pay with their lives for the mistakes of self-appointed experts on Russia and advocates of further amendment.

August 15 used to be Army Day in Poland and it is still celebrated as such by thousands of Polish veterans who have refused to return to "Jalta-Poland." Let us join them on August 15 in paying respect to their dead of 1920. These heroes gave their lives for America as truly as they gave them for Poland. Honor to their memory.

Why We Fight in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 10 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, on the 24th day of July there was reprinted in the Perth Amboy Evening News an editorial under the caption "Why we fight in Korea," written by Mr. Clinton B. Axford, editor of the American Banker, and originally printed in that publication. The editorial has since been reprinted by the First Bank & Trust Co., of Perth Amboy, N. J. It is one of the most interesting, most illuminating editorials I have had the privilege to read, and I suggest that every Senator read it in tomorrow's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that it may be incorporated in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY WE FIGHT IN KOREA

Let no one ever mistake it. These United States are the fruit of a bitter revolution and that revolution marches on in the world. And once more it is engaged in battle against the forces of reaction and tyranny. This time it is in Korea.

It is the revolution that began in England with the Magna Carta, and which, in Anglo-Saxon tradition, has spread across the seas via America to the whole world.

It is the same old battle for democratic rights of man: Free government by representatives chosen by free people. Trial by a jury of free citizens. Freedom of religion, of speech, of press. A government of laws, not men, its military power at all times subject to the civil power. No cruel or unusual punishments. The secret ballot and free elections. Faith in God and truth. The right of all citizens to hold public office. The right to education of our own choosing. The right to own property. A man's home is his castle. Government, a servant, not master of the people. Constitutional government. The right to believe in the fatherhood of God and all men equal in the brotherhood of man.

We are engaged once more, even in little Korea, in the everlasting fight that government of the people, by the people, and for the people under God shall not perish from the earth.

Make no mistake about it, ours are the revolutionary principles. In Korea, once again, men are fighting, men of two races, and dying, for those principles.

Remember:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident.

"That all men are created equal.

"That they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights.

"That among these are: Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

"That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

"That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute new government laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form as to them should seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

These flaming ideals of revolution, expressed by Thomas Jefferson in the Declaration of Independence, inspired the men who marched with Washington, from Valley Forge to victory. They still march on, a great revolutionary idea, all over the world.

It is a revolution in which all classes did and can take part, be they bankers or laborers. "God is just," wrote Jefferson in his later years, and justice as the right of their fellow men was as dear in 1776 to wealthy George Washington and Tom Jefferson, and to bankers like Robert Morris and Haym Salomon, as it is to any man today.

Unlike the Bolshevik revolution, which sets class against class regardless of injustice, the essence of the American Revolution is that its objective is a classless society, in which all men enjoy equal rights. In fact, the essentially revolutionary character of the Jeffersonian idea is that it aims at a classless world, in the finest Christian tradition of the brotherhood of man.

How much, therefore, the unhappy dictatorship that rules Russia must fear the march of the idea that united the United States and wrote the Constitution to bind them together in peace in a Republic governed by representatives elected by all the people.

How tyrants everywhere must fear the world march of that idea, manifested now in the United Nations dedicated to the rights of man everywhere, a constitutional assembly, deriving its just powers from the consent of its members.

The Soviet masters of Muscovy see very clearly that the march of the American Revolution will certainly set their people free; perhaps within their own lifetimes. Certainly, too, it will free the peoples in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Albania, China, Manchuria, and North Korea, whose governments have been overrun by Communist agents supported by the Soviet military and secret police. It will set them free in the democratic pattern, even as it has set free India and Indonesia, in our times, and a century ago set free the nations of South America and Cuba, and even gave to the Russian people, yearning to be free, a half century ago, the Duma, their first and last representative assembly.

In the inexorable march of the American Revolution, some day the Russian people will once again be free to rule themselves. In the certain progress of the liberal ideals of Thomas Jefferson, Patrick Henry, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Paine, James Madison, Samuel Adams, John Hancock, and George Washington, slave-state, Communist capitalism is doomed. It fears for its life. Rightly so, for mankind, including the Russians, simply cannot tolerate for long, government in which trust, justice, human dignity, and honor are denied. Mankind, even the people now deluded by the masters of the Kremlin, cannot remain subject for long to a regime in which lies, slavery, and cold political murder are instruments of government and of imperialistic enslavement of every small nation that is unfortunate enough to be a neighbor.

Some day these nations will be free again, and it is the march of the American Revolution that will set them free. Perhaps it is later than the masters of the Kremlin think.

We need no clearer explanation of Russia's imperialistic expansion and its shameless economic, political, and military exploitation of its own and its neighbor peoples than the psychopathic fear that grips the Kremlin gang as they behold the progress of the idea of liberty and democratic government. Marching on in the minds and hearts of men, it inexorably spells their certain doom, at the hands of the very people whose liberties they have attempted to destroy. This we know and certainly shall see.

Russia's leaders know and believe this and are afraid. In their fear they have thus far stopped at nothing, neither the murder of former political associates like Trotsky nor the mass murder of millions of people who died because they held dear the rights of the individual man. Their victims include ministers of God, teachers, priests, farmers, trade unionists. The blood of these modern-day martyrs for the ideals of Jefferson and Lincoln cries out for justice. Jefferson knew this when he wrote: "The tree of liberty must be refreshed from time to time with the blood of patriots and tyrants."

There is not one Russian Communist leader who does not live in daily personal fear that he will be the next victim.

Russia is in this respect a psychopathic state. Its fear complex foreshadows its certain fall in God's good time. It was old Benjamin Franklin who wrote: "Resistance to tyrants is the will of God." Our revolutionary forefathers believed that, we believe it today. It is the reason we fight in far Korea.

This thing called revolution in Russia is about as revolutionary as the absolutism of Alexander the Great, Caligula, or Ivan the Terrible. It invokes the names of Jefferson and Lincoln. But it drowns them in the blood of countless victims from whom it ruthlessly has taken life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. It calls itself the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, but its assemblies are travesties upon representative government. It claims to be a democracy, but its elections are mockeries of the democratic process. Russia today is not revolution, but counterrevolution.

Contrast Russia's predatory imperialism with the freedom which democratic America has granted to the Philippines, established in Cuba, and now supports all over the world. Contrast the terror that is the instrument of the Kremlin's international policy with the free assembly of the United Nations. Who in the long run of history could mistake the Soviet slave state for an heir of Jefferson and Lincoln and the democratic ideals of the American Revolution?

Implicit in the concept of free peoples and free nations is union of such nations to defend their liberties and the rights of their peoples. Without some such union, as is now being demonstrated in the United Nations front in Korea, and also in western Europe, the alternative is loss of liberties and enslavement for the peoples of the world and their exploitation under the heel of the Communist state capitalists. America and the free world must fight for its life, as well as its ideals. Free peoples must, as Franklin reminded the Continental Congress debating the resolution declaring our independence, "hang together, or we will all hang separately."

Is there no hope of peace then?

By the march of the American Revolution, under God, some day, Yes. A peace of free peoples in a parliament of the world, which has its successful prototype in the peace among the Swiss Cantons and the American States, peace under a constitution of laws those first purpose is the preservation of human rights.

To the peoples of Russia and her unwilling satellite states and allies, that peace beckons with a lamp of hope. How far down the road of enslavement, imperialism and wars the Communist-dominated peoples will be driven, only history will tell. But when they choose to join the march of the American Revolution and replace their totalitarian masters with free and democratic governments, they will be welcome forever to participate as equals in the peaceful government of the free world.

Loan to Spain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 10 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the Appendix of the RECORD the interesting analysis prepared by my friend, Dr. Joseph F. Thorning, associate editor of the Americas and World Affairs. This scholar, who is known as an apostle of the good-neighbor policy, understands how vital in South and Central America is an attitude of friendship toward the good people of the Iberian Peninsula.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In opposing a loan to Spain, the New York Times (August 3, 1950) cites the 1946 resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations. In the same editorial, it is alleged that the United States Senate, in voting 65 to 15, to accord some help to the people of Spain, is going against the almost universal condemnation of the present Spanish Government throughout the democratic world. Summarizing the reasons which led to a favorable vote in a thoroughly democratic body, the editors of the Times claim that these may be based on the premise that Spain is anti-Communist and that it has great strategic value from a military standpoint. Then the readers of the Times and, presumably, the Members of our Congress are admonished that it would be extraordinarily shortsighted if now we fought communism with fascism as an ally.

If, as the Times rightly contends, it is vital for Americans to keep in mind that the enemy in our century is totalitarianism, whether it take the form of communism or fascism, then we must continue to be on our guard with respect to the Marxist totalitarian, Josip Broz-Tito, who has shown somewhat less respect for fundamental human rights than the present head of the Spanish state. It is a policy of calculated risk or a deliberate gamble when we bolster up a totalitarian regime, whose dictator ordered our brave American airmen shot out of the skies over Marxist Yugoslavia, whereas the same intellectuals, who applaud the slightest rapprochement with the totalitarian left, throw up their hands in pious horror when a gesture of friendship is attempted with a Spanish military dictatorship which, according to the highest United States officials in Madrid during World War II, treated our people with fairness and loyalty.

Can it be that the editors of the Times did not study the full text of the discussion in the United States Senate on August 1, 1950? The question is relevant because, in that debate, the most powerful reason, submitted by proponents of the loan, was based upon a passage (p. 19) of Admiral William D. Leahy's book, I Was There. According to the judgment of the wartime adviser of our late President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, the evidence suggested that the Spanish Chief of State, while desiring to appear neutral in the war, really was on the side of the Allies. This testimony, coupled with the fact that the judiciary is independent throughout Spain, furnish solid grounds for for concluding that the present administration there, although dictatorial, should not be characterized, in fairness, as either Fascist or totalitarian.

As Father Edgar R. Smothers, S. J., pointed out in the Times (May 20, 1949) the Spanish Government "has always acknowledged that the state is for man, not man for the state; that besides the proper rights of temporal governments there are inalienable rights of persons, families and social groups; that there is an ultimate source of all rights in the divine law, which transcends all human governments put together." All citizens who have analyzed the magnificent address which Congressman ABRAHAM MULTER of New York made on the floor of the House of Representatives know that, in his submission (Jan. 24, 1950) the rights of conscience are respected in the Iberian Peninsula. The Senators, Democratic and Republican, who led the fight for Spanish friendship, were aware of the facts reported by Representative MULTER.

With reference to the 1946 attitude of the General Assembly of the United Nations, it is a matter of record that our own State Department has been obliged to admit, with the editors of the Times, that the attempted ostracism of a great nation has failed. The bulk of the democratic world agrees: Brazil, one of our best friends in the Western Hemisphere, twice took the initiative to reverse a bankrupt attitude. Almost two-thirds of the General Assembly were rallied to support the good-neighbor move. Next September, our own delegation, at long last, is expected to keep the pledge made by Secretary of State Dean Acheson to the Congress of the United States. This is democratic action: A recognition of the popular will as well as a response, in the words of House Majority Leader JOHN W. MCCORMACK, to "the national interests of the United States." If and when the United States House of Representatives concurs with the Senate on the loan to Spain, it may serve as a hint to the United Nations that the free world can benefit by the cooperation of a number of sovereign states that, up to the present, have been blackballed by the Soviet Union. Perhaps it would be good for the world organization to secure a group of members that would live up to the obligations of the Charter.

If I read history correctly, Spain did not rape Czechoslovakia; it was not Spain that wrought the brutal sovietization of Poland; it was not Spain that created Soviet China. And not even Mr. Jacob Malik has suggested that it was the Fascist beast, Spain, that must be considered the aggressor in Korea. In other words, some of us may be right in thinking that "time has passed since Potsdam" and since Mr. Alger Hiss presided as Secretary General at San Francisco. Whereas the Times makes its case on the basis of an admittedly hopeless policy and an outmoded resolution, the Senate, overwhelmingly and democratically, has decided to initiate a new era of good will toward the people of Spain, in the light of right principles of international law and for the sake of our own security.

Trygve Lie's Attitude Toward the United States and Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 10 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "It's America Versus Russia," from the Indianapolis Star of August 9, 1950, indicating Trygve Lie's stand in a show-down between Russia and America.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IT'S AMERICA VERSUS RUSSIA

All doubt as to where Trygve Lie stands in a showdown fight between Russia and America was dispelled yesterday when the secretary of the United Nations showed his hand in three astounding statements. Here they are from Mr. Lie's own lips:

1. "I am still convinced Russia wants peace."

2. "The United Nations should seat the Chinese Communists as representing China because they control the largest part of China."

3. "It will be up to the United Nations, not the United States, to say what happens after the North Koreans are driven back behind the thirty-eighth parallel."

How long will it take America to wake up to what Trygve Lie is doing as secretary of the United Nations?

Recently Mr. Lie made a trip to Russia, ostensibly to try to work out a formula for peace. What was the result? He returned to New York and made an impassioned plea to have Red China admitted to the United Nations.

Mr. Lie insists, despite everything Russia has done during the last 3 years to stir up international turmoil, that the Russians want peace. Of course they want peace. At the price of making every American and every other citizen of a free country the abject slave of the Red Politburo. Yet Mr. Lie pleads with the world to listen to Russia's plans for peace.

For the last 6 weeks American boys have been dying in a war in Korea for which we were unprepared. To this day nobody understands why President Truman reversed himself, General MacArthur, and the Joint Chief of Staff and got us into this war. Into it up to our necks. And the United Nations hasn't sent even a nurse, janitor, or a street cleaner to aid American ground forces. However, when an American counteroffensive is launched, Mr. Lie solemnly announces that it will be up to the United Nations (that is, Mr. Lie) to say whether we push the North Koreans back into Russia or stop at the thirty-eighth parallel.

What more proof does our stupid, blind, inept, and faltering State Department want that Mr. Lie is merely a stooge being used by Russia every day to confuse us and weaken our defense against the Red menace?

And who is the most vigorous supporter of this brazen Lie in the United Nations? You are right. None other than Eleanor Roosevelt. The same Eleanor, who when she was the First Lady of the land, helped, nourished, protected, and abetted such outright Reds as Hiss, Bridges, and Eisler. It was Franklin Roosevelt who at Tehran and Yalta made the deals with Stalin that have enveloped us in the most dangerous mess ever confronting the United States.

How much longer will the American people stay asleep to the danger that confronts us? How much longer will we tolerate leadership in Washington that betrays us with a continuous array of Hiss, Eisler, Coplon, Gold, Fuchs, and Bridges—not to mention other undisclosed Reds in the State Department?

We cannot appease Stalin, although our State Department has been trying to do so for 5 years. We cannot even do business with Russia. We ought to refuse to give aid or funds to any nation that ships Russia so much as a single bag of salt. As Churchill says, "You cannot kill an octopus by clipping off its tentacles. You must cut its heart out." That is the only thing that will stop the Communists. This is Armageddon. Either we are for a free world or we are for a world ruled by the Reds.

America will win this fight with bold leadership, courage and clear vision. Or we will go down in humiliating surrender to the ruthless Reds. There is no appeasement. The sooner we get leadership in Washington that understands this, the better. This is it. Either we win all or we lose all.

And we will be carrying the fight almost single-handed. We have spent many billions trying to influence nations and make friends abroad. But when the show-down came, how many friends had we bought with our billions? How many nations sent planes and troops to Korea? They will always take our money, but they will let us fight the battles.

It is America versus Russia. And God have mercy on our souls if we don't wake up and understand how tragically true this is.

What can you do about it? Why, bombard Washington with demands that we quit listening to the appeasing pleas of the Lies and Eleanors and the pinky cowards of procrastination. Demand that we start now and lose not a day or an hour in getting ready to meet the Red challenge. Demand that we make all other considerations, especially the fall election so close and dear to Mr. Truman's heart, completely secondary to our national survival. In other words, let's quit living in a rosy fog and begin to acquit ourselves as realistic Americans who are faced with the gravest danger in our whole national history.

World War III Has Started

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, the statements below were made by me in 1948. My record of warning the people and our Nation's leaders began in 1934. I did all I could to prevent world war III. I am one of the few here in Washington who was never duped by the Communists.

Now everyone running for public office or Congress is against communism. But where were they before Korea? They were strangely silent. Since 1934 we have built Communist Russia into a monster with our money and materials. Those loud voices now were strangely silent during all those years.

People in northern Wisconsin will remember how in 1939 and 1940 I appeared everywhere I could to try to wake our our leaders to the danger of world communism. So I am no bandwagon climber on this issue. I was one of the few who saw the light long ago.

That is why I voted for a 70-group Air Force as long as 4 years ago. But our leaders said we did not need it so we have very little Air Force.

That is why I opposed the sabotaging of our Marine Corps, our Navy and Coast Guard. But our leaders said we did not need them, so we have not much of any preparedness.

That is why I opposed billions of dollars of loose spending all over the world, much of which eventually got to Communist Russia. But our leaders said we must prove to the world how big-hearted we are. So Stalin got most of it in the end.

That is why I voted against the silliest give-away program we have ever seen—throwing away our tanks and ships and planes to irresponsible people and governments all over the world. Now we are caught short. But our leaders said we must make everybody happy. So we gave it away and have little left.

That is why I supported a universal military-training program, because I knew some day we would wish we had it. But our leaders said "Stalin isn't a bad fellow, it is somebody behind him."

That is why my voice alone was lifted in protest way back in 1945 against the criminal appeasement of Stalin at Yalta. But our leaders said if we give Stalin enough he will get to like us.

That is why, in 1945 and 1946, I accepted the presidency of the World Bill of Rights Association, the presidency of the American Anti-Communist Association, and directorship of the World League To Stop Communism. It was unpopular to talk against Russia then. Yet, I had the courage to do it. But our leaders said we must not do anything to make Stalin mad at us.

That is why I voted for and supported the Committee on Un-American Activities to get the Communists off the Government payroll. But our national leaders said "that is just a red herring."

That is why I voted for the Mundt-Nixon bill to get all Communists to register, and prohibit the use of United States mails by them so that we could stop their traitorous work. But our natonal leaders said that interferes with freedom of speech.

So, while our boys are dying in Korea to stop communism, we have 58,000 Communist agents in the United States. Sounds silly, does it not? But it is true.

Yes, I am one of the very few who saw the light, and my vote never gave a gun or a nickel to Stalin. Too bad there were not enough of us here in Washington. We would not be in world war III if there had been more of a like frame of mind here.

Organization for Security at Los Angeles-Long Beach Harbor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CECIL R. KING
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, with unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include herein an editorial appearing in the Wilmington Press-Journal of July 27, 1950; an editorial appearing in the Los Angeles Times of July 27, 1950; and a news story appearing in the Los Angeles Times of July 26, 1950.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to bring to the attention of the House of Representatives the fact that the Los Angeles-Long Beach Harbor is the first port to be organized on a security basis for the present emergency. Spearheaded by Admiral Frank D. Higbee, United States Coast Guard, retired, highly skilled technical men of the Los Angeles Harbor area have been forged into a force that can swing into action in case of war or any other emergency. Admiral Higbee and his associates are to be commended for this most excellent achievement which has been duly noted by the press. Recognition of this achievement by the press appears in the editorials and news story which follow:

[From the Wilmington (Calif.) Press-Journal of July 27, 1950]

Admiral Frank D. Higbee, United States Coast Guard, retired, security officer here during the early part of World War II, and currently captain of the port for the harbor department, this week earned another stripe and medal for being the first of the Nation's port officials to formulate a security force similar to that which operated this port during the last war, and similar to security forces which controlled operations in other American ports during the period beginning in 1941 or thereabouts and continuing until hostilities ceased in 1945.

Admiral Higbee is a man of action—not promises. He also is a two-fisted gentleman who has intestinal fortitude enough to call his shots and then stick by his guns.

He should have been a fighting marine—but, then, America has other fighters, too, like the admiral, and in other branches of our military. So we won't quibble about this.

The nice thing to know is that in emergencies the great Los Angeles Harbor has a gentleman at its helm in Admiral Higbee who is capable, efficient, and a man of action and, best of all, a gentleman who won't take "guff" from anyone, big or little, influential, or just a "joe blow." They all look alike to the admiral, and he treats them the same.

[From the Los Angeles Times of July 27, 1950]

HARBOR DEFENSE

Civilian and Government elements at the harbor are to be commended for their forehanded action in organizing a unit to work for the protection of that vital area. Industry, security organizations, Coast Guard, Army, and Navy joined in the unit which will operate along lines developed during World War II.

It is, of course, unnecessary to worry about an enemy fleet sailing into the Catalina Channel and shelling the port. An air bombing attack also seems to be in the indistinct future, but there are plenty of other means a determined enemy may use to injure our harbor facilities. As the Korean affair develops, Los Angeles Harbor will continue to increase in importance.

This country was wonderfully free of enemy sabotage in the last war. The situation is quite different now. Laxity in vigilance, lack of preparation, may result in incalculable damage being done the port.

Likewise, uneconomic and uncoordinated operations can cause losses equally as damaging as subversive activity.

[From the Los Angeles Times of July 26, 1950]

EMERGENCY HARBOR FORCE APPOINTED

Highly skilled technical men of the Los Angeles Harbor area have been forged into a skeleton force that can swing into action immediately in case of a war or other emergency.

Announcement of their appointments followed a meeting yesterday in Wilmington of 40 representatives of industry, security organizations, Coast Guard, Army, and Navy.

Admiral Frank D. Higbee, USCG (retired), captain of the port, presided as head of the harbor emergency force.

A security pattern similar to that followed during World War II was outlined. And a belief was voiced by a number of leaders that a unified identification procedure be set up in case of emergency, with the unit cooperating with the FBI.

SHIP HALTING DENIED

Except for the skelton force of experts, the harbor emergency force planned no additional action at the meeting.

Rumors that foreign vessels were to be halted by the Coast Guard 3 miles offshore for inspection by Customs and United States Public Health Service officials were branded false.

Russell A. Williams, Deputy Collector of Customs; Capt. John Trebes, commandant of the Eleventh Coast Guard District, and a Health Service official all joined in saying they had not heard of any such program.

Jack Malseed, veteran oil terminal manager, was appointed deputy commander of the harbor emergency force under Admiral Higbee.

GROUP CHAIRMEN

Chairmen of various groups pertaining to harbor facilities and security were named as follows:

Arthur Woll, tank ships; William Harrington, shipyards; Bert Hale, ships assistance; Orlo Peugh, Long Beach Harbor Department; John Fipps, small boats; Carl Moribito, ship service; C. T. Solomon, marine surveyors and underwriters; Commander E. H. Zecher, pilots, and Carl Sennema, tugboats.

Most of these appointees served in similar capacities during World War II.

Rt. Rev. Msgr. Ottavio Silvestri

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH L. PFEIFER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. JOSEPH L. PFEIFER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting in the RECORD a translation from the New York Italian newspaper Il Progresso Italo-Americano, Sunday, August 6, 1950, relating to the death of Monsignor Silvestri, one of the best known priests in the diocese of Brooklyn. Monsignor Silvestri died last Saturday and was buried yesterday from the church he founded nearly 40 years ago.

In the death of Monsignor Silvestri the people of my district have lost an irreplaceable friend and leader. His death is felt deeply by all denominations. The results of his more than a half century of service to his God, his adopted country and community will never be forgotten. His eulogy is expressed in the article which follows far more beautifully than is within my power to put into words:

THE DEATH OF THE VERY REVEREND MONSIGNOR OTTAVIO SILVESTRI—HIS WORK FOR THE EMIGRANTS

GENERAL MOURNING

Last night the Very Reverend Monsignor Ottavio Silvestri, beloved parish priest of the popular Church of San Giuseppe and founder of the Roman Catholic Church at 185 Suydam Street, Brooklyn, rested his soul in God.

The news spread rapidly through the neighborhood where many families of Italian origin live and was received with vivid sorrow and regret. Monsignor Silvestri was revered by all. Many women wept.

Monsignor Silvestri had directed the important parish with love and faith ever since the day on which the church was built in 1921, and his apostleship was an inspiration for all.

He had not only dedicated himself wholeheartedly to the building of the beautiful church, but also looked after the construction of the rectory, the important parochial school, the convent, the playground, and the community center, which is regarded as one of the best of the diocese of Brooklyn.

The body may be viewed at the community center, which was so dear to him, and on Tuesday night will be carried into the church.

It is requested not to send flowers; only mass offerings will be accepted.

HIS WORK

About 40 years ago the section of Suydam in Brooklyn was only tangled underbrush. Tangled were the roads, and tangled also were the souls of the Italian immigrants, desolate in the vastness of the land, left to themselves, scoffed at, miserable and lonely.

But there came a man, a Christian priest, and settled in their midst. From that time on the underbrush began to sprout the first pallid flowers, and then, as the years went by, everything all around experienced a prodigious flowering; the souls, the work, and the Christian beauty.

This priest, who bore the beautiful Latin name of Ottavio Silvestri, gave life to the parish of S. Giuseppe. Priest and founder of this Roman Catholic Church. The modest little church stands at 185 Suydam Street, and since the day it was founded, how much work, what miracles of self-denial, almost heroism, were performed in order to give new courage, more real faith to this mass of workers. But from that day on the name of this vigilant apostle of the Catholic Church was spoken with love, with reverence, by thousands of emigrants who sensed in him a token of the old country which they discovered in him with the deep-seated affection of the native of the mountain or the plains. His name was on the lips of the young and the old, of the good, and also of those who had gone astray, to whom he always lent a hand, ready to help, to ease a pain, to forgive, just as Christ had once forgiven man.

The years rolled by fast, but the work was immense and the time passed swiftly and then the year of 1947 arrived which marked a date brilliant with glory for the parish of the church of S. Gouseppe—50 years of apostleship, a mark of holiness stamps his everyday action, a deep well of good works which neither man nor time can easily drain.

But on that festive day, the praise of his people, delirious with enthusiasm, surpassed all limits, and the reverance and admiration of the sacerdotes and high prelates and persons from every field of human endeavor told him that the seed profusely sown in 40 years of indescribably hard work had not been sown in vain.

Monsignor Silvestri was the soldier of Christ who for many long years knew how to fight the good fight, he was the wise and noble leader of souls, who knew how to guide, through thick and thin, the legions of Christians who trusted him, toward a goal which surpasses any earthly interest; he was the master who always knew how to inscribe, inculcate, and maintain in the hearts of his believers, firmly and unshaken, the teachings which Christ had sealed with his blood.

To the mind of the young Levite the grave and impelling social and religious problems which the mass emigration of Italians to America presented at the beginning of this century were nothing new. Especially in the large metropolis of the East, where the biggest stream of our emigration flowed, it was profoundly felt to be the business of the priests of the disposition, of the apostolic caliber of Monsignor Silvestri.

In those days the Italian emigration presented the most discouraging and miserable picture in the history of the movement, or displacement of masses of people in search for work.

The governments occupied with other problems could not, or did not know how to, find time to occupy themselves with this grave and complex social and political problem, whose solution must necessarily have grave and important repercussions upon the economic and civil life of the country. To relieve this astonishing negligence, this shameful negligence, help came from the great mother, the Catholic Church, which with generous solicitude and manifesting its truest, inherent, universality searched in the realm of the mind for means with which to relieve that which so unfortunately warps the minds of and keeps poor our emigrants.

And what did Monsignor Silvestri do in those days when our people wandered all over the world and presented the most miserable spectacle which can possibly be presented by an amorphous mass, without discipline, without protection, and without faith?

He was precisely the product of that ancestral faith of the force, resistance, courage, perseverance, complete ignorance of the language, history, customs, traditions of a nation known only by name. Added to all this was that sense of diffidence, doubt, animosity, and contempt for everything Italian.

Monsignor Silvestri dedicated practically all the better part of his life to the welfare of the Italians. He sowed on sand and made corn grow in sand, he sowed on stone and among the stones there were plants and blossoms too. He made one of the poorest parishes into one of the most important in the United States.

Government Controls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Albert S. Goss, master of the National Grange, appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee of the United States Senate a few days ago and gave his views and the views of his organization with reference to Government controls. I think the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD would be interested in what Mr. Goss had to say on this timely and important matter.

The following is the statement that Mr. Goss made and to which I refer:

TESTIMONY OF ALBERT S. GOSS, MASTER, THE NATIONAL GRANGE, ON S. 3936 BEFORE THE SENATE BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE, JULY 26, 1950

1. The brief time allotted to discuss so far-reaching a bill precludes doing more than present two or three recommendations which we consider most important.

2. In time of emergency it is often necessary for democracies to increase the power of their executive officers in order to make quick decisions and quick action possible. Thus, the Government becomes farther removed from the control of the people. The control of the Federal Government by the people is not exercised by the election of a President once in 4 years, but rather by the election of their Representatives in Congress. Usually the President is elected on a very few major issues, sometimes a single issue. Many of these are of transient importance. On the other hand, the Members of the Congress are elected for the purpose of representing the people of their districts on every issue which arises, and the very life of a true democracy depends on keeping the control of governmental policy in the hands of the people's constitutional representatives.

3. In time of emergency speed and ability to make quick decisions are needed, but the counsel of the people's representatives is also needed. Congress can provide adequately for speed and quick decisions without surrendering its responsibilities and without placing in the judgment of one man absolute powers over the economic life of the Nation. He might be the ablest man in the Nation, but the problems confronting the President in a defense emergency are so extremely complex that Congress has no right to assume that any one man can meet them without adequate aid. The people have every right to expect that Congress will provide sufficient aid and at the same time maintain adequate control of those powers upon which their freedom depends.

4. The bill under consideration gives the President almost complete powers over our economic life for a period of 2 years. No matter how many mistakes might be made, or how serious they might be, only by a procedure almost equivalent to impeachment could those powers be retrieved, and then possibly too late to prevent irreparable damage. The powers might be wisely administered in some respect and poorly administered in others, in which case Congress would be practically helpless to correct the weakness, no matter how glaring it might be.

5. On the other hand, quick decisions and quick action, where action is needed, must not be subjected to the slow processes of congressional deliberation. We deem the present situation so serious that all practical steps should be taken without delay to mobilize our full economic strength to meet any emergency which may occur. Events may soon develop which justify the immediate exercise of any one or most of the powers conferred in the bill. Even more power to ration supplies at the consumer level and to control prices and wages may be needed. With two or three exceptions, which we will point out, we think it probably wise to grant the President most of the powers contained in the bill, if and only if, adequate safeguards are provided so that the Congress is kept in touch with the situation at all times; so that mistakes may be promptly corrected; and so that limitations may be provided where powers are not wisely used.

6. Many costly mistakes made during and since World War II could have been avoided if the representatives of the people had been consulted. These are still fresh in our minds, and should serve as a warning not to depend almost entirely on the judgment of one man, but rather to provide for adequate consultation and the sharing of the responsibility by the Congress.

7. We believe this can be accomplished without sacrificing in any respect the power for quick decisions and quick action by providing two amendments to the bill.

8. First, we would recommend that there be established a bipartisan Joint Security Committee of eight members, four to be selected from each House. It should be the purpose in the selection of the members of this Joint Security Committee to give major consideration to the experience, the capacity, and the trustworthiness of those selected, without regard to their seniority or committee position. To accomplish this it is suggested that, by caucus, the majority and minority parties in each House each select two members, and that the eight members so selected be confirmed by two-thirds vote of each House, thus putting a firm stamp of approval upon them. Any member should be removable by a two-thirds vote of the House of which he is a Member.

9. This Joint Security Committee should act as an advisory committee to the President, and the powers conferred upon the President in this bill should be exercisable only after he has consulted with the Joint Security Committee with reference to them. The committee should be constantly available throughout the life of the emergency. The President's hands should not be tied by any requirement that the committee assent to his action. However, the committee should know what is going on except in one type of case, when, in the judgment of the President, the military security of the Nation demands complete secrecy. It is thought, however, that with men thus selected for this position of trust, such cases would be rare. The Joint Security Committee should make to the Congress such reports and recommendations as it determines are justified.

10. Thus, the Congress would continuously work with the President in carrying the heavy war responsibilities, while leaving to him the right to make decisions after the benefit of conference with the representatives of the people.

11. The second amendment should be to provide that the Congress by joint resolution might withdraw or modify any one of the powers granted.

12. With such safeguards, much broader powers could safely be granted to the President than if there were no such safeguards. Without some such amendments, we believe practically every title of the bill would need very careful study, with many revisions, because of the possibility of the serious consequences which might easily arise from the unwise exercise of the extremely broad powers provided in it.

13. We wish to comment on two sections specifically. Section 412 would serve no useful purpose and should be deleted. Its sole purpose is to place in the President's hands power to prevent inflation in the price of a few commodities of which the Government holds a supply. It authorizes their sale at the support price instead of at 105 percent of the support price plus carrying charges as under existing law. There can be no danger of an inflated price as long as Government stocks can be sold at less than parity. That is already provided in existing law. The proposed provision abandons the whole parity concept and establishes an uncertain support level as a fair market for farmers. It is the opening wedge for possible roll-backs which proved completely unworkable during the days of OPA. When the support price and the sales price are the same, no private dealer could enter the market, with the result that Government trading would soon be substituted for private operations. The very fact that such a futile and unworkable provision should be proposed demonstrates clearly the need the President has for consultation with representatives of the Congress.

14. Section 411 deals with a highly technical subject which has had extensive study by the Committees of Agriculture. We feel that this section should also be deleted and a new bill covering this section alone should be introduced and referred to the Committee on Agriculture, because we believe that limitations should be provided to avoid the possibility of costly errors.

15. Summing up, we recommend the deletion of sections 411 and 412. We believe the bill provides a dangerous delegation of powers unless a Joint Security Committee of the Congress to confer with the President is created, leaving him freedom of action, but providing advice and counsel so that our democratic processes may be preserved and put to practical use.

Understanding the Russians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am including as part of my remarks an address delivered by Arthur Pruden Coleman, president of Alliance College, Cambridge Springs, Pa., entitled "Understanding the Russians." I commend this excellent speech to all Members of this body. It was delivered on June 25 at Monessen, Pa., on the seventieth anniversary of the participation of women in the Polish National Alliance. It follows:

Friends, as we celebrate our national Independence Day in this peaceful and idyllic retreat, the news that comes to us from the outside world is frightening indeed. At last, it seems, we are beginning to reap the whirlwind we sowed the seeds of at Yalta and Potsdam. The crisis comes in the Far East. But the seeds of this crisis were sown in Europe. The cloud "no bigger than a man's hand" from which this tempest has grown first took form in Europe, on the very territory from which the ancestors of you my listeners once emigrated. The misguided policy which has led us to the Korean clash was begotten by our State Department for eastern Europe. Now its liquidation is seen in Korea, but only its liquidation, not its origins. The origins were in eastern Europe. In Korea all the errors of judgment with respect to the peoples of central and eastern Europe have come together in one awful culmination, and brought us to the brink of war.

Yes, the Korean crisis is the fruit of our policy as a nation with respect to the peoples of central and eastern Europe. What has that policy been, and what is it still today? Let the man who was one of its chief architects tell you. Let George Kennan, one of the master minds of our State Department, define that policy.

In an address delivered recently before the Russian Institute at Columbia University, and now reprinted in shortened form in the June 26 issue of the New Republic magazine, Kennan gives us a clear exposé of our State Department's policy. "Understanding the Russians," Kennan's address is called, and this title, in mockery, I have taken from him as the title of my own address to you today.

As we read Kennan's words, we are at once brought up sharp, for here, in clearest terms, is a confirmation of our worst suspicions. In clear outline—and coming from such a source it can certainly be taken as official—we have the pattern of thinking that has prevailed in our State Department for at least 6 years now. Here we have the policy analyzed that has brought us by one false step after another to our present deadlock with the Soviet Union and, specifically, to the Korean crisis.

Kennan's statement is, first of all, a masterpiece of omission and evasion. It is a plain sidestepping of the central issue in our dealings with the Soviet Union. The central issue in those dealings should properly be the question of the races other than the Russians who are now held in bondage within the Soviet orbit. Kennan has not a single word to say on this issue.

As everyone who has studied history knows, Russian foreign policy has since the time of Peter the Great had a single fixed idea driving it forward. That idea is that the Russian state cannot fulfill its destiny, cannot even, in fact, exist as a state, until and unless it embraces within its sphere of influence all the Slavic branches. This means not only the orthodox Slavs of Serbia and Bulgaria, whose culture has the same roots as the Russian, but also the western Slavs—Poles, Ukrainians, Slovaks, Lusations, Czechs—whose culture, along with our own, derives wholly or, as in the case of the Ukrainians in part, from Rome.

This fixed idea of Russian policy, this idea that never changes though the centuries elapse, is never once mentioned by Kennan in his address before the Russian Institute. In complete silence this spokesman for our State Department passes over the aspect of Russian thinking that is at once most central and at the same time most crucial for us in our relations with the U. S. S. R.

From the policy which I have referred to above, the Russians have never, I repeat, deviated in all the centuries. At times they have been able merely to inch forward in the direction of its realization. At other times they have gone forward to their goal with leaps and bounds. The latter we have seen them do in our own time, and with the sanction of our own State Department.

Yet nowhere, in his whole address, as reported in the New Republic, does this spokesman for our Nation's policy at any time, either directly or by implication, once refer to this fixed idea of the Russian policy.

What Kennan does do, on the other hand, is spend long paragraphs in an effort to show us why we as Americans must be patient and tolerant and infinitely forbearing with the Soviet Union. Kennan is, of course, as a patriotic American, against communism. But despite this, his plea turns out almost as an apology for communism, as he urges us, the American public, to be endlessly patient with the evils of communism. The Russians, Kennan argues, have suffered so long and so bitterly through the centuries; have patience, you Americans, with their struggles upward. They lived for so long, these Russians, Kennan says, in archaic darkness and intolerance, forgive them now. Be tolerant with the Soviet system, he tries to persuade, and help the Russian people as they strive to emancipate themselves, ever so painfully, from the grip of ancient usage and symbols. Never forget, this official of ours urges, that in the Russian people there is immense good, immense faith in humanity, and a profound belief in certain abstractions such as decency, honesty, kindliness, and loyalty.

Of course, Kennan is right. Of course, we must be patient with the Russian people and pity them as they rise from the darkness of the past. But what about the people who are the victims of the Russians—the people who are slaves today—because they stand in the way of the realization of Russia's ancient and fixed idea? What about expending a little patience on them—a little effort in order to understand their point of view? What about a little pity for their fate—the more so as they are, culturally, our brothers born?

It is here that we find the terrible and tragic fallacy underlying Kennan's smooth reasoning. In all the dealings of our State Department for the last 6 years and more the effects of this fallacy are seen. Daily we have been led, by this cruel and unsound reasoning on the part of our officials, deeper and deeper into the abyss, ever and ever further on the road, not of understanding the Russians but, actually, of utterly and completely misunderstanding them.

Kennan wants us to understand the Russians. Yet he, and other officials like him, have consistently misunderstood them, for they have evaded, as we have said, the principal issue in Russia's thinking with respect to the outside world. They have side-stepped the central matter of Russia's relations with the rest of the Slav world. These other Slavs, Russia has always considered her own legitimate prey. Yet, in all Kennan's address, there is no mention whatsoever of this. In his tender and nostalgic concern for the Russian people—among whom he has spent much time and whom, understandably, he loves—this State Department spokesman has permitted himself to forget the very existence of at least half a dozen peoples. In his sympathy for one race he has shown himself willing to throw half a dozen races straight to the wolves.

This is the great and tragic fallacious premise on which all our foreign policy for at least 6 years has been built. Russia's fixed idea of absorbing the other Slavs has been whitewashed. It has been accepted as inevitable, and its manipulators—the most skillful diplomats in the world—have been given the green light. Poles and Czechs, Slovaks, Ukrainians, and other Slavs of Latin orientation, have been viewed as proper material for Communist-Stalinist exploitation. This is putting it brutally, but truthfully; nevertheless, this is the way the State Department, in its heart, really feels about the matter.

As long ago as in 1930 I saw with my own eyes the origins of this policy. In the summer of that year I was in Warsaw when the Sherwood Eddy party came through on its way back from the Soviet Union. The members of the party were all leaders of American life. Perhaps the most conspicuous of the group, both because of his height and his high position, was the Honorable Francis B. Sayre, who figured recently in the news in connection with the Alger Hiss case. The Eddy group was rapturous in its praise of what was then called the great experiment and full of the wonders of the new gospel. The lecture on Polish culture which Paul Super, as director of the Polish YMCA, had arranged for the party in Warsaw was listened to politely but with pleasant unbelief and often downright skepticism. Only the paradise to the east captured the imaginations of the party and they had no patience with the slow evolution going on in other countries.

It was then that the nefarious policy we have been following ever since 1944 got its start. In the early thirties Americans by the carload made the great pilgrimage to the Red god in Moscow, and all too many of the pilgrims came away captivated. It was a great trip, every minute of it guaranteed enjoyable by a well-drilled army of modern Potemkins, and those who took part in it were all too often deceived. All too many have looked back to those days with nostalgia ever since.

Kennan and his associates in the State Department are victims of that old mood, which saw everything that transpired in the Soviet Union as good, or, in the light of history, forgivable. Toward the Soviet Union they wear blinders, and refuse to see things as they really are. Mainly, they take no cognizance of the central purpose of Soviet policy—the fixed idea of which I have spoken.

So our officials go on telling us: Forgive the Communists, and pity them. Be patient with Stalinism. Look with tolerance and forgiveness on the new, Red Czardom that has replaced the White. Do not be disturbed when this new terror far outstrips the old Romanov terror in spreading its tentacles about the Slavs of the west.

It is a dreadful thing to have to report the above. We who are familiar with eastern and central Europe know how desperately fallacious the advice is. We know that the Red Czardom of Stalin is infinitely more dangerous to the world than the White Czardom ever was. As a people we Americans had no use for that, because by tradition we are against hereditary absolutism in any form. But with Stalinism; ah, here we do not even recognize the danger, much less combat it. Here we are childish and gullible. Be patient with the Red Czardom, our officials counsel, even forgive its brutalities. Not only that: Some even go so far as to see in Stalinism a great force for good. Some are urging that Stalinism is playing the role of deliverer in the case of such peoples as the Poles and Ukrainians, Slovaks, and Czechs. Daily I read statements in the American press to the effect that these branches of the great Slav family naturally belong inside the Stalinist empire.

Understand the Soviet Union, Kennan exhorts. To which I reply: We understand the Red Czardom only to well. Poles and Ukrainians, Czechs, Slovaks, and the other Slavs understood the policy of their neighbor centuries before our State Department officials were born. It is rather into a complete misunderstanding of Soviet policy and ideals that these officials have led us. It is high time the tide was checked, and the officially created misunderstanding reversed.

Do not lose heart. The tide can be turned. The English element in our population has long been the dominant and most numerous, and in consequence we have, as a Nation, pursued a consistently pro-English policy. From this we may deduce that, as the Slavic element becomes larger, as it assumes greater and greater responsibility in public affairs, we may gradually see our Nation entering upon a course more favorable to the Slavic nations. Favorable, that is, not alone to the largest of the Slav peoples, the Russians, but to the smaller nations as well, in the spirit of Woodrow Wilson. Slowly we shall forge ahead, if only the whirlwind now loose in Korea, which had its source in eastern Europe, does not prove too great for us to cope with short of a general cataclysm.

We must hang onto the thought that, in the long run, justice does prevail. We must not give up, but keep fighting, in the hope that, at long last, we may have a part in seeing that justice is done in the heartland of Europe, among the peoples of Poland and all the other countries, tragically located, between the German sphere and the Soviet Union.

My Second Life

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 10 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD the article, My Second Life, by Stephen L. Debalta, of Washington, D. C., which appeared in the August 1950 issue of Life and Health.

Mr. Debalta was born on the shores of the Black Sea, and studied in France. While still an undergraduate at the University of Paris, he became the youngest editorial assistant of the great French statesman, Georges Clemenceau. After receiving his bachelor's degree, he devoted himself to work on the French daily, Le Figaro. Coming to the United States on an exploratory visit, love at first sight prompted him to apply to Uncle Sam for adoption. Thanks to his knowledge of English, Mr. Debalta had no trouble carving for himself a United States newspaper career. Less than a year after he landed, his first byline feature appeared in the New York Times. The late Melville Stone of the Associated Press entrusted him with assignments in Europe on two different occasions. In 1938, while editor and publisher of a Long Island weekly newspaper, he was stricken with cancer. Still convalescing from the operation which left him without a larynx, but determined to overcome all handicaps, he took a job on the night shift in the New York Times editorial department. At present, Mr. Debalta is a member of the National Press Club and an active news writer on the Washington political scene. He contributes to several dailies and magazines, covering Capitol Hill and the White House.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MY SECOND LIFE—A MESSAGE OF FAITH AND HOPE

(By Stephen L. Debalta)

"Operator, I am calling New York, Academy 2-1443—Please be patient. Don't yell at me; I have heard you."

Far from resenting the angry rebuke of the Senate press gallery switchboard operator, I felt rather amused. To accuse one totally bereft of vocal cords of yelling seems no less preposterous than to suspect a blind man of being a peeping Tom.

Twelve years ago my voice box was carefully removed and deposited in a jar of alcohol. One spring morning I was informed that I had a pimple on my vocal cords, and that my larynx would have to come out. When pressed for an explanation, the surgeon whispered sympathetically, "My boy, you have drawn a bad number; it's cancer."

In those days cancer was not as popular or as publicized as it now is. It was spoken of only in hushed tones, as if it bore the stigma of a shameful infection that the French so discreetly designate as maladie honteuse. Moreover, patients were seldom, if ever, told outright what was in store for them, as quite often the shock of the diagnosis alone was more fatal than the disease.

As I reached instinctively for a cigarette, the addict's ultimate resort in moments of mental stress, it suddenly dawned on me that after all excessive smoking may have largely, if not altogether, contributed to my predicament, and what until a few hours ago procured me an imaginary feeling of beatific relaxation became all of a sudden a suicidal vice.

A few days later I entered the operating room with the confident assurance that the miracle of modern surgery would work wonders for me and that, blessed with a strong heart and immune from the alcoholic blight, I would come out victorious in my fight for survival.

After my nicotine-soaked larynx was removed, I woke up about 12 hours later with a throat slashed wide open and a gust of wind wheezing from under the bandages every time I made an attempt to say something. It took my numbed mind quite a while before I realized that, even worse off than a deaf-mute, I could not utter a human sound.

When discharged from the hospital 2 weeks later, I faced the world as a total newcomer, or a reincarnation of my former self, resolved to begin life anew, and above all, to discover some means of communicating with my fellow men.

I entered into what I am pleased to look upon as my second life.

I was told that somewhere in downtown New York there was an institution dedicated to the task of making people speak. My informant directed me to the National Hospital for Speech Disorders, founded and presided over by Dr. James Sonnett Greene. With pencil and pad in hand I approached the miracle man, who, like Balaam, of Biblical fame, could make even a dumb animal talk.

The doctor's first stern command was "Throw away this pencil and pad." Having thus surrendered my only means of communicating with the outside world, I feared I would have to learn the intricate sign language of the deaf-mutes, certain that my clumsy fingers would totally fail me. I was much relieved when I found out that I could be trained to produce noises by contracting the muscles of my diaphragm, forcing the air out through my esophagus, and then molding the words with my lips as when the sound normally originates in the larynx.

It took me three endless months and a long spell of abdominal pain before I succeeded in squeezing out some weird noises that I shaped into syllables. Dame Nature allied herself with the teaching staff of Dr. Greene's oratorium, and when I graduated at the end of 6 months, I was an accomplished speaker, ready to join the soapbox brigade of pre-election campaign spellbinders.

Except for the fact that my esophageal voice does not possess the pleasing modulation of a professional tenor or baritone, it serves my purpose, and I am able to make myself well understood by anyone willing to listen to me at close quarters and even over the vast network of the long-distance telephone. For practical demonstration purposes I have spoken several times into a microphone, and, thanks to radio amplifying powers, my speech was not only distinct but very loud.

I have thus overcome the principal handicap with which the laryngectomy—the removal of my vocal cords—left me, and more fortunate in certain respects than a cripple whose legs have been amputated. I am, to all appearances, a normal human being, suspected by the average uninformed man on the street of being afflicted with nothing more serious than chronic hoarseness.

The will to live and the faith in the supremacy of mind over matter carried me through the first and most critical phase of my illness, giving me the moral stamina to face an extremely hazardous operation and a painful, protracted convalescence afterward.

The uphill fight for rehabilitation that ensued when I was ready to resume my place in society was a further test of the strength each and every one of us draws from a firm belief in man's mission on this earth.

Self-pity was always abhorrent to me and sympathy inspired by physical handicaps has a humiliating taint, even when sincere and spontaneous. I discovered in the course of my long road to normalcy that in order to leave physical shortcomings unnoticed you must first believe that you are no different from your neighbor and then act accordingly.

In many instances I could have considered my voice deficiency as an insurmountable obstacle, even in my career as a writer, in which the written word has precedence over speech. Very often I am called upon to have long conferences and discussions with editors and publishers, and have never yet failed to stand my ground as if I were physically their equal. Gradually I have grown so oblivious of the scars with which the dread disease left me that not infrequently I wax impatient with people who do not grasp at once the meaning of my muffled sounds.

The wisdom I have gathered during the chastising transition from my former life into my present regenerated existence gives me an irresistible urge to tell my story to all comers and to proclaim over the rooftops the need for every one of us to cultivate these two indispensable virtues—faith and hope—faith in man's immortal destiny and hope in the ultimate triumph of the spirit over the passing ills of his physical body. Courage can conquer calamity.

The World Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey at the annual convention of the New York State Federation of Labor, Monday, July 31, 1950, broadcast nationally over the facilities of the American Broadcasting System:

THE WORLD CRISIS

A distinguished friend sat at my desk the other day and said, "I was in France at the outbreak of the Second World War. Not until that fateful hour did the Government mobilize its full armed strength and call for full conversion to war production. The leaders of the opposition made appropriate statements supporting the Government. France was belatedly ready to work and fight, and she lost."

"I have a horrible feeling," he said, "that the whole world is now in the position I lived through in France 11 years ago."

Ladies and gentlemen, that man was right. The people of France had been concentrating on their own individual welfare. When they did mobilize, they had neither the weapons, the trained leaders, nor the national determination which flows from facing reality. There was a failure to understand the true nature of the desperate struggle that faced them until it was too late and black totalitarianism had engulfed them.

In my solemn judgment, the free world stands in similar peril today. The threat is immediate, urgent, and perhaps desperate.

My purpose in speaking to you today is to say, with all the earnestness at my command, that we of the free world must wake up and realize today the true nature of the onslaught against us by a new and more powerful totalitarianism. We must face reality if we are to survive.

Eleven years ago, there was no single aggressive power controlling one-third of all the people of the world. In fact, the shoe was on the other foot. Germany, Italy, and Japan together had only a tenth of the people of the world and yet they came perilously close to conquering it.

I do not know the timetable of world communism and I doubt if anyone outside the Kremlin does know it. But some things are desperately obvious if we will only look.

For 4 years, I have been saying to all who would listen to me that this crisis was rushing toward us at headlong speed. I have been saying—and have been sneered at for it—that national unity in this country was the most important thing of all because we faced very grave perils.

Two and a half years ago in a formal address, I forecast what has since happened in China and what is happening today in Korea.

I now say to you that while no one can know the timetable in terms of days or even years, it is equally obvious that the Communist schedule includes a similar attack on Formosa. If we defend Formosa, as we have announced we will, then America will be put in the position of being at war with Red China. The problem of military supply and again providing American youth to do much of the fighting is very grave indeed. Moreover, United Nations support is questionable since Great Britain and India have recognized Communist China, which may or may not include her claims to Formosa.

On the other hand, if we do not defend Formosa, then the recent commitment by our Government will be found to be worthless and we shall lose still more of the confidence of the free world.

The problem of Formosa is critical and it should be raised at the United Nations now, rather than when it may be too late.

The Communist timetable obviously includes invasion by satellite nations from Bulgaria through Greece to the Mediterranean.

The Communist timetable obviously includes an invasion of Yugoslavia, which might come at any time.

The Communist timetable obviously includes Tibet, where advance guards have already arrived. It includes Indochina and ultimately all Asia.

They can do all this without showing their hand. They can use their satellites to do the fighting and the dying. Russian troops need not come into action at all until they launch their attack on Iran, which also appears to be on the schedule. That attack will presumably go on to Iraq and probably on through Israel to the Mediterranean. The purpose would be to isolate Turkey and to grab the huge oil resources of the Near East, without which Europe might not survive.

The grand prize on the Communist schedule—short of the world—is, of course, the industrial capacity of Germany and Japan. They feel they then would no longer have to fear American productive capacity.

It is regarded as certain that the Soviet Union has 200 divisions ready for action. It is no secret that 10 divisions represent the present limit of American armed strength. When and whether the Soviet finds it desirable to launch her 200 divisions through western Europe, only time and expediency will determine.

Looking at our own situation for a minute, we must assume that the Soviet has bombers which could reach the Northwest and the northeastern part of the United States and return to Russia. I assume we could retaliate—if we were ready—and had a place to land our planes.

It is believed that the Soviet could also easily conduct what is called "Operation Hot Springs"—that is, sending planes to bomb the great production plants and cities of the entire country, then having the pilots bail out and spend the rest of the war comfortably as prisoners of war at Hot Springs. Needless to say, we could not make similar plans with any confidence that our pilots would be similarly treated.

It is reliably reported that the Red Korean forces contain large numbers of veterans of the successful Communist conquest of China, including many Korean veterans of Soviet armies.

This raises the specter of an invasion of Alaska. Are we any better prepared to resist such an army, which could be of any magnitude the Soviet willed? The first wave of Chinese satellite troops could be sent over and they might or might not succeed. If we successfully resisted the first wave, at whatever cost in American blood, there would then be the second wave and if necessary then a third. There would still be tens of millions of able bodied Chinese males in reserve.

If Alaska should fall, it is difficult to be hopeful about our future.

Now what is the condition of the free world? Obviously the United States is the leader. Yet, apparently it was not even a contemplated part of our strategy to defend Korea. I understand that there were absolutely no plans for the defense of Korea when we moved in and no available adequate arms or trained manpower.

I now raise the question of whether even after this prolonged notice there are today detailed military plans for the defense of any of the other sections of the world in which aggressive action is obviously going to occur and to which we are irrevocably committed.

Even with the programs the President has now proposed, our effort and that of our friends is too much if we are living in a world at peace and too little if we are living in a world at war.

If there are any tanks of adequate size or in adequate numbers why have not some reached Korea after 5 weeks?

If we have enough antiaircraft guns and trained crews in the entire United States to defend one single city, then the rest of the country is better defended than New York.

If there is any civil defense organization in Washington, what has it done? As near as I can find out, the State of New York, through Gen. Lucius Clay, is organizing the most effective civil defense in the entire United States. This is entirely without coordination or leadership from the National Government.

After our program was launched, I was called on the telephone by a nice young man who was supposed to be in charge of this job in Washington. He asked me to make no plans which would be inconsistent with those of the Federal Government. I said, "Which plans of the Federal Government?" He said they hoped to have some in September. I asked him whether he had an enforceable guaranty against attack on the meantime, and he said, "No."

I advised him we would go ahead in doing our best to protect our own people, and would be glad to lend our plans to Washington any time they want them.

Meanwhile, our National Government ended its fiscal year 30 days ago with a billion dollars appropriated by the Congress for the Defense Establishment lying in the Treasury unused.

I give you this summary of our position without the slightest interest or desire at this time to assess responsibility for it. I am not attacking the administration or the Congress. I have not the slightest interest in how we got here. I am desperately concerned with where we are and where we are going.

I state these facts to you because I believe our country and the whole free world are in imminent peril and, as I have said so many times, the whole concept of human freedom is in danger of being wiped off the face of the earth.

I do not ask total mobilization now. I do ask total planning, which is now absent, vastly accelerated production of arms and trained cadres to operate them, so if and when we do mobilize we will be wholly effective. We will never again have months and years to prepare. We must be physically ready at all times and—even more importantly—spiritually ready to resist a peril we really understand.

No one knows whether this peril is simply the ancient oriental device of inflicting a thousand cuts. No one of the cuts is fatal, but over a long enough period the victim dies. It may be the thousand cuts or it may be all-out atomic warfare which may be waged against us. It makes little difference which kind of peril it is, so long as we recognize and recognize immediately as a nation and as a free world, that the time has come for national unity for a single objective and for sacrifice and unity throughout the free world.

This I know: The Soviet Union has expanded in 5 years to the point where she controls 800,000,000 people, or one-third of the world's population. With each succeeding Soviet conquest, more and more people of the free world doubt their capacity to stay free or even the desirability of resisting.

For just one example, it has been dismaying to see the failure of American diplomacy over the last decade in the Near East and to find Arab nations, including Egypt, already seeking to be neutral.

If we weaken or if there is any increase in the flight to neutrality elsewhere in the world, then freedom is lost.

Listen to this—you who may still believe that the United States could live alone in the world or could survive without friends. We—all of us in the United States of America, are only one-fifteenth of all the world.

We need friends who have confidence in our leadership and faith in our ideals. We need friends in vast numbers who believe as we do—or we will not survive. If every male American between 16 and 70 bore arms, our numbers could still not match the hordes of even the Soviet satellites.

Up to now every conquest of Communist aggression has been achieved by spending the blood of Soviet victims—the Soviet satellites. Today young Americans are dying in Korea, fighting the imprisoned and misguided youth of North Korea. It is absolutely essential to the existence of human freedom that everyone opposed to communism unite and do his share. I do not advocate arming a resurgent Germany or Japan but with all my heart I advocate inspiring their youth, together with the remaining free peoples of the world, to join up in defense of their own liberties.

The United Nations is the agency for this leadership. It must not be thwarted by any maneuver or strategic retreat that Mr. Malik may propose on behalf of Russia tomorrow. While we still have a preponderance of friends of freedom there, the United Nations should be asked to lead in calling for the building of a mighty force of those who believe in this single cause. This force for freedom should be recruited from every nation and every people who are willing to defend freedom against Communist slavery.

Specifically, for example, the Japanese Constitution prohibits the maintenance of arms but it does not forbid individual Japanese serving the world organization for the preservation of peace. I am confident that under United Nations leadership and with a full understanding of the necessities, the people of the free nations of the world will respond.

I ask you to listen to me with all your hearts and minds in an appeal which may be premature by 5 or 10 years. Or it could be the last 30 days in which we have to act. No one knows how much time we have.

The only hope we have of making this appeal premature or perhaps unnecessary is if we respond with a sense of urgency and sacrifice to the nature of the world threat. The only way to avoid the dire things that are being plotted against us and our fellow human beings is to act swiftly in all areas at once with a boldness and skill which has not yet been brought to bear.

I beg you to listen to me on this subject because this is not solely a task for those who hold public office. There is a limit to what public officers can do without public support. I ask you to listen and respond because you are elected leaders of organized labor in the State of New York, and you have a mighty influence among our people and among the leaders of labor throughout the free world—there are, of course, no leaders of labor behind the iron curtain. It will not be popular for you as elected officers to accept a call to sacrifice, but it is the duty of elected officers to make unpopular decisions and to provide leadership.

You have a rare opportunity. In your hands lies much of the stability of our economic system, without which we cannot meet this long-continued drain upon our limited resources. If you say to me: "How long will this last?" all I can say is, "It must last until we have assured our freedom and the possibility of armed attack has disappeared."

It will not be over by Christmas, as some are hoping. It will go on for a long time to come.

You may ask: "How much must we sacrifice?" I say to you: "Whatever is necessary. We could not sacrifice enough for freedom. If we should sacrifice most of our physical possessions, we still should not be reduced to the misery of the people behind the iron curtain."

Recent evidence of mass buying by our people is a tragic display of selfishness and lack of understanding. When we are in trouble we customarily help our neighbors. We do not try to grab food or clothing they need. Moreover, the only sure way to create shortages is to buy more than we need now. We are all in this together, and 5 pounds of sugar won't make much difference in the job of saving freedom.

Now I may be called an alarmist—in fact, I already have been. I am not an alarmist. I am a realist. If our way of life is in danger the most important thing in the world is that we face it—squarely and honestly—not hysterically. Then we should tighten our belts, compose our souls, and go to work.

I recently talked with a girl from Czechoslovakia. Her father was a successful farmer and veterinarian, and she and her two sisters had lived with their parents through the Second World War, and then through the period of increasing Communist domination of the Czechoslovakian Government. While the Government was still ostensibly free, a Government agent came to her father and said: "You will continue running your farm as always—but from now on you will take orders from me."

That man and his family abandoned everything they had in the world and escaped from Czechoslovakia with the clothes they had on their backs. They felt the breath of liberty slipping away, even before the Communists took over. They chose to abandon their home, their farm, their relatives and their friends and flee to poverty and hunger in western Germany.

I say to you that no physical poverty which any of us could suffer could equal the spiritual poverty of the loss of liberty.

I have spoken of our own necessary industrial mobilization. More important is to rally the whole free world. But even more important than military strength is that we mobilize spiritually to help save our neighbors.

The peasant family which has been divided in Korea, some killed, some sent to slave labor, cries out for our aid. They cry out in Korean and we may not be able to hear it. But they are God's children too.

Other voices are crying from behind the iron curtain. We cannot help them today but if we are not prepared to help our brothers and sisters of the free world, we shall be earning any tragic fate which may befall us.

There will be no peace of soul for any of us unless we respond to the call of suffering people as Americans have always done. There will be no security or peace until we have learned that unity and sacrifice are the only road we can follow.

We shall never save ourselves unless we first save others.

The hour is very late—I do not know how late. Whether we still have a day or a year or 3 years or 10 years, not a second should be lost. Our Government, our people, the United Nations and the spokesmen of the free world should rally now. If we do—all of us—I do not know how much we will save but at least we will save our consciences, our souls, and we may have an even chance to save human liberty.

Fumbling in Asia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. T. MILLET HAND

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, an excellent editorial recently appeared in the Hammonton (N. J.) News entitled "Fumbling in Asia May Cost Us World Peace." With the permission of the House, I am putting a copy of this editorial in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The editorial follows:

FUMBLING IN ASIA MAY COST US WORLD PEACE

Some say Mr. Truman's order that our troops, ships, and planes fighting invading Communist forces in Korea "cleared the sky" as to our foreign policy. It might be well to review the background.

Russia, after staying neutral in our war against Japan gained a strangling foothold in China. That was our payment—dating back to Yalta—for her intervention against Japan for a total of 6 days in a war we had carried unsupported for over 3 years.

Mr. Truman then agreed to divide Korea at the thirty-eighth parallel with Russia occupying the northern sector and the United States the southern.

Republicans began clamoring early for a clean-cut Far East policy. "What is our policy toward China?" they asked the President when he was demanding bipartisanship. They asked for assurance that the United States would not recognize the new Communist regime. Secretary of State Acheson told them the administration policy was to "wait till the dust settled."

Gen. Douglas MacArthur was recommended to be named commander of all forces in the Far East. It was suggested that our Navy be used, if necessary, to protect Formosa, and even favored long-term United States air and naval bases there. It was believed that Formosa might be saved with relatively little United States military assistance if handled properly. Mr. Truman told a press conference he was not aware that the Republicans making such suggestions were military experts.

The Department of Defense became interested in Formosa. The Secretary of State said Formosa was of no strategic importance. Foreign Service officers were tipped off to pass the word that Formosa's downfall was "widely anticipated" and that military strengthening would be useless.

The split between Defense and State Department views over policy in China and Formosa spread to Japan and Korea. Congress, in 1949, appropriated $10,500,000 for military aid to South Korea.

But the administration policy was to give South Korea only enough arms for internal security, not enough for defense against aggression. Congress has just discovered that only about $200 worth of the appropriation actually reached Korea before the Communists struck.

Had certain influences not prevailed, our southeast Asiatic flank might not now be exposed and Chinese Communists might have been frightened back into the hinterlands of China.

The Community Services Mental Health Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 9 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article regarding the community services mental health program, written by Jerry W.

Carter, Jr., and published in the April 1950 issue of the Journal of Clinical Psychology.

I am informed by the Public Printer that the manuscript is estimated to make approximately two and three-quarters pages of the RECORD, at a cost of $225.50.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMUNITY SERVICES PROGRAM OF THE NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF MENTAL HEALTH, UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

(Jerry W. Carter, Jr.)

Following World War II, congressional hearings revealed that various mental and emotional disorders and inadequacies accounted for the rejection or discharge of 2,000,000 men by the armed services. Moreover, despite the large number screened out before induction, mental disorders among veterans accounted for as much as a third of all pensionable disabilities and over one-half of hospitalizations in the Veterans' Administration. Concern over this cost to the Nation in manpower losses and veteran care led Congress to study the mental health problems and needs of the country.

It was found that more than half of the patients hospitalized in the United States on any given day—some 600,000—were mental patients, and that about 8,000,000 individuals in the country were suffering from some mental disorder. No adequate programs for the prevention and early treatment of mental illness existed anywhere in the country. There were thought to be about 600 outpatient mental health clinics in the country against a minimum need for 1,400. Five States were without any public or private mental health services outside of State hospital care. The foremost authorities in the country testified that the total number of all the psychiatrists, clinical psychologists, psychiatric social workers, and psychiatric nurses in the country amounted to only about 12,000 individuals, or considerably less than the minimum number needed in any one of the four disciplines; that training facilities were adequate to train only a small fraction of the needed personnel; and that the skills and scientific knowledge required to attack seriously the mental health problem on a Nation-wide basis were wholly inadequate.

To help remedy this situation, Congress passed the National Mental Health Act in July 1946. The legislation gave the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service responsibility for developing a broad program to improve the mental health of the Nation through: (1) training mental health personnel; (2) research in the problems of mental illness; and (3) development by the States of preventive mental health programs in their communities.

This program is administered by the National Institute of Mental Health, one of the National Institutes of Health of the Public Health Service. The major objectives of the program are: (1) To develop economical methods of bringing mental health care to persons in need of such assistance; (2) to develop preventive and control methods in the mental-health field; and (3) to promote positive mental health.

A National Advisory Mental Health Council consisting of leading scientific and medical authorities is provided for in the National Mental Health Act. This body advises the Surgeon General on such matters as policy, the distribution of grant funds, personnel standards, and other problems relating to the program. The present members of the Council are: Dr. Franz Alexander, Dr. Leo H. Bartemeier, Dr. Karl M. Bowman, Dr. Alan Gregg, Dr. S. Bernard Wortis, and our symposium chairman, Dr. Carlyle Jacobsen. Assisting the Council are committees on community services, research, and training. The training committee has four subcommittees in each of the following fields: Clinical psychology, psychiatry, psychiatric social work, and psychiatric nursing. The research committee is likewise multidisciplinary including representatives from the various medical, biological, and social sciences. On the community services committee are representatives of the general public as well as the mental-health professions. In addition, the Institute has several panels of consultants which advise on scientific and professional matters, program planning, and special problems. In brief, every effort is made to use the best advisory and consultant resources available.

The National Institute of Mental Health is directed by Dr. Robert H. Felix and consists of the following branches: the training and standards branch, the research projects branch, the biometrics branch, the publications and reports branch, and the community services branch, all operating on an interdisciplinary basis.

The Training and Standards Branch of the Institute administers grants for improving and expanding graduate training in the fields of psychiatry, clinical psychology, psychiatric social work, and psychiatric nursing; stipends to trainees in the above four mental health disciplines; and grants to medical schools for undergraduate instruction in psychiatry. In the current fiscal year, $2,500,000 are available for graduate training grants and stipends and $400,000 for undergraduate psychiatric training in medical schools. Other training activities include demonstrations in professional education and conferences to improve teaching methods, such as the Boulder Conference on Graduate Education in Clinical Psychology held August 20 to September 3, 1949.

The research program of the National Institute of Mental Health is divided into research grants and intramural research projects. Grants-in-aid for research are made to universities and other public or private institutions and to individuals for research in mental health on the etiology, diagnosis, treatment, control, and prevention of mental diseases. Projects are supported from a wide range of disciplines and are not confined to any one field. In addition, fellowships are provided for the training of promising research workers, in any relevant discipline, who are interested in mental health. In this fiscal year, $800,000 will be available for research grants and $100,000 for research fellowships. Since this program has been in operation for 3 years and since many projects run from 3 to 5 years and many fellowships are renewed beyond the initial year, only a fraction of the above amounts will be available for new grants and fellowships during the year. The intramural research program is still in its initial stages of development and will entail a major interdisciplinary research program with its focal point at the Clinical Center now under construction at Bethesda, Md.

In addition to these research activities the Biometrics Branch of the Institute compiles and evaluates statistics on patients in mental hospitals and other related problems, functions which were taken over from the Bureau of the Census in 1948. The Publications and Reports Branch is responsible for the planning, production and dissemination of information about mental health.

The program of the Community Services Branch is one of assistance to States in developing their own community mental health programs based upon local needs, resources, and problems. The expectation is that, with 53 States and Territories developing their own local mental health programs, the more successful patterns of outpatient, preventive, and positive mental health services will emerge for more widespread use throughout the country. In other words, this program is in the Public Health Service tradition, of encouraging the development of strong and independent local and State health resources rather than developing a large nationally integrated program and of emphasizing the control and prevention of disease rather than its treatment.

Prior to this assistance program, which began operation in July 1947, only 22 States had mental health programs. At present all but two of the 53 States and Territories are participating in the community services program. Grants to States available in this fiscal year total $3,550,000. The States are required to match one dollar of State and local money for each $2 of Federal funds received and to submit a plan and budget annually for the use of these funds. They may use funds for any mental health purpose they decide upon except institutional care. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1949, the States budgeted 51 percent for their mental health funds for the establishment, improvement, or expansion of mental health clinics; 15 percent for preventive and educational activities; 11 percent for professional services other than clinic services; 10 percent for training mental health personnel; 11 percent for central administration; and 2 percent for special studies.

In addition to administering grants to States, the Community Services Branch provides professional and technical planning, development, coordination, and general direction in the assistance-to-States program. These activities are carried on through 10 regional offices by 17 mental health consultants in psychiatry, clinical psychology, psychiatric social work, and mental health nursing. Insofar as possible, each regional office is to be staffed with complete teams of mental health consultants in all four of these disciplines. In addition, the Branch operates and directs demonstration projects to try out new and better methods and techniques of rendering community mental health services for use by States in developing their local programs. The Branch also maintains liaison with other governmental and nongovernmental agencies concerned with mental health problems, conducts comprehensive on-the-spot surveys of existing and projected State mental health facilities, and provides, upon request, consultative services to mental hospitals and institutions.

The mental health consultants in psychiatry, clinical psychology, psychiatric social work, and mental health nursing assigned to regional offices carry out the assistance-to-States program by maintaining liaison with State and local mental health authorities, professional groups, universities, and other institutions; by reviewing State mental health programs; and by recommending action on State mental health grant-in-aid plans and budgets. Their chief objective is to assist the States to develop community mental health programs which will: (1) determine mental health needs and resources as a basis for planning and comprehensive and adequate State mental health program; (2) establish an organization with responsibility and authority for the program; (3) develop public interest and responsibility for meeting the mental health needs of the people in the State; (4) furnish mental health information and encourage the application of available mental health knowledge by the public; (5) provide special opportunities for mental health education and training for physicians, teachers, nurses, social workers, clergymen, and others whose daily work may have a preventive and positive mental health influence on appreciable numbers of people; (6) provide educational services for the development of well-adjusted children and adults; (7) provide professional services to infants, children, and adults who have behavior, educational, vocational, personality, or social difficulties which interfere with their functioning to the limit of their abilities and with their personal and social adjustment in life; (8) support or conduct studies which will increase knowledge and make possible a better understanding and handling of behavior problems; and (9) increase the number and competence of psychiatrists, psychologists, psychiatric social workers, and mental health nurses qualified for work in community mental health programs by establishing and supporting service facilities in cooperation with training centers and by supporting the training of partially qualified mental health personnel.

The success of community mental health programs over the country will depend on the knowledge, methods, skills, and the quality and quantity of personnel the several mental health disciplines develop and bring to bear upon the mental health problems of diagnosis, treatment, prevention, and ways of promoting positive mental health. The mental health field is so large and the needs are so great that all the mental health disciplines will have to supplement each other's effort and extend themselves to the utmost if any real progress is made toward improving the mental health of the Nation.

Consider the magnitude of the problem. Mental illness is prevalent in all communities, among children and adults and in every level of society. Moreover, it may be as malignant as a cancer or as mild as a cold. It is conservatively estimated that in the United States at least 1 person in 20 will be hospitalized for mental illness at sometime in his life and that at least 1 individual out of 5 will fall into some category of serious but less acute behavior disorders such as those often associated with criminality and delinquency, accident proneness, divorce, economic dependency, and other individual failures in the performance of major social and personal roles. The annual cost of handling behavior disorders and the loss in earning power and productivity in the communities of this country are calculated in billions of dollars, but the more important intangible costs in human misery and frustration, in disrupted homes, in children deprived of security, happiness, and normal opportunities cannot be calculated. The urgency of this problem is further heightened by the forecast of an increase in behavior disorders out of proportion to the population increase unless something is done, because the incidence of mental disorders increase with age and the number of Americans aged 65 and over is expected to double in the period 1940–75.

To meet these needs for community mental health services there are some 5,000 psychiatrists in the country, but probably not more than 2,000 engage in out-patient work, private practice, and other kinds of services at the community level. Of the 7,000 psychologists we have, there are probably not more than 1,000 in the community services field. Of approximately 1,200 psychiatric social workers, only around 800 work in community mental health. Of the 5,600 graduate nurses working in the mental health field, probably less than 50 are working in the community mental health field. Accordingly, in all the mental health disciplines there are probably not more than 3,800 individuals, including many working only part time, to serve the millions needing community mental health services.

As one of the mental health disciplines, psychology has unique and major opportunities and responsibilities for research, training, and service in the community mental health field that have scarcely been touched.

From the standpoint of psychological research, consider the present state of knowledge concerning the etiology, treatment, and prevention of mental illness and what we know about positive mental health or the principles which will insure mental health. The diagnosis and treatment of mental disorders at best is only in its early adolescence. Prevention is just a toddler and positive mental health is little more than a gleam in the eyes of the National Institute of Mental Health and a few individuals like Daniel Prescott and Ralph Ojeman with their mental health through education programs, Leo Bartemeier with his Cornelian Corners, Lloyd Rowland with his Pierre the Pelican for parents with their first baby and Edmund H. Bullis with his Human Relations in the Classroom. Our best developed community mental health resources are our clinics with their multidisciplinary or team approach and the various unidisciplinary services such as those rendered by psychologists, psychiatrists, and psychiatric social workers. Perhaps the most that can be said for these resources is that they are limited primarily to the early diagnosis and treatment of behavior disorders acute enough to be referred to them. Their work is preventive mainly in the sense that they attempt to prevent even more serious developments which might otherwise lead to institutionalization. Very few of these clinics and professional services attempt much in the way of prevention at the subclinical level and practically none do more than make occasional verbal gestures toward positive mental health, so great is the demand for all available clinical services and so great the lack of knowledge and skills in how to do preventive and positive mental health work. Unanswered are such questions as: What are the major kinds of mental ill health and in what segments of the population are they found? What are the factors underlying mental health and mental ill health? What specific mental health services are needed? How should we go about meeting these needs? The answers to these questions will require research on the basic problems of behavior development; on the nature, etiology, and treatment of behavior disorders; on the development of mass screening and treatment techniques; on community life, its attitudes, cultural mores, problems, needs, resources, and potentialities; and on a host of other related problems, all of which are proper concerns of psychology in some degree.

Upon such researches as these will depend ultimately the answer to the question—What should be the preparation of clinical psychologists for work in the community mental health field? As we now know it, however, the demand is for well-qualified psychologists able to assume positions of professional responsibility and leadership and with enough knowledge of related professions and of the organization and dynamics of communities to recognize, use, and help develop potential mental health resources in the community. Beyond this, clinical psychologists working in this field, as in other fields, should be able to formulate a psychological diagnosis as a basis for treatment planning, participating in treatment, planning, and carry out treatment plans either by providing consultation for others doing remediation or by executing direct treatment measures with consultation or supervision as may be needed. Training and experience for work with infants, children, and adults are also essential. In brief, the need in this field is for clinical psychologists who are interested primarily in extending the application of mental health principles involved in a given case to similar types of cases and in contributing as much as possible to positive mental health.

Concerning the need for clinical psychologists in the community mental health field, there is probably not a rural or urban community of 100,000 people in the country that is not in urgent need of a community clinic with at least one staff member from each of the four mental health disciplines, to say nothing of the needs for psychological services in schools, and other health, welfare, and social institutions. There is an immediate need in this field for a minimum of 1,500 clinical psychologists. Long-range estimates of needs far exceed these modest estimates and make community services potentially the largest field of employment for psychologists.

Study of data published recently by Wolfle and Black in the American Psychologist and unpublished data collected by Limburg reveals that of some 7,000 known psychologists in the United States there are probably only 2,000 in the clinical and other closely related fields of psychological services, with around 1,800 additional individuals in training. Between 900 and 1,000 of these 2,000 are estimated to be engaged in some type of community services work such as in clinics, schools, and other community organizations. Probably very few of those now being trained in clinical psychology are receiving adequate preparation or even orientation for work in the community services field. Whereas about 60 percent of the APA membership have completed their training for a doctorate in psychology, only about one-third of the psychologists now in the community services field have such training. As a group they receive the lowest salaries in the several occupational groups in psychology. Because of lower salaries and lesser status than other psychologists enjoy, psychologists in community services either have had less encouragement to complete their training or the field has not been able to attract better trained psychologists. This is a serious situation because out-patient work or work in open-ended settings like community services requires at least as high if not a higher degree of competence than is required in closed or institutional systems. For instance, in closed systems like hospitals, errors of omission or commission are more readily righted by supervisors than they are in open-ended or out-patient settings where patients are not under control. Also, the variety of patients and problem situations are greater in the community services field and require relatively more extensive if not more intensive skills. The need in this field is for better-qualified psychologists who can render more adequate community mental health services on a professional rather than a technical or clinically useful level. With more status and an improved salary situation, more and better psychologists should be attracted to this field. Needless to say, the National Institute of Mental Health is encouraging just these things in its assistance-to-States program and making every effort to break the impasse that has prevented greater contributions from clinical psychology to the community services field. While the Public Health Service has always been interested in mass services, it has never been interested in quantity at the expense of quality. Rather, in its long history it has found in comparable situations that the argument "something is better than nothing" may be a dangerous fallacy, especially if the "something," such as inadequate personnel, operates to spoil opportunities and make for failures. All too often, after such failures, areas have to lie fallow, sometimes for many years, before another attempt can be made.

In conclusion, the opinion is hazarded that if psychology supplies its share of the research and the personnel needed in the community mental health program, its success will have important implications for all fields of psychology. All psychologists are invited to consider their responsibilities and opportunities in the community services field, regardless of whether their principal interests be in systematic, experimental, animal, social, genetic, educational, clinical, or any other field of psychology. Contributions from all fields of psychology are needed and all psychologists will find some problem in the community mental health program worthy of their attention.

Constructive Action in Combating the Communist Campaign in Support of the Stockholm Peace Petition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday I tried to present to my colleagues, and particularly the Members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, concrete evidence of the activities of a professed Communist in western Massachusetts, one Sidney Lipshires, described as the secretary of the western Massachusetts Communist Party. I know that the membership of that party in western Massachusetts is but a handful and that they have relatively no influence in that part of Massachusetts. I was disturbed, as I think each of my colleagues would be if this had happened in her or his district, that such a person could have influence over one decent American in enlisting her or him in any campaign to obtain signatures to this Communist-inspired campaign. I called attention to the fact that he was very careful not to disclose the number of those who had joined in this effort. I suspect that they were but a very few. Yet, I understand that among the 600 who came to Washington Tuesday but were unsuccessful in obtaining support from Members of Congress, there was at least one person from western Massachusetts. That person did not make any effort to see me. I confess I would have liked to have been in a position to provide her with the evidence I have obtained as to the vicious deceptiveness of this entire program.

I now want to report on the immediate and constructive action taken by all Veterans of Foreign Wars posts in the four western Massachusetts counties. That report is as follows:

[From the Springfield (Mass.) Daily News of August 8, 1950]

VFW URGES PUBLIC TO SPURN STOCKHOLM PEACE PETITIONS—RED STRATEGY CONDEMNED BY VETERANS; AGGRESSION CITED IN STAND OPPOSED TO MINUTE WOMEN

The unqualified opposition of all Veterans of Foreign Wars posts in the four Western counties to the Stockholm peace petition was voted at a recent meeting of the Western Counties Council held in Amherst, it was announced this morning. The veterans' organization strongly urges all veterans to oppose the signing of this petition and to bring out arguments exposing it.

The resolution approved by the Veterans of Foreign Wars declares veterans cannot understand how peace-loving people could countenance the bringing home of the Air Force and other military units from Korea in the face of the North Korean aggression into southern Korea, where a free and independent government was already in existence.

They also question why the petitioners agree with the Soviet stand that Red China should be allowed representation in the United Nations to the exclusion of the Nationalist government, which had been in existence many years and had been forcibly pushed out of its country by the Red aggression.

In the face of these ruthless acts of aggression by Soviet-inspired forces, which have overturned free and democratic government, there can be no peace solution of the problem, the veterans stated. The action of the minute women for peace in backing the peace petition was condemned by the spokesman.

I was also glad this afternoon to see the report in the Springfield Daily News of August 9 that the lady who had been elected president of the so-called Springfield-Chicopee Minute Women for Peace has resigned that position. It is disturbing to read that about 300 ladies had been induced to join the organization. I hope they will take prompt steps to submit their resignations. This article is, as follows:

LEADER OF MINUTE WOMEN FED UP WITH WHOLE THING—CLYDE DORR SAYS WIFE TO RESIGN AFTER CRITICAL COMMENTS ABOUT ORGANIZATION'S STAND; OTHERS MAY DO LIKEWISE AT MEETING TONIGHT

In hot water because of supporting ideologies paralleling those of the Communists, the Springfield-Chicopee Minute Women for Peace are going to lose their president, Mrs. Clyde Dorr, of 106 Massasoit Street, it was learned today.

Mrs. Dorr, who was not available, will resign as soon as possible, her husband said this morning.

"She is fed up with the entire thing," he said.

The Minute Women, reported to number about 300 in this area, have since their formation several months ago continually supported many of the views advocated by Russia and "fellow travelers."

Their motions were connected with the Stockholm peace proposal, now revealed to have hoodwinked many Americans into adding their signatures to the Moscow-inspired document.

The group has been strongly condemned by those who saw the true reason for the Stockholm proposal. Its "essence" has been the same as the line spouted by Jakob Malik, Russia's UN representative.

The Minute Women have circulated a petition of their own, which is reported to call for the same things as the Stockholm document. Last week, Sidney Lipshires, local secretary of the Communist Party, praised the action of the women and said they are "on our side."

Some of the members are now said to be seeing the trap into which they have fallen and many are expected to bow out following their president's resignation.

The Minute Women have a meeting scheduled for tonight at which time it is expected Mrs. Dorr's resignation will be announced. She is, according to her husband, "out of town" and cannot be reached.

Before the Stockholm proposal was recognized for what it is, thousands of people throughout the world had already affixed their signatures to it.

The document calls for the outlawing of the atomic bomb and is specifically directed against the nation having it and not against aggressors. As such it is being used to gain a foothold in the sympathies of peace-loving people.

I also include an excellent editorial upon this particular group in the Springfield (Mass.) Union of August 9. It follows:

THE MINUTE WOMEN AND PEACE

Doubtless, the Springfield-Chicopee Minute Women for Peace comprise an estimable and patriotic group of women. But their executive committee has made a rather lame excuse, bordering on an apologia, for supporting the abortive Stockholm peace pledge.

This so-called peace pledge is an out-and-out phony. It was inspired by the Communists and is being circulated by Communists and anybody else they can use as stooges. It calls for outlawing the atomic bomb, but it does not condemn aggression with other weapons. It is not directed against war, but only against the nation which employs atomic weapons, a very significant difference.

Of course, we all want peace. We all hope the atom bomb will never be used. Who in his right mind doesn't? But it is aggressive Soviet policies and actual Soviet aggression, as in Korea, which constitute the greatest menace to world peace. If any further proof is needed that the spurious and deceptive Stockholm peace appeal is Communist-inspired propaganda, it was given last week by Sidney Lipshires, who is secretary of the Communist Party of western Massachusetts.

Mr. Lipshires was quoted as saying that he welcomed the minute women as an ally for the Stockholm peace pledge. He said that anyone circulating this petition or indorsing its aims is on our side. That should be clear enough.

Thousands of persons in this and other countries who were sucked in by this bit of dishonest and deceitful propaganda have later discovered their mistake and have gone to great lengths to reject their signatures. We think the minute women, who deny they are acting as Communist stooges, should either make honest admission that they were taken in by this Communist-inspired device or should change their name to something more appropriate. The title is all too reminiscent of the minute men who sprang to the defense of their country in a grave emergency against an enemy bent on their destruction.

Gambling on Grain Market Must Cease

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN R. WALSH
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, for nearly a week now, this House has been debating a bill to control inflation in this country. We have all recognized the great need to do something to stop runaway prices. The public is demanding that Congress act and act at once. It appears to me that everyone wants controls on someone else, but none on them. They take a "holier than thou" attitude, and say "we can control ourselves, our motives are clean." Now let us see about this: The realtors have been writing to Congress asking that they be exempt; the banks do not want credit restricted; the automobile dealers association feels that they can handle their own affairs; the wholesale grocers organizations blame the housewife for the increase in prices. All of these groups and many others still insist that we need controls, and want them enacted at once, but "please, Mr. Congressman, do not hurt us."

I say to you now, that the great unorganized citizens of this country who are now suffering from one reeling blow after another in this battle of inflation are demanding action.

I am strongly against the Cooley amendment to this control bill. I respect the experience and knowledge of this distinguished gentleman that heads the Agriculture Committee, and I hate to disagree with his views, but why should the farmers and the consumer suffer an additional blow, merely to allow the speculators in the commodity exchange markets to make millions upon millions of dollars each year by their gambling on the prices of grain.

In February of 1949 I introduced a bill, House bill 2624, to amend the Commodity Exchange Act to regulate speculation upon the commodity exchanges. This bill has laid in committee ever since and no action has been taken. My bill would give to the President of the United States, through the Secretary of Agriculture, the right to increase the margin funds used in the purchase or sale of grain and other commodities on the commodity exchanges.

At one time, early in the 1920's, the Chicago Board of Trade recorded transactions of nearly 27,000,000 bushels of grain. In that particular year the farmers of America harvested less than 5,000,000 bushels of grain. And at the same time, thousands of our farmers were losing their homes under the hammer of foreclosure sales. Who was making the profit on the speculation and sale of grain futures? Men on the Chicago Board of Trade, that hardly know an ear of corn from a kernel of wheat. Men that purchased and sold millions of bushels of grain, and did not see one grain of it.

Talk about your gambling investigations; what we need is a complete investigation of gambling, at the expense of the farmer who raises our grain and produces our livestock, and is then at the mercy of the speculators in a plush office in a high building in Chicago or New Orleans. These men are nothing more than glorified gamblers. We have a special crime committee in the House and a Kefauver committee in the Senate, investigating gaming, and yet today, in this important bill to curtail speculation, so as to help control runaway prices, we see serious objection raised from the well of this House.

Ladies and gentlemen of this House, we are trying to place some brakes on the price of bread, milk, meat, butter, and other foodstuffs, so everyone in this land of ours can have a fair chance to purchase the same, and yet much of the price we are going to pay for these items is partially determined by the future prices on the New York, Chicago, and New Orleans exchanges.

I strongly oppose the Cooley amendment.

Defense Production Act of 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH B. KEATING

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, our action on this legislation may change the course of history for decades to come and determine the type of world in which our grandchildren will live. Our decision may well spell success or failure for the undertaking in which we are presently engaged in Korea, and, even more important, may be the deciding factor in determining the future actions of the aggressors who menace the freedom of liberty-loving people the world over.

Because of the gravity of the situation and the ever-changing character of the problems which we face, Congress must remain in session. We cannot abdicate our constitutional obligations or shirk the decisions which are rightfully ours to make. We would be turning our back on our form of representative government and the principles of responsibility on which it rests if we were to delegate what amounts to legislative duties to the executive branch. The people at home, particularly the parents and relatives of the boys fighting 7,000 miles away, expect the Congress to assist the President in solving the gigantic and manifold problems involved in gearing our economic machinery to the emergency requirements of this critical hour. Our congressional committees should be on the job not only to deal with necessary legislation, but also to exercise constant supervision over the operation and administration of the program in order that the pitfalls and mistakes of former days may, so far as possible, be avoided.

There is no question that we must show our willingness to mobilize totally for this effort in Korea. As I stood on the sidelines and watched the first three casualties brought home, I determined that insofar as I personally was able, I would do all I could to see that the men called on to do the fighting and dying are fully supported on the home front. After all, human lives come ahead of material comforts.

This is everybody's war. If minor inconvenience or irksome regulation here at home will give the boys in Korea one more rifle or one more tank, we must and will cheerfully endure any privation or hardship.

Our boys are fighting powerful Russian-made tanks with bazookas, and up to the last 2 days have been fighting a losing battle. They are sacrificing their lives while we on the home front deliberate the imposition of controls.

While we may deplore the shortsightedness of the administration policies, which have brought us to our present desperate plight, we must meet the immediate situation with what we have on hand now and go forward with all the speed at our command.

Perhaps by our total mobilization, or evidence of our willigness to sacrifice some civilian conveniences, we can turn the Korean so-called police action—but which in my book is war—into a short war.

If, by our prompt action and lack of thought about personal comfort, we can convince the aggressors that Americans are neither soft nor selfish, then temporary total mobilization will be the most effective, and incidentally, the least expensive program the United States can undertake.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I say that our action on this legislation may be the most important we shall ever be called upon to take. If we can stop total war on this globe by merely voting to mobilize all segments of our population for this war effort, we shall have accomplished the greatest feat in history, for another world war may be the last for all time.

That is why we must not allow any factor in our economy to go unregulated—prices, wages, and profits alike—since all might be lost in the holocaust that would follow a full scale, all out war, whatever the result of such a conflict.

Second only to the importance of giving the President immediate authority to take the emergency steps embodied in this legislation, is the desirability of providing that the wide controls over the lives of our citizens, which we impose hereby, be terminated at the earliest practicable date. There are those who believe in complete peacetime regimentation of our people and who have for a long time wanted to install controls as a permanent part of our national economy. Under no circumstances can we allow this result to be achieved. For that reason the definite termination date in this measure is an eminently desirable, indeed, an indispensable feature of the legislation.

In my judgment those who are most violently opposed to peacetime controls should take their stand on the side of complete control over all segments of our economy during time of war. If we have partial controls, that means some parts of our economy will be restricted in their activities in order to benefit other parts. When normalcy returns, those enjoying the benefits of controls will be reluctant to take their chances in a free competitive society again and will be inclined to oppose the removal of controls. On the other hand, if all segments of economy are under control, all will be equally anxious to put an end to burdensome restrictions and regulations at the earliest possible moment, thereby rendering less difficult a return to the normal functioning of a free opportunity system which has built this country to its position of eminence and power.

It is our duty, of course, to scrutinize carefully all of the provisions of this legislation. We would be remiss in our responsibility were we to accept without question or study whatever is sent up to us in the way of legislation. I am convinced that the people generally have greater confidence in the collective judgment of the Members of Congress regarding the needs of the moment than they have in the views of any one person, even the Chief Executive. I am equally convinced, however, that the American people are ready for, will accept, and cooperate with such controls as are considered necessary to support on the home front the Armed Forces fighting our battles in the field.

Additional Editorials Warning Against Signing Stockholm Peace Petition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to make available to all of my colleagues and particularly to the members of our Committee on Foreign Affairs additional excellent editorials exposing the Communist-inspired and supported peace petition now in circulation in this country.

I realize that that committee, undoubtedly, has many commitments of long standing with reference to urgent matters, but I believe that I have been able to provide its members with an incontrovertible case for direct action by this Congress without further delay. I filed House Concurrent Resolution 247, 21 days ago as a basis upon which a hearing could be held and the committee's recommendation could be made. With the State Department's public denunciation of this petition, it is inconceiveable that the Department would not have reported to the committee its approval of congressional action in this matter. I can think of no reason why any other interested department would file any objection. I am not at all concerned as to the specific language which may be considered appropriate but I am deeply concerned that we should have the opportunity now of voting upon some form of resolution expressing the sense of Congress as to the nature of this petition, warning American citizens against signing it and recommending a course of action which can meet constructively the challenge made by these traitors among us who are dedicated to the overthrow of this Government and the subjection of the American people to the dictators in the Politburo. I am particularly concerned because of the obvious progress which has been made among perfectly decent American citizens who want to work for peace, as all of us do, but who have been misled by these traitors.

The editorials follow:

[From the Los Angeles (Calif.) Times of August 3, 1950]

A-BOMB LOGIC

The minister who defends his signing of the Communist-inspired "Stockholm Petition" on the ground that he is for peace, should, we believe, reexamine the logic of his position. If the Stockholm petition were genuinely a peace petition it would condemn the use of all offensive weapons and not merely the one in which this country perhaps has a current advantage.

Is there a difference in kind between a stone flung with lethal intent and the A-bomb? If so, what is it? Both are intended to kill. There is a logical distinction between offense and defense, it may be granted. But between weapons of offense the difference is merely one of degree.

The efforts of the United States to get a general agreement that atomic weapons shall not be made are based, genuinely, on expediency and not on principle. There is no logical objection to atomic weapons that cannot be applied to any other weapons. We have a feeling that they are somehow unfair, because not available to everybody. But we do not hesitate to use a superior airplane or rifle, or a machine gun which shoots faster or more accurately.

The objection is to offensive action. It is offensive action which prevents peace—not the A-bomb. Hence, the Stockholm petition which condemns the A-bomb instead of condemning offensive action is a weasel-worded document and a Communist booby trap. Anyone who signs it under the impression he is promoting peace is plainly mistaken.

[From the Hartford (Conn.) Courant of August 4, 1950]

WHO IS FOR PEACE?

If there is any one thing on which Americans are united, it is the desire for peace. That is what gives a superficial appeal to such propaganda as the so-called Stockholm peace petition now being circulated by Communist and pro-Communist groups. That petition opposes, among other things, any use of the atom bomb.

It is heartening, therefore, that Jewish, Protestant, and Roman Catholic leaders have joined, for the first time since World War II, in a statement warning against the Stockholm appeal. Spokesmen for the three faiths urge the American people to guard against being misled by the Communist-sponsored petition. It has, they say, "already deceived many well-meaning people here and abroad."

We should know by now that there is no easy way to peace. Signing petitions is usually more of a pious gesture than an effective way of shaping world affairs. When they give aid and comfort to the Kremlin in its aggressive foreign policy, signing them is a positive disservice to the cause of peace. And it is, of course, aggression such as the Russians have sponsored in Korea that is the greatest threat to peace, not America's possession of an unused atom bomb.

Leaders of the three faiths offer a five-point program of peace that would be, if universally followed, more effective than any number of popular petitions. It includes renunciation of the use of force as an instrument of national policy; adherence to the obligations of the UN Charter; respect for human rights and freedoms; participation in the positive programs of the UN; and acceptance of international agreements for regulation of armaments, including atomic weapons, by a trustworthy system of international control.

The United States is willing to accept all those terms, and is actively trying to secure full international backing of them. Russia has refused to accept any of them. Consequently, any peace petition circulated under her auspices is a deliberate attempt to confuse world opinion. As Warren Austin has told Jakob Malik in the UN Security Council, Russia has ample opportunity there to present any proposals she has for furthering world peace. Up to now, Mr. Malik has had nothing at all to offer.

[From the Cincinnati Times-Star of July 17, 1950]

GAMBLING ON HUMAN CREDULITY

How much will people believe? Anything and everything (according to Adolph Hitler) if you say it loudly and keep on saying it.

Communism confidently follows the Hitler pattern and practically gilds it. It declares that the Soviets are the most democratic and peace-loving of all peoples, this in face of the patent facts that theirs is a slave state; that they have transformed and demoted the free countries on their western margin into submissive satellites; that they are devoting their revenues and major energies to armaments; that they are plotting against all the Asiatic neighbors whom they have not yet terrorized, and that their agents are attempting to undermine the institutions and subvert the government of every free people on earth—notably us Americans.

Furthermore, all this they have repeatedly avowed, as their deliberate purpose, in the writings and public statements of Marx, Lenin, Stalin. And they have said other things: that religion is the "opiate of the masses," good faith is mere "bourgeous morality." It is commendable to lie, to steal, to murder. The leaders use names not their own; travel on forged passports; began their careers—some of them—as bank robbers and train wreckers; periodically rid the scene of each other through assassinations or mock trials. Basically, they are gangsters of a peculiarly vicious type, nothing more. Herbert Hoover sums most of this up in a single sentence: "The men of the Kremlin have in so short a time violated over 35 solemnly signed treaties."

The facts are recalled and arrayed here in view of the numerously signed pro-Russian peace petitions being circulated in our own and other countries. Why should millions, why should anybody, play the simpleton?

[From the Milwaukee (Wis.) Journal of August 5, 1950]

SEND PETITIONS TO MOSCOW

The American Red Cross in Detroit was surprised and not a little horrified to find that a Red Cross appeal to ban atom warfare bearing the Red Cross symbol was being circulated by a bunch of peace appealers.

The Red Cross denounced the use of its name and symbol, pointing out that there are laws against their unauthorized use.

The petition reads like an offshoot of the Stockholm petition, a sly bit of Kremlin propaganda against which all America has been alerted the last several weeks. It has all the earmarks of a typical Communist dodge.

The new peace appeal group is called the Committee for Peaceful Alternatives. It has an imposing list of chairmen, cochairmen, vice chairmen, and executive board members, most of them clergymen and educators. Their program is simple, aside from being as impractical as a week-end trip to the moon.

Signers are asked to telegraph or write President Truman to order a cease fire immediately in Korea, to name a United Nations commission to find a peaceful solution to the Korean problem, to get a world agreement outlawing the atom bomb and to give full support to the United Nations.

President Truman can't order a cease fire in Korea, of course, without subjecting American troops there to slaughter. There was a UN commission which tried to find peaceful solution to Korea's problems for months, but Russia refused to let it enter North Korea. The United States has tried since 1945 to get the atom bomb outlawed, but Russia has refused to participate in the program. We have always supported the UN and are now giving it fullest possible support by serving as the UN police force for Korea. Russia, on the other hand, has blocked UN action from the start, by use of both veto and, recently, the boycott.

The Committee for Peaceful Alternatives is implying that President Truman and not Stalin is to blame for Korea. The group may not be Communist, but it's doing Stalin's work. The Communists must love such fuzzy-minded thinking.

The archbishop of York, Dr. Cyril Garbett, had the answer to this kind of peace petition when he was asked to sign one the other day. He might be interested, he said, "if it were addressed not to the House of Commons but to the Kremlin."

I also want to make available the box story on page 1 of the August 10 issue of the Machinist. I think most of my colleagues will recall that I became particularly interested in this program when I read an extremely able editorial from that paper in its July 20 issue, which I inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD at page A5246.

The article is as follows:

EVERYBODY NOW APPROVES UN ACTION IN KOREA, PHONY PEACE PETITIONS HIT

IAM Lodge 66, Milwaukee, Wis., at its recent membership meeting adopted a stinging resolution warning its members and their families against signing phony peace petitions "which would jeopardize our democratic institutions." The resolution urged that the union avail itself of wider circulation in the public press "affirming our belief in the American way of life."

Charles Stuart, publicity chairman, also reports that the lodge voted to endorse William Sanderson for the office of United States Senator in the Democratic primaries.

From New York City, William Oram, recording secretary for IAM Lodge 402, reports that the recent district 15 resolution condemning Communist aggression in Korea and backing President Truman's action in support of the United Nations has now been made unanimous.

Originally, delegates representing lodge 402 opposed the antiaggression resolution when it was proposed at the district meeting. This action clears up the impression given by the district delegates "as to the thinking of our membership on this important question," Oram wrote.

Resolution of Revere (Mass.) City Council

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 3, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein a resolution which was adopted by the City Council of Revere, Mass., on July 31, 1950. The resolution is as follows:

Whereas this country is currently engaged in an international struggle which will eventually determine whether we as a democratic Nation can survive the onslaughts of autocratic communistic dictatorship; and

Whereas this country has produced and is continuing to produce bumper crops of the necessaries of life enough so to insure that all of our people should have plenty to eat at a moderate cost; and

Whereas through the selfish actions of a majority of our citizens, prices of bread, milk, meat and other necessities of life have risen immensely: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the City Council of Revere, in order to protect the citizens of our community do petition you, as President of these United States, to take the only wise, practical and expedient course in the face of these facts, namely, immediately institute the control of prices, rolling them back to the prices established as of June 15, before this present wave of exorbitant price increases took effect.

In city council, July 31, 1950.

Ordered adopted on an affirmative vote.

Attest:

JOSEPH F. MCCHRISTAL,
City Clerk.

Contribution to the War Effort by Large Corporations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. WILLIAMS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 11 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article appearing in the Washington Evening Star of August 10, 1950, written by David Lawrence, in which he points out the great contribution which is being made by America's big corporations to our war effort.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DU PONT OFFER SPIKES OFT-REPEATED CHARGE OF PROFITS IN WAR—CORPORATION TO DO WORK ON HYDROGEN BOMB FOR FEE OF $1

(By David Lawrence)

Maybe the Voice of America took note of and transmitted abroad a news item the other day which was about the strongest rebuttal that could be made to the oft-repeated charge of the Soviets that America's big corporations are eager to make profits out of war—and maybe the item was missed altogether. Anyway, it didn't get the conspicuous mention in this country that it deserves.

For it was announced that the task of carrying on the development of the hydrogen bomb in a Government-owned plant had been entrusted to the du Pont Co., of Wilmington, Del., and that the du Ponts had agreed to do the job and charge exactly $1 for their entire fee. The work may take years to do but that's all the profit the du Pont organization will accept.

There is a tremendous amount of social significance in that piece of news. For it reveals that the biggest chemical company in America is the only one that can really do the important work that has to be done with the H-bomb. Its staff and organization alone has the background and know-how. Incidentally, the du Pont Co. did a similar job—also for $1—in operating an atomic-energy plant for our Government during World War II.

STANDARD OIL CO. PLAN

But, speaking of big corporations, this isn't all the news that might have been transmitted overseas by the Voice of America. The Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey announced that the families of its employees who are called to war are going to continue to be paid each week during the emergency a substantial part of their regular wages. There are other large companies which are putting into effect somewhat similar plans.

The larger companies will prove even more valuable to America in the war effort of the future than they have in the past. This time, however, their production will exceed all past records. Thus, the General Electric Co., through its president, Charles E. Wilson, has just announced that, in the event of an all-out mobilization, it can produce substantially double what it produced during World War II.

America's total manufacturing capacity is 50 percent greater than it was 10 years ago. Steel has a much greater capacity than a decade ago and electric power production is double what it was in the period before World War II. The railroads are in better condition today than in 1940 and America now has an independent rubber supply if it should be cut off from the East Indies.

The truth is that the period from 1933 to 1939, before the last war broke out, was a period of depression, and hence it was not until after 1945 that America began to get enough plant capacity to take care of the demands of the people for consumer goods and manufactured products.

But how has this amazing development and productive capacity been made possible? By a system of private enterprise and by integration of the varied operations of larger companies. As a matter of fact, America is lucky today to have well-integrated companies, and might not have been so lucky if the radical theory about splitting up integrated operations had been adopted. Most significant today, for example, is to read in the light of the war situation what Judge John C. Knox wrote on June 2 last - just 23 days before Korea - about the proposal to split up the Aluminum Co. of America—largest aluminum producer of the country.

CALLS INDUSTRY VITAL

He said in his formal opinion in the United States District Court of New York:

"It is my considered and firm judgment that a strong and resourceful domestic aluminum industry is a vital necessity, not alone from the standpoint of national security, but also for the peacetime welfare of the general public. By this I mean that the future development of the industry depends upon its being composed of financially sound and well-integrated organizations.

"Rightly or wrongly, from an economic and social standpoint, big business in many industries is an actuality, and if such enterprises are to be subjected to effective competition, their trade rivals must be of somewhat comparable strength."

Two world wars were won with the aid of the industrial production and manufacturing know-how of the United States. It is fortunate for America that large-scale enterprise has expanded to the point where it is now able to turn out more tanks, more planes, more ships, more guns, and more bombs and ammunition by far than any other country or group of countries in the world. So big business has at least one justification, if no other, for existence, subject, of course, to any curbs on price-fixing or unfair competition which a fair enforcement of the laws may require.

Suits designed to attack bigness as such, where conspiracies to violate laws are inferred rather than charged as having occurred, would weaken America's industrial production. During any war period ahead, there probably will be a moratorium on lawsuits that would bring about dissolution of any of America's larger manufacturing companies.

Desertion and Abandonment of Women and Children

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 11 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, yesterday I introduced S. 4032, a bill to authorize the Federal courts to take jurisdiction in cases of desertion and abandonment when these cases involve individuals separated by State lines. I am in receipt of a copy of a letter written by Mr. Raymond Hilliard, commissioner of public welfare of New York City, addressed to Representative EDNA F. KELLY dealing with the effect of abandonment on the case load of the Department of Welfare.

I ask unanimous consent to have this letter printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITY OF NEW YORK,
DEPARTMENT OF WELFARE,
New York, N. Y., August 2, 1950.

Hon. EDNA F. KELLY,
Congress of the United States,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSWOMAN KELLY: This is in response to your letter of July 25. Several years ago the department of welfare absorbed the case load and administration of the board of child welfare, which gave assistance to needy women with children.

The department of welfare now provides aid to dependent children for the type of case which would formerly have been administered by the board of child welfare. Such assistance is granted mainly to needy women with children under 16, or with children between 16 and 18 if regularly attending school, or if one parent is dead, continually absent from the home, or incapacitated. The aid to dependent children case load has risen rapidly in the postwar era. In April 1945 there were only 13,923 cases receiving aid to dependent children. In June 1950 there were 43,303 such cases—a rise of 211 percent over the corresponding figure for April 1945.

A large factor in this increase has undoubtedly been in the deserted-women category. Unfortunately, however, separate figures are not available showing the number of desertion cases receiving aid to dependent children. The reason for this is that the department of welfare administers this program for the State and Federal Governments, and the statistical data maintained are those required by the Federal Government. At this time we are not required to tabulate the reason for acceptance for aid to dependent children.

In June 1950, 142,636 persons in 43,303 families received aid to dependent children, amounting to $4,550,330. Included in these families were 95,471 children under 18 years of age.

Please advise me if I can be of any further assistance.

Very truly yours,
RAYMOND M. HILLIARD,
Commissioner.

What Is Going On in Germany?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech made by Clyde A. Lewis, of Plattsburg, N. Y., commander in chief, Veterans of Foreign Wars, over the radio network of the Columbia Broadcasting System on July 4, 1950, Independence Day.

Mr. Speaker, I have repeatedly raised on this floor the very issue which Mr. Lewis so eloquently and ably discusses. The American people need to know what is going on in Germany. We cannot, we must not, become so bemused by our fight against totalitarianism in the Soviet countries that we forget the brutal, bloody, and ruthless totalitarianism in western Europe which cost the world millions of lives and plunged us into generations of fear, suspicion, and hunger.

The text of Mr. Lewis' address follows:

One of the major and most formidable tasks in the international field of politics and diplomacy is the material and political recovery of western Germany—a Germany that is the residuum of the autocracy of Bismarck, and militarism of Kaiser Wilhelm, the ineffective republic of Weimar, and the savage nationalism of Hitler.

Thoughtful Americans will, in general, agree that to solve intelligently a major part of the many problems confronting us in Germany will require the best leadership and intelligence that the United States can produce in a specialized field—that of dealing with foreign peoples.

The international problem of assisting to create a new Germany is unique in history because our country, a victor, is spending a vast amount of money and time to help a conquered nation toward political and economic recovery. In short, this means finding markets for German goods, helping to rebuild German cities, and most important, an attempt on our part to discourage in the foreseeable future German plans of world conquest or aggression. This latter can only be accomplished by eradicating superman philosophy, master-race propaganda, and the theory that might is right.

Hyper-nationalism and militarism must, insofar as humanly possible, be eliminated. The German people must be shown that the Hitler government, based on hyper-nationalism and militarism, brought their rich land into the most tragic and destructive wars of all times. That will be the verdict of history.

Only by sympathy, patience, and properly directed firmness of purpose on our part, will the ghost of German militarism be laid.

We have no positive assurance that German officialdom appreciates the substantial assistance of the United States. But it is believed that the people, the plain people, of Germany—they who have been so tragically exploited and deceived—will in time see the light—but only if denazification of the official and military classes is expeditiously and efficiently accomplished.

In a recent speech at Stuttgart, our High Commissioner in Germany, Mr. John J. McCloy, said this:

"Our main purpose is to help Germany achieve political recovery."

VICTORY IN COLD WAR

How well we are achieving that laudable objective is a matter of grave concern, not alone to us here in the United States, but to the entire world. It may well mean the difference between winning and losing the cold war.

There are those who challenge our right to mix into the political problems confronting Germany. To these I say: How can we hope to reap the full fruits of our victory in World War II if we fail to stamp out once and for all the evil forces that led Hitler's Reich afield in quest of world domination?

I submit that the problem of Germany is a political one, and must be dealt with as such. Politics brought Hitler to power, and his National-Socialist political organization implemented his ill-starred dream of world conquest.

Recently, a world-wide news agency revealed that there are some 19 new and active political parties in Germany. Leaders of most of these new groups are spreading the virus of Hitlerism. As members of the present Bonn Parliament, they have a voice in the drafting of legislation and, more significantly, in the shaping of public opinion.

We are disturbed by what we hear about Germany today. In spite of what some of our leaders tell us, we know that nazism is boldly renascent.

Encouraged by the Soviet masters of eastern Germany, and heartened by the reluctance of our leaders to crack down in the west, nationalism is flourishing—the selfsame brand of fierce and articulate nationalism that spawned the Bismarcks, the Kaiser Wilhelms, and that archdemon of them all, Adolf Hitler.

RISE OF NAZIS FRIGHTENING

Recent statistics tell a revealing and alarming story. Figures published by our own military government officials and advisers disclosed the sordid fact that in Bavaria alone, as of last November, there were approximately 35,000 persons employed in Bavarian ministries and their administration, and of this number, more than 15,000—almost one-half—were former Nazis. Highest percentages of these former Hitlerites in responsible positions were in the Ministry of Finance, with 60 percent former party members; food, agriculture, and forestry with 70 percent, and the department of justice with 81 percent. This latter figure includes only the judges and prosecutors, and not administrative personnel.

Germany has been likened to a vast area where the forces of totalitarianism on one side, are arrayed against the forces of democracy on the other. And while these gladiators engage in a struggle to the death, sitting by as spectators are the millions of free men and women throughout the remainder of the world. They are more than spectators; they are the prize which each side in the death struggle seeks to win to its cause.

The forces of democracy must win this titanic struggle if the world is to remain free. The denazification of Germany is a must if there is to be lasting peace. And denazification must be on our terms—not Germany's.

We cannot, and we must not, tolerate a Germany in which youths swagger through the streets singing Hitler songs; a Germany in which 90 percent of the newspapers are operated by the same crowd which operated them under Hitler; a Germany in which members of a pro-Nazi parliament brazenly proclaim racial hatreds and antidemocratic sentiments.

Recently, a leading member of the German Party, now a member of the Bonn coalition government, was applauded frantically by German audiences when he declared:

"Germany is least responsible for the Second World War. It is the anti-Nazis who have brought about the present misery. Germany did not break down from exhaustion, but only on account of the treason and sabotage committed by the anti-Nazis."

Another member of the Bonn parliament, Dr. Richter, told a recent meeting that Germany lost the war because of the "treachery of the democrats." One of Hitler's former henchmen, ex-Storm Trooper Ernst Remer, is leader of another noisy political party which has a name reminiscent of Hitler's organization. Remer recently declared that "we will be the masters of Germany in 2 years."

NEW DICTATOR FORETOLD

With the aid of Dr. Schacht, the old Deutsch-Nationale Volkspartei, which was instrumental in raising Hitler to power, has been reestablished. Another dictator in 5 years is the bold prediction of August Haussleitner, leader of a new right-wing party, Deutsche Union.

Meanwhile, there are reports of several secret Nazi organizations. One of these groups has brazenly declared that "the principles of national-socialism were and are true; they evinced a tremendous success. The goal of the group is to educate the elite of the coming Germany."

Not infrequently in Austria, where the upsurge of nazism is even more conspicuous than in Germany, mass meetings are held where participants appear in SS uniforms and sing Hitler songs. Secret SS and youth organizations are spreading terror throughout the country.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States believes the American people are entitled to know what we are doing to block the resurgence of nazism. We are building strongholds of democracy here and abroad, and are taking every measure to thwart communism in its ruthless march toward world domination. The potential threat of nazism is equally as ominous, yet we blink our eyes and do little or nothing.

What happened to our campaign of education that was to teach German youth the blessings of democracy? Why do we permit indifference and inertia to let German nationalism grow and flourish under the selfsame slogan that brought Hitler to power—the conviction that Germany is the predestined master of the world?

A New York Times survey last December brought the conclusion that the resurgence of reactionary radical nationalism with nazi overtones is the most dangerous long-range problems facing the Western Powers in Germany."

Drew Middleton, New York Times correspondent in Germany reminded us on January 23 of the past affinity between German and Soviet militarism. He stated that "each step which the United States takes leading to a strengthening of the extreme right increases the future danger of a new Russo-German alliance."

HANDED BACK TO NAZIS

One high United States occupation official in Germany blandly tells us that nazism has been destroyed in Germany, but in the same breath proposes that Germany be handed back to the same crowd that made a god of Adolf Hitler and brought upon the world the most horrible blood bath in its history. Fanatical German nationalism and nazism are from the same cloth. Both must be destroyed if democracy is to survive.

We must make the Germans understand that the world is fed up with superracism, that no one nation, no one ideology, whether it be nazism, fascism, communism, or by whatever name it may be called, is going to rule the world.

Nazis, like Communists, understand but, one language—the language of force. Only through a show of force—moral as well as military—can we hope to stave off another and far more horrible world conflict.

We are prone to forget Dachau and Buchenwald. We realize with indifference that scoundrels like Schacht and Von Papen are free; that Ilse Koch, the wretched beast of Buchenwald has been released; that characters like Fritz Thyssen, who started Hitler on his rise to power, have been dismissed as minor Nazis. Do facts such as these lend credence to High Commissioner McCloy's declaration at Stuttgart when he said: "One of the primary purposes of the occupation has been and is to eradicate Nazi influence and leadership from German political, economic, and cultural life"?

Today, in this great free land of ours we are observing the one hundred and seventy-fourth anniversary of our Declaration of Independence. Since that day in 1776 when our forefathers courageously proclaimed our freedom from oppression, this Nation has been the leading champion of free democratic government throughout the world.

We are working to safeguard democracy in the cold war. Only recently, we joined with 11 other North Atlantic countries to strengthen alliance of the free countries of the west to meet any challenge from Russia. We have implemented our bid for strength of the democracies through the Marshall plan. We have, through orderly legislative processes, made material military aid available to these friendly nations.

GERMANY IS BATTLEGROUND

Twice within a generation, we have thrown our total resources into world struggles to stem the tide of totalitarianism. Now, 5 years after the conclusion of World War II, we are at bloodless war with an arrogant aggressor nation which has avowed its determination to rule the world regardless of cost.

Germany is the battleground in this cold war. Likewise, Germany is the real key to world peace, and upon the outcome of the titanic struggle between the western forces standing for freedom and democracy, and the totalitarian forces in the east, may well depend the fate of our civilization.

There must be a declaration of independence for Germany if civilization is to survive. Our apathy, our indifference have retarded progress toward that goal. Only a few months ago, High Commissioner McCloy stated that, in his judgment, "there is still too much totalitarianism and authoritarianism in German life. * * * There is still resistance to reforms long overdue, and too many German people are apathetic or negative in their approach to political responsibility."

Not long ago, while visiting in Munich, a distinguished American educator was shown a textbook then used in the elementary schools of that city. One page of this book contained instructions for the formation of capital letters, and opposite each letter was an example of its use. Here are a few of the letters—and the examples presented:

A—as in Adolf.

D—as in Dolch (a dolch is a small dagger worn by Nazi soldiers).

F—as in Feuhrer.

K—as in kreig (krieg means "war").

P—as in panzer (the Nazi tank troops).

S—as in sieg, meaning victory (remember the Nazi song Sieg Heil! Selg Heil!).

U—as in uniform.

V—as in vaterland.

W—as in wehrmacht—the German army, and, I have kept for last—H—as in Hitler!

Does this indicate that nazism is dead in Germany?

Let us listen for a moment to Gen. Telford Taylor, who was chief of counsel for the war crimes trials in Neurmberg. Less than 6 months ago, General Taylor declared:

STALIN PLAYED SMARTER

"If the Germans failed to measure up to what one might have hoped for in denazification, our own neglect of the reeducation program has been ever more disastrous. Indeed, each failure contributed to the other. * * * The Germans speedily concluded that reeducation was not a seriously intended program and that most of our talk of democratization was nothing but window-dressing."

Or this, from Emelyn Williams, of the Christian Science Monitor, one of the Nation's great and most respected newspapers, who said:

"All over Germany great sympathy is being shown toward people tried and sentenced as war criminals or as Nazis. Fugitive war criminals are never betrayed to the allied authorities or to the German authorities by the population itself. There are thousands who at times opposed the Nazis who today join the Nazis in opposing democracy."

There is further evidence from reputable American correspondents in Germany that our efforts to organize German youth against communism have failed completely.

A glaring example of our failure in this respect is the program to bring baseball to Germany. The Army spent many thousands of dollars to provide gloves, bats, masks, and other baseball paraphernalia. One American writer said he saw literally mountains of this equipment rotting in German Youth Association clubs.

The fact is that German youths have never played baseball. They don't understand it, and they don't want to. They consider it sissy—just as they regard the free cokes and the Mickey Mouse movies sent to Germany at the expense of the American taxpayer.

Stalin has played a smarter game. To him, German kids are German kids. In eastern Germany, he has reorganized the very successful Hitler youth group—the jugend—and has renamed the Freie Deutsch Jugend. A lad joining the FDJ is given a badge and a natty blue uniform, and as in the Hitler days, he and his fellows parade through the streets goose-stepping to the tune of a military band.

To the young German of today, that is real fun. It reminds him of the days when his father, Hermann, and his uncle, Otto, strutted so proudly in their SS uniforms.

One high American youth official put it this way:

DENAZIFY IN FACT

"The little youth work we are doing is based on the occupation directive to make German kids forget the regimentation of the Hitler regime and to think, pray, and live like American kids.

"We are forbidden to discuss current politics, and open mention of the Soviet Union would be against State Department policy. Our program is similar to the Boy Scouts or the YMCA."

We may dislike Soviet Russia's methods, and we may abhor their willingness to embrace the rudiments of Hitlerism in dealing with German youth. But the fact remains that they are outstripping us in their dealings with the young people of Germany. We must admit that sovietism is far more acceptable to German youth than the brand of democracy we are attempting to sell them.

We must not forget that it was Hitler, the god of the Nazis, the so-called defender of Europe against communism, who made a deal with Soviet Russia. His followers, if encouraged, will build a renazified Germany that might well make a similar deal with Russia—the more so because the Soviet Union can offer Germany the markets and the raw materials which the West cannot promise her.

What can we do?

We can insist that our Government take appropriate and decisive action leading toward denazification of Germany in fact. We must take effective action to strengthen every democratic force in Germany. We must see to the removal of all supporters of nazism from key positions in the administrative, political, and educational life of Germany.

We must halt the concentration of power in the hands of a few German industrialists.

We must assure for Germany an adequate standard of living, but at the same time, we must provide impregnable barriers against Germany ever again becoming an aggressor.

In the words of President Truman, we must prove by "hard work and practical demonstration, that free men can create for themselves a good society, in which they can live together at peace and advance their common welfare."

America's veterans cannot forget what they saw as our victorious troops moved into the heart of the Reich. They can never forget the terrible price we paid in the crusade to crush Hitlerism.

NO THIRD WORLD WAR

Today, 5 years after, veterans insist that there must be no renascence of nazism. They demand a realistic and effective acceleration of our program of national security, of military preparedness, and of democratic education and progress.

We must assist western Germany by material aid and spiritual support to gain a government wherein its citizens have the fundamental freedoms. But, meanwhile, we must by a show of force beforehand, serve notice of our intention to brook no arrogant dreams of world conquest by any ism.

There must be no third world war. Above all, there must be no more Dachaus or Buchenwalds.

And in conclusion, on this, the Fourth of July, it is appropriate to refer to an eternal verity of foreign policy, as enunciated by the great George Washington:

"Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it?"

It is a policy of truth and value—of an infinite worth that "time cannot wither or custom stale."

Policy Toward Formosa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 11 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Let's Turn Formosa Over to the UN," which appeared in the Des Moines Register for August 9, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LET'S TURN FORMOSA OVER TO THE UN

At the first shock of the Communist invasion of Korea, President Truman was compelled to act hastily and drastically. In order to preserve the faith of the world in organized law and decent principles, he decided to go to the defense of the South Korean Government militarily. In order to protect our flanks in Asia, meanwhile, he froze the status of Formosa—preventing both provocative attacks by the Chiang Kai-shek government against Communist China on the mainland and new aggression by the Communists against Formosa. He also promised support in the fight against communism in both Indochina and the Philippines.

The Register defended all these steps as emergency expedience. The United Nations Organization promptly endorsed the defense of Southern Korea. But it has taken no action—and has not been asked to take any action—with respect to Formosa.

In our judgment this is now the weakest link in our Asia policy, and as we have said in other editorials of recent weeks, United Nations study and action with respect to Formosa is urgently needed. The American "ultimatum" regarding this island refuge of the Chinese Nationalist Government smacks altogether too much of the kind of "imperialism" which the Communists are exploiting throughout the Asiatic continent.

The real danger is even greater than the mere psychological one.

While our present Formosan policy remains unilateral and lacks the support of other nations in the UN, it is almost an invitation to the Communists to draw us into a trap. All that the Chinese Reds have to do is to send a boatload of soldiers out toward Formosa, let the American naval forces there sink the ship, and then announce to the world that we have "attacked" Communist China.

This could easily release a couple of million armed Chinese Communists into Korea, Indochina, or anywhere else the Moscow strategists wanted to send them. And it would bog us down in an impossible quarrel about who was the aggressor, to say nothing of the military weight that it would throw against us.

The reason that a quarrel about the aggressor would probably ensue is that the other members of the United Nations are nothing like as united on our Formosa policy as they were about Korea. On the contrary, it is not impossible that our Formosa declaration as it stands would be repudiated by the United Nations majority.

The fact is that the Chiang Kai-shek regime commands no more respect, even among our potential allies in Asia, than it does in our own State Department. Secretary Acheson certainly could not have been in favor of our Formosa commitment on political grounds, judging from his previous attitude; he no doubt acquiesced in it for the obvious military reasons, as most of the rest of us were disposed to do.

India, just to cite one example, is desperately important to us as a moral ally in this struggle against communism. Prime Minister Nehru is essentially on our side, and he is the spiritual leader of most of the millions of Asiatics who have not yet been swallowed up by communism. But he knows that the Chiang regime had become intolerable to the Chinese people, and he would probably say that the sooner the corrupt Nationalist Government ceases to exist as an influence in the world, the better. So he will surely refuse to have any part in our protection of the Chiang clique on Formosa—no matter how good we think our reasons are.

Even Great Britain herself is in an embarrassing dilemma regarding this. British has offered to recognize the Chinese Communist government. She has vast interests in China through which she can maintain a contact between the Western World and the new China if they are not expropriated. She also holds the key to trade and communications in all south China, through the island of Hong Kong. So Britain certainly will not want to jeopardize her whole position in Asia by risking independent action in the Formosan Straits.

Even France itself, harassed by Communists as it is in Indochina, has been indirectly embarrassed by our Formosa policy—which is being used in Indochina as further proof that the western powers have ganged up against self-determination for the Asiatics.

What are we to do in the face of all this?

We dare not let the Communists take over Formosa, because it would expose our defense lines between the Philippines and Korea. Yet if the Reds decide to precipitate a struggle for Formosa, we may be without allies and repudiated by a large part of the world.

The solution, we repeat, seems to us to be to throw the whole question of Formosa into the United Nations' lap just as fast as possible.

The UN clearly is not going to act capriciously in a situation as complicated and fraught with peril as this one.

Yet to have the UN studying the situation would take the heat from us before irreparable damage can be done to our whole Asian policy.

Our naval vessels in the Formosan Straits would then at least have the virtue of defending a temporary UN trusteeship, rather than backing a discredited refugee government.

We Have No More Time To Waste

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. BYRNES

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 11, 1950

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, when it became readily apparent in the postwar period that the Soviet Union had no intention of cooperating for world peace I strongly urged that we adopt a system of universal military training as one of the keystones in our arch of national security.

In a speech to the House on January 26, 1948, I called for the immediate enactment of universal military training, even though I had previously opposed any form of peacetime conscription, because it was clear to me that we could no longer regard ourselves as actually at peace. I termed universal military training a basic necessity in our national-security program, and, at the same time, I called for a vastly increased Air Force program, as recommended by the President's Commission on Air Policy, a highly efficient intelligence organization, continuous scientific research and development, industrial-mobilization planning, and real unification of the Armed Forces.

I pointed out that the continuing threat of war posed by the attitude of Russia required readiness on the part of large bodies of men to meet the attack, no matter what its form or direction. I said:

This will require large numbers of trained men organized into Reserve units. True, we could expand the size of our Regular Army to provide these men, but this would require that practically the whole Nation be under arms constantly. To maintain such a large number of men in Reserve units it is my opinion that universal military training, which will give the rudiments of training to our young men for 6 months, then require that they join one of our Reserve Armed Forces units and train with it for a certain period is essential and necessary.

At the same time, I was deeply concerned with the effectiveness of our Reserve program, particularly the Army Reserve program. It was obvious, if we adopted any program designed solely to provide manpower for our Reserves, that our Reserve program must be extremely well-organized and efficiently run. Reiterating my support of universal military training, I said, in a speech to the House on May 6, 1948:

If we take seriously the recommendations of every responsible military leader since Washington, namely, that the principle underlying our Military Establishment is a comparatively small Regular Establishment supported by well-trained citizen reserves, then we must provide a steady flow of trained men into the civilian components from the bottom as attrition reduces their strength from the top. I know of no other way this can be accomplished except by a system of universal military training.

But as I said on the floor of this House on April 2, "We cannot support UMT blindly. We recognize that it will not provide defense in and of itself but only as it contributes to the strength of the civilian components which it supplies. It would be useless to pass this legislation unless we are assured that our Reserve program is a sound, well-managed, and cohesive part of an intelligent whole."

In this same speech, I pointed out the then-existing grave deficiencies in our Reserve program, and I attempted to show that the excuses offered by the then Secretary of the Army for its ineffectiveness were scarcely valid. Subsequently, improvements in the Reserve program were made, but not until a great deal of enthusiasm on the part of the officers and men had been lost and not until much precious time had been wasted. We are paying the price today, as we call up under-strength and inadequately trained Reserve units, for the errors of omission committed then.

I call your attention to these facts, Mr. Speaker, not for the purpose of recrimination, but in the hope that they will provide an insight into the problems facing us today. I am firmly of the opinion, in this time of crisis, that we need to look forward instead of back, and that mistakes made in the past have no bearing upon the present unless they serve as pitfalls to be avoided in the future. The fact that a universal military program was not established and the fact that our Reserve program, for too long a period, suffered from gross neglect were tragic mistakes, in my opinion, and they should be reflected upon seriously so that we may avoid similar ones in the days and years ahead.

Our principal concern, then, should be: What course of action shall we pursue today? I, for one, do not believe Congress should stay out of session a single day until it has solved satisfactorily the problem of providing this Nation with the methods by which it can achieve a high degree of military preparedness. And surely, the problem of providing trained manpower for our Armed Forces and the building up of those forces is a vital ingredient in any preparedness program.

Not one of us knows, of course, what the next day, or month, or year will bring. It appears now, however, that we must prepare for at least two major eventualities: First, all-out war with Russia when and if that nation decides the time is ripe for her fatal move; and second, continuing peripheral warfare, of the nature of the Korean war, at the points of friction between Russia and the free world. Either happening requires that no time be lost now in providing training for the men who will be called to the defense of our country. We are far below our needs now; particularly and urgently we require trained ground forces.

How shall we provide these trained ground forces as quickly and as rapidly as possible? We can assume and hope that this problem is being urgently considered by our military leaders, and that a proposed solution will be advanced soon. In the meantime, I believe it is a problem to which we should all devote our utmost energies, because the solution is long overdue.

I firmly believe that our basic principle of a Regular Establishment, expanded now to meet immediate needs, supported by a large, well-trained citizenry reserve, available for call-up and immediate intensified training to meet whatever crisis confronts us in the future, should underly any solution which might be adopted.

At present, our policy appears to be to enlarge our Regular Establishment as rapidly as possible by calling up Reserve units, National Guard units, and by supplying new manpower through selective service and enlistments for the Regular forces. This is certainly necessary, if a realistic view of the present situation is taken. Our Regular Establishment must certainly be increased in size now, and it is entirely possible that it may have to be expanded beyond limits which no man can presently foresee. We cannot quarrel with this policy. It is a policy forced upon us by the march of events and by our unpreparedness. We shall soon be forced to consider, however, a program beyond this.

It seems to me we have two major alternatives:

First, we can continue the policy of increasing the size of our Regular Establishment as rapidly as facilities for training and housing become available, until we have a force in being of a size to meet any possible need.

The objection to this course, however, is that our possible needs are so great that we would require a vast Regular Establishment, a virtual nation constantly under arms, seriously disrupting the production of war goods by draining manpower from industry and actually harmful to our real national security. At the same time, we would lose a considerable period of time while we prepared facilities and procedures for the reception of such a large force.

As a second alternative we can continue the building of our Regular Establishment to meet immediate and short-term needs as they are determined by our military leaders, backing our Regular forces, however, with greatly increased and better-prepared citizen Reserves. With an enlarged Reserve program on a more realistic basis, we can remove the critical time lag, should our needs become greater, between the calling up of men and their readiness for combat. The secret of the effectiveness of Reserve forces is the cutting of the time needed for basic training, specialist and unit training, and the organization and equipping of units. Such a program would interfere far less with the production of war goods. We have the framework for such a program now, but the crying need is for its expansion, an increase in the tempo of its training, and the assignment to it of the best military planners and administrators available.

It is this second alternative—a Regular force supported by a vastly increased, efficiently operated Reserve, trained with imagination and zeal, and receiving the devoted attention of our top military brains—which I believe best represents our safest and most practical course in the situation confronting us, and which we will adopt sooner or later.

Such a program, however, depends, like practically every defense activity, upon manpower. It was for this purpose that universal military training was proposed, since the major objective of UMT is to channel basically trained men into Reserve units for further specialized training. The enormity of the mistake made in not establishing this program, when time was on our side, is now apparent.

I believe that we should not only seek to repair that mistake by establishing universal military training now, but there is a grave question in my mind, until we have fully manned Reserve units, organized under a master plan and engaged in accelerated training, whether we can afford the luxury of the months and months it will take to establish, organize, and put into action a universal-military-training program. Until such a program begins turning out basically trained men for our Reserve forces we are faced with a serious time lag, which might prove disastrous in the critical days ahead. We should consider seriously whether an immediate stopgap program, designed to fit the seriousness of our present situation, should be put into action at once and remain in effect until we can get a universal-military-training program in operation.

It is for this reason that I advance, for the consideration of the Members, a plan of action proposed by a Reserve officer in my district. This officer is Capt. Talbot Peterson, an Armored Cavalry officer, and commanding officer of a Reserve reconnaissance company stationed at Appleton, Wis., who has devoted much time and thought to the whole Reserve problem. I might say, parenthetically, that it has been my good fortune, as a Member of Congress, to have in my district a group of Reserve officers and men, of whom Captain Peterson is one, who have never lost their faith in the basic need for a sound Reserve program in spite of the difficulties they have faced and the disappointments they have encountered in organizing and building up their units. This Nation owes a debt of gratitude to men like these, many of whom will shortly be called once more to serve their country in battle, for their foresight and courage during a period when many others chose to close their eyes to the realities of the world situation. Under leave to extend my remarks I include at this point Captain Peterson's plan for bringing up our Reserve units to full strength with the least possible delay:

A PLAN FOR BRINGING UP TO FULL STRENGTH ALL NATIONAL GUARD DIVISIONS, ARMY RESERVE DIVISIONS, AND SUPPORTING UNITS OF BOTH

I. GENERAL

(A) Serious situations require serious action. The present world situation shows us we are short of ground forces to meet any present move by the U. S. S. R. Our only reserve of units is found in the Army Reserve and the National Guard. The National Guard divisions, are, in general, at somewhat less than half strength. Reserve divisions are a cadre only (all officers and about 10 percent of enlisted strength).

(B) To call all guard divisions to active duty, unless the situation becomes much more serious, and to break up all Reserve divisions and send them to Regular Army or guard divisions on active duty, would place a huge burden on our manpower resources and our already burdensome national debt.

(C) Because National Guard divisions are under the control of the States and are subject to orders from the Governors which might not fit with Army orders, all National Guard divisions and units should be placed at once under Federal control.

(D) Because speed is all important, September 1 is the date suggested for start of plan, and December 1 is target date to have all units at full strength, on orders, in training, or present for drill meetings.

(E) This plan will, in no way, slow down plans to draft men, to fill up Regular Army units or National Guard units, or stop the calling of any units or personnel involved.

(F) Although it is against the policy of the Army to have full divisions from any one State due to possible heavy casualties from one area, the present situation calls for getting men in units now and training them as much as possible, and letting any other worries work themselves out at a later date, such as changing men from one division to the next when they are ordered to active duty. (It might be added, in passing, that British units are organized from one area and called as such. The spirit of the unit, therefore, is outstanding, and losses from these units were not above the national average.)

(G) Changes can be made, replacing officers within the divisions if they prove unfit, and the Army can move units from one area to another (such as changing an Army Reserve regiment into a part of a National Guard division and vice versa).

II. PRESENT STRENGTH AND STATUS

(A) National Guard: Not called to active duty at this time are 21 National Guard divisions and many combat teams and support units scattered over the 48 States. They are assumed to be at somewhat less than half of the 18,000-man strength for infantry divisions.

(B) Army Reserve: There are 23 Army Reserve divisions in being and hundreds of support units and supply units. The majority of these units are filled with about 10 percent of enlisted strength and 95 percent of officer strength.

III. MANPOWER REQUIRED

(A) To fill 21 National Guard divisions to full strength, about 10,000 men per infantry division, or 210,000 men, will be required.

(B) To fill 23 Reserve divisions (16 infantry, 4 armored, and 4 airborne), about 15,000 men per division (infantry), or about a total of 345,000 men, will be required.

(C) To fill up the required Reserve and National Guard support and supply units which are required to supply (if called), Regular Army units as well, about 500,000 men. This group will go into Reserve and National Guard units of the following types: Separate small combat units, artillery, QM units, MP units, bands, medical units, truck transport companies, MI, AGD, and separate antiaircraft battalions.

(D) The full requirements will, therefore, be a total of 1,055,000 drafted men or enlistees. The State quotas will depend on required "fillers" needed for units within each State.

IV. THE PIPELINE

(How they are called, processed, assigned)

(A) The senior Army officer in each State, appointed by each Army commander of the five armies in the United States, will be told what units within the State will be "filled." He in turn from the National Guard and Army Reserve instructors in each town will receive a list of the number of men needed in that town to fill up the units he has ordered to full strength.

(B) The draft board in each town will then receive their orders from the State headquarters, giving the number of men to be "pulled" from their area for duty with these units. In the meantime, each unit will make every effort to recruit as many men as possible for their unit. These enlistees will be processed at a local level.

(C) As soon as a man is drafted or signs up with a unit he meets the commanding officer of his unit, is assigned to a unit position, and is then sent for a month of training at centers established within each Army area. At this camp Regular Army personnel and National Guard and Army Reserve officers and men (who will be there on short tours of active duty) will see these men receive the following:

1. Basic training, with the main training on subjects that cannot be handled in their own units at home station (firing of weapons, squad, platoon tactics, demonstrations of fire power of artillery, tanks, etc.).

2. An understanding of the Army, its organization, ranks, and the reasons why they are there and what they must learn to fit them with speed for duty at home station with their units.

3. Uniforms, dress and field, and weapon-rifle, or carbine depending on their position in home unit. These they will take with them upon return to home station, and they will be placed in home armory.

(D) Upon return to home station after month at camp, they will report to commanding officer of their unit and receive instructions as to drill nights at home station, time, place and SOP that will govern unit.

V. HOME TRAINING WITH UNITS

(A) A master training plan will be made by Army under which each unit of each type will carry out the same training. Before "fillers" return, the cadre, in the case of reserve units, and officers and men of guard units will prepare to receive the new men and carry out the assigned training.

(B) All units will meet four times per month. Drafted or new men will be at each meeting, or else they will be faced with a call to active duty. Sickness or death in family or a marriage will be the only reasons for nonattendance. Work will not be used as a reason for absence at drill.

(C) As well as covering basic subjects with new men, field problems will be worked and a liaison maintained between all units of a town for joint use of space, joint use of facilities, joint use of special weapons, and joint use of instruction given by an expert in a given field. Two weeks of summer training (in the field) will be required.

(D) Attention will be given to local defense problems, especially in the case of antiaircraft units against air attack, MP and MI and CIC units against sabotage, and all other units except medical against riots, paratroop landings, etc. Local units will join for parades, etc.

(E) Shortage of officers will be met by assignment of ROTC officers to units, and the appointment of top grade NCO's to officer positions. All other NCO promotions will be based on ability and an Army wide plan.

(F) Pay will be handled through regular Army Reserve and National Guard channels as at present.

VI. SUPPLIES, SPACE, TRAINING AIDS

(A) Armory space will be in short demand. In good weather, training will have to be conducted outside as much as possible. In cold or wet weather, if too crowded, extra space will have to be rented or taken over by the Army for training space. Again, the seriousness of the situation dictates action no matter how it will have to be worked out in the field at a local level.

(B) As much equipment as can be spared and is on hand will be placed with units despite proper storage facilities. This includes field pieces, tanks, jeeps, etc. They are sitting in the open in Army depots now—they might as well be sitting outside in town where they can be used in training of Reserve and guard units and be on hand in case of need. Antiaircraft units will receive full share of equipment, and all units will be equipped with all personal weapons and as many crew-served weapons as can be spared for training.

VII. GENERAL

This general plan will give the Nation a ground force in being, that can be called to training camps with full strengths of men and start unit training for combat duty, in a short period of time. If by December 30, 1950, this force was on hand, and we were at full war with Russia, we would have saved at least 3 to 4 months of time in organizing and training these units and men.

It will also give the Army over a million men who will have received some training as against a million men with no training, and it will give them at less than one-tenth of the cost.

Antiaircraft units, MP units, QM units, truck companies, signal, CID, ADG, TC units, and medical units would, under this plan be able to start operation at once upon call to active duty and be able to support our combat forces overseas. This would save months and months of training, and, if full war breaks out, time is not going to be a thing we can waste a lot of.

Drafted men to serve in these units will be drafted for the same length of time, as those drafted into Regular Army direct (which will be for duration no matter what it might say on the books).

A suggested plan such as this must not get all bogged down with red tape. Unit commanders of the various NG and Army Reserve units have some brains and can work out small problems themselves without waiting for a pile of orders and plans from the Army headquarters. This suggested plan is the same as the Legion UMT but it is conditioned to meet the times, and situation, which calls for speed. It is also based on most limited knowledge of the British Army system at present in being. It actually is a creation of a part-time Army to back up our full-time Army.

Speed is the important thing here, directed by the situation and the need for full strength ground units in the Reserve and guard.

TALBOT PETERSON,
Captain, Armored Cavalry USAR.

As can be seen, the essence of Captain Peterson's plan is to provide now, through great reliance on the resourcefulness and energy of our present Reserve officer and enlisted personnel, for the immediate building up of our Reserve forces, both National Guard and ORC, by speeded-up training within the Army areas. In the critical months ahead, it would have the obvious merit, as Captain Peterson points out, of providing a million men with some training as contrasted with the needs of these units for a million men today—none of whom have trained at all.

Captain Peterson would be the last to claim, I believe, that his proposal is complete, or that there are no difficulties in it which would have to be overcome. Obviously, there are many details and questions of policy which would have to be settled before such a plan could go into operation. The problem, for instance, of how to devise an equitable draft to channel men simultaneously into both the Regular Establishment and Reserve units would have to be solved.

The important thing, however, about Captain Peterson's suggestion is that it is A plan. It is a plan at a time when we do not have one, and at a time when, it seems to me, we are badly in need of a program, operating now, to make up our grave deficiencies in trained ground forces. But, whether it be this plan or another Mr. Speaker, I urge the membership to devote its best efforts to the immediate solution of this problem. We have no more time to waste.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENDERSON LANHAM
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 11, 1950

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I am including a resolution adopted by the Mason-McCauley Post, No. 6688, of the American Legion of Chattooga County, Ga., on the fourth day of August, 1950.

The resolution is self-explanatory:

Whereas our Nation is now facing a grave crisis and deep responsibility rests upon its leaders to make decisions concerning our future life; and

Whereas the VFW Mason-McCauley Post, No. 6688, of Chattooga County, Ga., is vitally interested in our Nation's safety and security; and

Whereas the members of this post, some 400 strong, having fought in previous wars to secure our Nation's safety, are desirous that the leaders of our military force maintain our military strength sufficient to resist any aggressor; and

Whereas our Congressman HENDERSON L. LANHAM has taken a strong position opposing Secretary of Defense Johnson's continuance in office; and

Whereas the members of Mason-McCauley Post fully believe that Hon. HENDERSON L. LANHAM's position is correct, and further believe that the Secretary of Defense has failed to carry forward and maintain our Nation's security; and

Whereas we further believe that he has led the American people into a sense of false security by stating that America was ready for any form of aggression: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the Mason-McCauley Post, hereby commend Congressman HENDERSON L. LANHAM in his stand and opposition to Mr. Johnson's continuance in office. We wish to urge our Congressman to maintain his vigorous opposition to Secretary of Defense Johnson's continuance in office, and use his influence to see that he is removed and a proper person, or persons, be placed in this responsible position; be it further

Resolved, That copy of this resolution be spread upon the minutes of the Mason-McCauley VFW Post, No. 6688, that copy of same be forwarded to Hon. HENDERSON L. LANHAM, that copies be forwarded to Hon. WALTER F. GEORGE, United States Senator from Georgia, and to Hon. RICHARD B. RUSSELL, United States Senator from Georgia.

Passed by Mason-McCauley Post this 4th day of August 1950.

JOS. MURPHY,
Post Commander.

Support the Un-American Activities Committee in Its Effort To Punish Those Who Refuse To Recognize Its Authority

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the House now has under consideration resolutions declaring 58 witnesses, who appeared before the House Un-American Activities Committee and refused to answer questions addressed to them, in contempt of Congress and directing appropriate action to be taken against them.

Mr. Speaker, I am in full accord with the purpose, intent, and objective of these resolutions. We cannot permit Communists to set at naught the functioning of the Un-American Activities Committee, or any other committee, engaged in conducting hearings for the purpose of ascertaining facts, concerning problems of government, on which Congress wishes to legislate in the public interest. To permit subversive, or any other elements in our country, to defy Congress, or any of its committees engaged in the work of the Congress, would result in making the individual superior to the Government and preclude its functioning in behalf of all the other people of the Nation.

The issue raised by the contempt resolutions now before us is whether these 58 individuals named in the resolutions, and, having records of subversive activities or affiliation with, and membership in organzations that have been recognized as subversive, shall have the right to act contemptously in refusing to recognize the right and authority of government acting through its proper agencies. It is inconceivable that any true or loyal American would claim such a right. It is time that we put these Communist and subversive elements where they belong. They have been coddled too long. They have taken advantage of the rights and privileges of free America to teach a godless religion and a theory of government that would destroy the fundamental principles upon which the Government of ours was founded. It is time for America to awake and demand that all within our gates shall be loyal to America and not to a foreign government that seeks to destroy us.

The Safety of Our Homes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES G. FULTON
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 11, 1950

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article published in the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette Daily Magazine for August 8, 1950, and also two letters with reference thereto:

[From the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette Daily Magazine of August 8, 1950]

PITTSBURGHESQUE—WRITE YOUR CONGRESSMAN

(By Charles F. Danver)

Hon. JAMES G. FULTON,
Old House Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I hate to bother you when you're so busy, but I wonder if you would do me a favor? If possible, I would like you to send me one machine gun, several hundred rounds of ammunition, and an easy book of instructions.

My reason for wanting these things is that I'm getting uneasy about the way the big shots down there in Washington are looking out the window for votes while the bad kid from next door builds a fire under the piano. I feel that it's up to me to do something now to protect my home when the Russians reach Pittsburgh.

Of course, my home really isn't mine. It's just a modest apartment that I pay rent for in somebody else's building. But my wife has it fixed up real nice. We just had it all painted and papered and the new stove and refrigerator are almost paid for, and I'd hate to have to give it up without a fight.

If I had the machine gun, I'd feel better. A lot of fellows here go in for hunting, so, of course, they'll have their rifles and shotguns to fire at the Soviet tanks. But it looks like most of us will just have to use sticks and stones or whatever we can pick up in a hurry to protect our women and kids.

I'll need the book of instructions because I don't know anything about a machine gun, or any other kind of gun, for that matter. In the first war they had me waving semaphore flags and tapping a blinker-light key down at the Lewes (Del.) Naval Base, and the Navy wouldn't take me the last time because they said I was too old. So I never did get a chance to learn to shoot a gun—just like a lot of our boys who will soon have to die.

But I think the janitor and I can handle it all right, if we have the book of instructions. He was in the Army once, I believe, and he's handy with tools, anyway. I figure on setting it up on the roof, which will be the best place when the Commies come down Maple Terrace from Grandview Avenue.

I realize you may have a hard time finding me a machine gun because the Government got rid of most of that stuff after the last war, and never did replace it because Stalin was a good old Joe, like President Truman said, and never intended any harm to anybody. Still, maybe the generals in the Pentagon might be able to recall where there's one buried that you could dig up. If it's a little rusty, that won't matter because our janitor is pretty good at fixing things up.

Again let me apologize for bothering you. But the way I look at it, it could happen any day now, and I decided that I ought to do something. If a fellow just sits back these days and doesn't do anything to protect his own home, who will? Hoping to hear from you real soon, I am,

Anxiously,

CHARLES F. DANVER.

PITTSBURGH, PA., August 8, 1950.

Hon. JAMES G. FULTON,
Old House Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I'm not making any apologies about writing to you, because, when we elect some one to any political office, we expect to have them do something for us, and for our country when it is necessary, and at the present time I feel that it is very necessary that some one with some intestinal fortitude does just that.

I have talked with your secretary, and she advised writing to you, so now I'm doing just that.

When I read Mr. Dauver's column this morning, I thought he expressed exactly what is in the minds of any thinking person.

I lost a son in World War II and I'm glad I don't have to live through that agony again.

I want you to read this letter, Mr. FULTON, and publish it if you want to.

Sincerely yours,

Mrs. W. T. MCNALLY.

REGISTRATION COMMISSIONERS,
Pittsburgh, Pa., August 8, 1950.

Mr. CHARLES F. DANVER,
Pittsburgh Post-Gazette,
Pittsburgh, Pa.

DEAR CHARLES: Your Tuesday column on the unnamed subject The Safety of Our Homes is one of the best articles I have ever read.

It is amazing the number of people in this supposedly well-protected Nation of ours whose daily thoughts, whose expressions, whose fears coincide exactly with those effectively expressed in this simple little story of yours.

Very sincerely,

FRED E. OBLEY,
Chairman.

Came Back

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN R. WALSH
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 11, 1950

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I note with some interest an article appearing in the Marion (Ind.) News Herald. This little news item, or editorial, is somewhat in answer to a recent special newspaper that was published in Washington, Ind., on the life of our senior Senator, HOMER CAPEHART. Part of the article about Mr. CAPEHART was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and I know the Congress will be interested in the News Herald's observation:

CAME BACK

News Herald recently received an eight-page section of the Washington (Ind.) daily paper which was completely devoted to HOMER CAPEHART, who is seeking reelection to the United States Senate from Indiana.

Now we aren't going to scream "propaganda," just because the issue was about CAPEHART, a Republican. It was a darn good paper and did a fine job of outlining CAPEHART's life—poor farm boy, earnest school boy, World War I soldier, traveling salesman, small factory, big factory, United States Senator. The American success pattern. HOMER CAPEHART followed that pattern and he deserves every credit in the world. We do want, however, to make a point—a good point.

One story in that paper—and we believe it—was that, in 1932, HOMER CAPEHART was down to 15 cents for 2 days' lunch. Things did get that bad—the News Herald publisher and his wife once lived on raw apples for 3 days, apples picked off the ground in a country orchard. (It's not a very good way to live.)

Another story was about the 1938 cornfield conference, held on CAPEHART'S southern Indiana farms, financed by—CAPEHART. (The cost isn't known, but had to be thousands and thousands of dollars.)

The Democrat Party came into power in 1933, the year after CAPEHART, and all the rest of us, hit rock bottom.

By 1938 CAPEHART appears to have recovered enough financially to have those farms and to pay, personally, for a midwestern cornfield parley attended by thousands of the GOP faithful, all well entertained and well fed.

Those 6 years under the Democrat administration must have been very good ones, indeed.

Hawaii Molds State Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON
DELEGATE FROM HAWAII
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 11, 1950

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Harold S. Roberts from the Christian Science Monitor of August 7, 1950:

HAWAII MOLDS STATE CONSTITUTION

(By Harold S. Roberts)

Hawaii has on 16 different occasions petitioned the Congress to grant statehood. Unlike other Territories which have been permitted to come into the Union, beginning with the Northwest Territory in 1787, Hawaii has more than met the qualifications for statehood.

On 37 different occasions since 1920 bills have been introduced in successive sessions of Congress to provide statehood. In the past 15 years there have been nine separate hearings held by congressional committees on the question of statehood for Hawaii.

The Congress has more information and statistical data on Hawaii than on any other Territory previously admitted to the Union. Despite the record, Hawaii is still seeking equality with other States.

The most recent attempt to obtain statehood began by the introduction of an enabling statute by Delegate JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON on January 3, 1950. Hawaii has one Delegate to Congress, but without vote. This bill passed the House on March 7, 1950, by a vote of 262 to 110. On July 12 the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, by a vote of 9 to 1, recommended statehood. Senator HUGH BUTLER, of Nebraska, cast the only negative vote.

ANOTHER AVENUE TRIED

While this bill was going through the congressional mill the Territorial Legislature passed a bill to try another avenue for achieving statehood, should the enabling act procedure fail.

Some 15 States have been admitted to the Union by the alternative procedure of drafting a State constitution and going to Congress, knocking on the door, and asking to be admitted. At the present time Hawaii is launching its campaign for statehood in a two-pronged offensive. The people of the Territory desire to come into the Union as a sovereign State on an equal footing with 35 other Territories previously admitted to statehood.

On Saturday, July 22, 61 delegates affixed their signatures to an historic document—the constitution of the State of Hawaii. The ceremony took place in the throne room at historic Iolani Palace, Honolulu. There was a touch of deep solemnity, offset by the bright Hawaiian flowers and the chanting strains of island music. The ceremony ended with the singing of the Star-Spangled Banner.

The new document is a product of Hawaii and its people. It reflects the thinking of an essentially conservative community, but one that is responsive to changing times and needs. The constitution has borrowed and adopted provisions from the Federal Constitution, the Hawaii Organic Act, the model State constitution, and the constitutions of the other States.

DIFFERENT PRODUCT

Although it has studied and tapped all of the available resources, the final product is unlike that of any other State. It has its own flavor and features which find roots in the problems and needs of the community. Typical of these are the provisions dealing with Hawaiian homelands, the limitations of bonded indebtedness and the use of assessed land valuations to adjust these limits; and the sections dealing with local government, drafted in the light of a centralized tax structure and a coordinated and centralized system of public education.

The basic conservatism of the constitution is reflected in the limited number of elective officials. The governor and lieutenant governor are the only elected officials. The cabinet members and the judges of the courts are appointed by the governor, with the advice and consent of the senate. The members of the board of education are to be appointed by the governor, from panels nominated by the counties. There is no provision for the initiative, referendum, and recall—so popular during the first two decades of the century.

VOTING AGE REDUCED

Although fundamentally conservative, the constitution does contain many progressive features which reflect the forward-looking character of the community. The new constitution provides for the reduction in the voting age from 21 to 20. Only one other State in the Union has a voting age of less than 21. A provision recognizing the right to organize for the purpose of collective bargaining, as a constitutional guaranty, has been included. Only three other State constitutions, Missouri, New Jersey, and New York, provide such constitutional guaranties.

Many features of the document reflect the best current thinking in the field of government. For example, the executive departments of government in the new state are to be coordinated in no more than 20 major departments, to permit the governor to keep a personal check on the functioning of the executive branch. There are provisions to eliminate the pocket veto. The salaries of the governor, the judges, and members of the legislature have been increased to attract the best qualified men to office. The salaries compare favorably with the highest 10 States of the Union.

Provision is made for post-audits of State expenditures, as well as a requirement that the legislature pass the general appropriations bill before passing other finance bills. This may prevent the last-minute rush so typical of many legislative sessions, which makes it difficult to give careful scrutiny to final drafts of bills and leads to political log-rolling and deals.

HEAVY VOTER TURN-OUT

In many other respects recognition is given to practices which are conducive to good government; Hawaii is conscious, however, that good government is more a product of the people of the community than of the written document which forms its base.

The 63 delegates, elected by the people at primary and general elections last February 11 and March 21, began their official task on April 4. Although the campaign was run on a nonpartisan basis (there were no party designations on the ballot), there was a heavy turn-out of voters. In excess of 80 percent of the registered voters cast their ballots. Of those elected, approximately one-third had never run for an elective office before.

For many of the delegates it will be their one and only campaign. These men and women were attracted by the nature of the job to be done. Writing a constitution for a new State comes but once in a lifetime. On the other hand, some of the newcomers may well try their wings in the political arena. No American community can overlook "new blood" for its political melting pot. Federal, State, and local government must continue to attract the best from all segments of the community.

The delegates, elected from all parts of the territory, represented a broad cross section of the community. Among the 63 delegates were two pineapple company presidents, two union representatives, a judge of the circuit court, two former attorneys general, a member of the Board of Regents of the University of Hawaii, the superintendent of public instruction, one physician, two dentists, the speaker and vice-speaker of the Territorial House of Representatives, four members of the Territorial senate, a number of schoolteachers, and others. Of the five women who won seats, two are attorneys, two are housewives, and one is a member of the Territorial legislature.

Racially, the convention contained 27 Caucasians, 20 Japanese-Americans, 11 Hawaiians, and 5 Chinese-Americans; generally representative of the population. Politically there were 29 Republicans, 21 Democrats, and 13 nonpartisans.

PROVISIONS FOR ELECTION

Should the Congress pass the enabling act in its present form, the constitution could be submitted to the people for ratification at the general elections in November. H. R. 49 provides that an election be held within 60 to 120 days after the passage of the enabling act. If the constitution is ratified by the people, it will be transmitted to the President of the United States and to the Congress for approval. If Congress approves the ratified constitution, the people will then proceed to elect the State officers and two United States Senators and Members to the House of Representatives. Should the voters or the Congress fail to ratify the constitution, the delegates to the 1950 convention will have to reconvene to draft another constitution that will meet the objections of the Congress or those of the people.

Should the Congress fail to pass H. R. 49, the Constitution will be submitted to the next session of the Territorial legislature. The legislature may not change the constitution. It may, however, draft an alternative. The people will then have the choice of voting for the constitution drafted by the delegates elected by them, the one drafted by the legislature, if any, or neither. If the people reject the constitution, the convention has to reconvene to draft a new document. If the people approve the document, it will be submitted to the Congress with a request for direct admission into the Union.

HAWAII AT DOOR

In the meantime, Hawaii knocks at the door for statehood. It alone of the Territories that have shown their ability for democratic self-government, the ability to finance their own operations and to support our free institutions, has been denied equality of rights with the other States. Unlike Puerto Rico, which elects its own governor and pays no Federal taxes to the United States, Hawaii, which was a free republic when it entered into a mutual agreement with the United States in 1900 and has paid in over $1,000,000,000 in taxes to the Federal Government and paid close to $90,000,000 in 1949, is denied the right to elect its own governor, has no voting representation in Congress, and is denied the right to vote for the President of the United States.

If taxation without representation was tyranny in the middle of the eighteenth century, it is no less so in the middle of the twentieth.

Hawaii, the meeting place of the cultures of the east and west, a dynamic outpost of democracy in the Pacific, waits impatiently for recognition of more than a half century of democratic progress. It is ready and willing to assume its responsibility in the new Pacific era. Admission of Hawaii into the Union now would, in the words of the Senate committee: "* * * give notice to all the world, and particularly to the peoples of the Pacific at this critical juncture of international affairs, that it is the policy of the United States to provide self-government among all the peoples without political, economic, racial or other distinction."

DEMOCRACY IN ACTION

Both major parties have, in the past 10 years, included statehood for Hawaii in their platforms. Hawaiians say it is high time to transform these promises into political realities.

The constitutional convention was democracy in action. The delegates convened on April 4, adopted rules of procedure, elected officers, set up 20 working committees, and began their deliberations. Members indicated their preference for committee assignments on the basis of interest and special technical qualifications. The committees ranged in size from 5 to 15 members; they studied all of the proposals introduced by the individual delegates; invited experts in the special fields under consideration, and held public hearings.

Unlike many political conventions, and for that matter different from the convention which drafted our own Federal Constitution, all of the committee meetings were open to the public, press, and radio. A weekly report was prepared by the committee on submission and information which was distributed to many community groups, which in turn made copies available to constituent members. Four radio stations provided time during the week for summaries of the work of the convention. The press provided good daily coverage.

REPORT SUBMITTED

As each committee completed its deliberations, it submitted a detailed report setting forth the scope and character of the problem before it and the results of its work. At the conclusion of each report was a proposal which contained the specific language recommended by the committee for incorporation in the proposed constitution. Copies were duplicated for all the delegates, the press and community groups which desired them. These standing committees' reports were then placed on the calendar for full consideration and debate.

To provide the maximum flexibility and informality of discussion, most of the debate on the reports was held in committee of the whole. Through full and free discussion (completely open to the press and public), by amendments and suggestions from the floor, the committee proposals and recommendations were dissected, paragraph by paragraph, sentence by sentence, and occasionally word by word.

Unlike the deliberations of many legislative bodies, proposals underwent substantial modification on the floor. The debates were frequently intense, sometimes acrimonious. On the whole, however, the discussions were on a high plane, directed toward the basic issues under consideration. One rather unusual feature of the deliberations, and a tribute to the delegates, lies in the fact that at no time was it necessary to place a limitation on debate. The rules made ample provision for such limitation, but they were never put to use.

Ample time was provided to give each of the respective chairmen of the committee of the whole to prepare his report and recommendation, which was then presented to the delegates for adoption. The reports and proposals so approved were then sent to the committee on style for arrangement and form. The style committee was under specific instruction to confine its work to form and style and was prohibited from making any change of a substantive character. It could, and did, however, call attention to discrepancies, omissions, or conflict, and report to the convention for further instructions or action.

SEQUENCE GIVEN

The style committee then resubmitted each of the articles to the convention for approval and adoption on form and style. The articles were again sent to the style committee for final arrangement and review of all of the sections into an integrated and cohesive document. As finally adopted, the provisions of the Constitution are arranged in the following sequence:

Preamble.
Adoption of Federal Constitution.
Article 1, Bill of Rights.
Article 2, Suffrage and Elections.
Article 3, The Legislature.
Article 4, The Executive.
Article 5, The Judiciary.
Article 6, Taxation and Finance.
Article 7, Local Government.
Article 8, Public Health and Welfare.
Article 9, Education.
Article 10, Development and Conservation of Resources.
Article 11, Hawaiian Home Lands.
Article 12, Organization, Collective Bargaining.
Article 13, State Boundaries, Capital, Flag.
Article 14, General and Miscellaneous Provisions.
Article 15, Revisions and Amendments.
Article 16, Schedule:
(a) Representative districts.
(b) Transitional laws.
(c) First officers, election procedures.

ONE-HUNDRED-AND-TEN-DAY CONVENTION

The convention lasted 110 calendar days. Actually there were 78 days devoted to plenary sessions. At other times there were committee meetings, hearings, and preparation of committee reports. During the preliminary period of committee work there were, on the average, 20 to 30 meetings each week occupying in excess of 40 hours of work.

No verbatim transcript was kept of the deliberations of the standing committees.

Each committee did keep a brief summary in the form of minutes, and these were available to the other delegates. These minutes will also be part of the record to be kept in the archives with other official documents.

The convention did keep a complete verbatim transcript by means of electronic tape recordings of all the session after April 9. Over 365 reels of recording tape were used, or about 87 miles of recording tape. It has been estimated that approximately 5,000,000 words were spoken during the floor debates. Only 14,000, however, found a place in the Constitution. Of these, approximately 4,000 are in the schedule which describes the political districts to be used in the initial elections and for subsequent reapportionment every 10 years.

Admission of Korean Veterans to the American Legion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT M. COLE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 11, 1950

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions adopted by Capitol Post, No. 1, of the American Legion, of Topeka, Kans., on August 3, 1950:

Resolution in relation to the admission to the membership in the American Legion of veterans of the armed conflict in Korea or any further extension thereof

Whereas the Charter of the American Legion, enacted by Congress, approved September 16, 1919, and as amended by Congress October 29, 1942, and July 9, 1946, limits the membership in the American Legion to otherwise eligible veterans of two World Wars between the dates of April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, and between the dates of December 7, 1941, and September 2, 1945; and

Whereas the American people are cognizant of the fact that all free people throughout the world are being threatened by armed aggression on behalf of the communistic nations; and

Whereas the free peoples of the world joined together and formed the United Nations Conference for the purpose of preserving peace; and

Whereas in direct violation of the duties and obligations assumed by all nations under the United Nations Agreement, the Government of North Korea invaded with armed forces the territory of South Korea; and

Whereas the Government of the United States of America, under official sanction of the United Nations Conference, sent a military force to the assistance of the South Korea Government; and

Whereas American soldiers, sailors, and marines, many of whom have died or been wounded, are now in active combat for the preservation of peace and free governments of the world; and

Whereas these fighting, wounded, or deceased patriots have given or endangered their health and lives for the same purpose that the soldiers, sailors, and marines fought for during World War I and World War II; and

Whereas the present armed conflict is still confined to Korea, there is great danger that it may spread to all portions of the world; and

Whereas the membership of the American Legion have a close kinship to the present members of our Armed Forces presently engaged in the Korean War: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by members of Capitol Post, No. 1, Department of Kansas, That the Department Convention of the American Legion take proper and necessary action to request that the Charter of the American Legion, as enacted and amended by the Congress of the United States, be further amended in an appropriate manner so that the veterans of the present Korean conflict, or any further extension thereof be made eligible for membership in the American Legion.

The above resolution was voted upon at the regular post membership meeting of July 27, 1950, and passed unanimously.

JAMES W. GRAHAM,
Commander, Capitol Post, No. 1.

Attest:

BENJAMIN P. KRENTZ,
Adjutant, Capitol Post, No. 1.

Whereas the Korean situation and Communist activities throughout the entire world has reached the critical stage; and

Whereas J. Edgar Hoover and other authorities inform us there are thousands of Communists living in America; and

Whereas it is common knowledge and the findings of the highest Court that the overthrow of America is the avowed purpose of every Communist; and

Whereas another Pearl Harbor would undoubtedly be fatal and eventually may be too late: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by Capitol Post, No. 1, the American Legion, Department of Kansas, assembled in regular meeting, Thursday, July 27, 1950, That we urge and demand by the Congress of the United States, the immediate passage of S. 2311, known as the Subversive Activities Control Act, 1950; be it still further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution shall be sent to each Member of the Kansas delegation in Congress, and to the leading newspapers and Legion posts in the State of Kansas.

The above resolution was voted upon at the regular post membership meeting of July 27, 1950, and passed unanimously.

JAMES W. GRAHAM,
Commander, Capitol Post, No. 1.

Attest:

BENJAMIN P. KRENTZ,
Adjutant, Capitol Post, No. 1.

Whereas American Army, Air, and Naval Forces are now engaged in combat operations in Korea which have attained the full proportions of a state of war so far as these fighting forces are concerned; and

Whereas the casualties suffered in the fighting are in nowise different from those of a fully declared state of war insofar as their effect upon the fighting men and women involved and their families and dependents are concerned: Now, therefore, be it and it is hereby

Resolved by Capitol Post, No. 1, the American Legion, Department of Kansas, in regular meeting assembled, Thursday, July 27, 1950, That we urge upon the Congress of the United States to enact such legislation as may be required to extend by law to the members of the Armed Forces now in the field or who may hereafter be ordered into the services under the present emergency circumstances, the status of veterans for the purpose of assuring them and their dependents the death, disability, and dependency benefits now applicable to veterans of the great wars.

The above resolution was voted upon at the regular post membership meeting of July 27, 1950, and passed unanimously.

Another Side of the Story

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. L. BARTLETT
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 11, 1950

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a group of Alaska workmen have been called unpatriotic because of the work stoppage at Anchorage resulting from a wage dispute. There is another side to this story. The American public is entitled to know that side. Therefore I present here a letter from a constituent who is a resident of Anchorage, the text of a radio talk made by Mr. W. S. Cruthers, member of the Anchorage plumbers and steamfitters local, and text of a newspaper advertisement printed on behalf of Local 367, United Association of Plumbers and Steamfitters:

ANCHORAGE, ALASKA, August 8, 1950.

DEAR DELEGATE BARTLETT: It just came over the radio that President Truman and Chief of Defense Johnson stated the plumbers' strike in Anchorage was delaying defense work.

As our Delegate in Washington, you are entitled to know all about the entire controversy. I am taking it upon myself as an individual member of the plumbers local 367 to send you the enclosed information.

Since the above was printed, we have had two meetings with the local master's association, with a United States mediator sitting in; also, our international representative, Clayton Bilderbach. I was told last night's meeting was not productive of results. Although the plumbers offered some concessions, the masters refused to budge.

At our meeting last Friday night we voted to remove the retroactive clause from the letter sent to the outside contractors; also, sent telegrams asking them to come and meet with our negotiating committee to draw up a contract with or without the local masters.

We are now paid $3 per hour in Anchorage, plus room and board on jobs a certain distance from Anchorage.

We are asking $3.50 per hour due to the high cost of living existing here—an item I am sure you are familiar with.

We have made no other demands, such as paid holidays, paid vacations, old-age pensions, welfare fund, or any of the extras that exist in many contracts in the States.

Fairbanks Association of Master Plumbers and the local there, No. 375, of the plumbers came to an agreement giving the plumbers $3.50 per hour.

While I am writing this as in individual, I will stand by anything I state in this letter.

What most people cannot understand is why the Army will allow four small commercial contractors, who have no defense work, to tie up $100,000,000 in military work.

The outside contractor who has the defense work has an agreement with our international union to comply with all wages and conditions existing in the Territory that he moves into to do work. There being no contract at the present time, we have agreed to make a separate contract with the outside contractors, manning their jobs at the old scale while negotiations are being conducted. Even this offer has not brought results.

AN ADDRESS BY W. S. CRUTHERS OVER RADIO STATION KENI, ANCHORAGE, ALASKA, JULY 28, 1950

(Mr. Cruthers is a member of local union No. 367, Plumbers and Steamfitters of the United Association of America. Also a delegate to the Central Labor Council, and to the Building and Construction Trades Council, of Anchorage.)

Good evening; there are many facts in the present controversy between the Master Plumbers Association and members of the local union 367 of the plumbing and pipefitting industry, which should be brought to the attention of the public. Many people believe that vital construction work of a military nature will be stopped. This is not true.

While negotiations are in progress for a new working agreement, local union 367 has notified all contractors on this type of work that we will continue to man their jobs at the prevailing wage scale, plus retroactive pay from the date the men are dispatched.

The plumbers and steamfitters of Anchorage, local union 367, at their meeting on July 21, 1950, voted to strike on July 26, only those members in good standing for the past 6 months were eligible to vote. This action was founded on the fact that an adequate wage was necessary to carry them through the slack winter months.

Now, the sequence of events leading to this vote date back to March 1947. At that time, Burch-Johnson-Lytle Co., signed an agreement with the Army covering all military construction within the jurisdiction of this local union.

This contract, No. 1000, was a cost-plus-fixed-fee arrangement with the Government. This contract proved to be very unsatisfactory to all groups concerned. Industrial contractors were dissatisfied because this type of work was not open to competitive bidding. The Army was not satisfied because each project undertaken was excessively costly in material, money, and man-hours. Labor disliked the arrangement because wage rates were established in Washington, D. C., and any adjustments necessary because of the ever-increasing high cost of living in the Territory of Alaska were often delayed a year or more.

The members of local union 367, together with members of other crafts in the Building and Construction Trades Council, sought to discover some means by which the welfare of each group concerned could be improved.

In order to induce the Government to award contracts on a competitive basis, labor agreed, temporarily, to accept a lower wage scale than the one prevailing in Anchorage.

In November 1948 the Goverenment called for competitive bids on military construction. In due time these contracts were awarded and the experiment proved successful for two of the groups concerned in this work, leaving the third group, labor, out in the cold.

First. The Army was well pleased because their work was completed months ahead of schedule, and at a great saving in cost, enabling them to obtain more appropriations of money from Congress for other badly needed construction.

Second. That the contractors were well satisfied goes without saying, as witness their eagerness to bid on the contracts awarded for the 1950 construction season.

In almost every instance the successful bidders on the current construction program were awarded the contracts at a figure far below the engineer's estimate, in some cases, nearly 40 percent.

It was stated by a Congressman on the floor of the House of Representatives that a certain type of dwelling on the post had cost $70,000 to build on a cost-plus-fixed-fee basis. Now we know that this same type of house, using the same amount and kind of material, cost $35,000 under competitive bidding.

Third. Labor was dissatisfied because it found itself in the peculiar position of having to decline a proffered increase of 13 cents an hour, which was granted to all other crafts in the building and construction trades at that time.

Two of the major plumbing and heating contracts for 1949 had already been awarded on bids based on our 1948 wage scale, and to have accepted the increase would have worked a hardship on all plumbing and heating contractors.

Then, in order not to find ourselves in the position we occupied in March 1949, and have to decline another prospective increase in wages so as to protect the interests of the several plumbing contractors, we took the precaution at that time, to notify all prospective bidders that we would recognize the prevailing Anchorage wage scale only in 1950. The experimental wage scale had proved its point and served its purpose, that is, we had agreed, and did work until March 1950, at the 1948 wage scale.

We were approached by all plumbing and heating contractors who contemplated submitting bids on the 1950 construction program for a wage scale on which to base their bid estimates. All were advised that our proposed wage scale was $3.50 per hour, and to submit their bids accordingly. Three of the successful bidders have since notified us that their bids were based on this wage scale.

In January of this year we began our efforts to negotiate a wage agreement for 1950 with the Master Plumbers Association of Anchorage. To date they have made no fair reasonable offer.

To promote harmony within the plumbing and heating industry of Anchorage, the members of local union 367 have worked for a lower wage scale than one consistent with the increases awarded other trade crafts since March 1, 1948. All other crafts received two wage increases since that date.

The chairman of the Master Plumbers Association was credited in the press with the following statement, and I quote, "The constant wage raise demand must be stopped now to prevent jeopardizing the economy of the entire area," end of quote.

What kind of a warped perception of economic science does a man have, when he decries a living wage to a workingman, who spends his entire earnings in the area, and then this man's voice is silent when an absentee employer will take out of the Territory a million or more dollars in profit, from which the area receives no benefit?

I have before me a telegram from Fairbanks, dated July 24, 1950, addressed to our local union 367, which states, "Wage negotiations complete here with the following contractors signed up at the new $3.50-per-hour wage scale."

And then the telegram goes on to name the 12 contractors signatory to the agreement, including the P. S. Lord Co. of Portland, Oreg., one of the biggest companies in the West. The telegram was signed by Carl J. Slatburg, business manager, Plumbers and Steamfitters Local Union No. 375, Fairbanks, Alaska.

This gives the lie to the rumor that was circulated that only two small firms had signed the agreement.

Surely, the Master Plumbers Association of Fairbanks were not unmindful of the economic stability of the territory, but they also were aware, no doubt, that the former wage scale was inadequate.

Many of the men in both districts, and their families, are battling a high cost of living that threatens to go much higher.

In some cases they are paying $125 per month rent for a shack with no modern conveniences, and another $75 per month to heat and light it in the winter months.

Almost all the master plumbers of Anchorage were journeymen plumbers at one time. But apparently they feel they are now in the big league, and can force the journeymen to work for any wage.

They forget that it was the United Association of Plumbers and Steamfitters that gave them their present comfortable position. It has long been the policy of our organization to insist that the prime contractor on a project give the plumbing and heating to a legitimate plumbing shop, in order to protect the health of the community.

Organized labor is more than a means for increasing the size of the worker's pay check. It is quite true that the first and primary interest of labor unions has rightly been to give the individual employee strength and security on the job.

However, the value of trade-unions goes far beyond this function. The trade-union movement represents basically the workers' demand for justice in their job relationship. It represents their aspiration for a life in which they have a voice, making their own decisions, and effective opportunity, to share in social progress.

Organized labor has always stood with those who have worked for statehood for Alaska, and now wishes to go one step further and stabilize the economy by working for a 40-hour week.

We feel the action we have taken is in the best interest and welfare of the community. A 40-hour week will have a tendency to spread the available work over a greater part of the year. Business and industry will benefit from this stabilization of the economy. Families will be attracted to Anchorage by the assurance of a fair living wage.

Wages earned here will be spent here.

The future of free economic enterprise in this country, and the preservation of government itself, depends upon the establishment and perpetuation of cooperative relations, between capital and labor.

It is the desire of Local Union 367 to have a mutual settlement of this controversy, so that all work can go forward. But we are in this fight to the bitter end.

We know we are right. We are not making any unjust demands.

We have the support of all progressive union men, including the Central Labor Council. The Building and Construction Trades Council has shown their concern for our welfare by appointing a committee, at their meeting Tuesday night, to work with both sides for an early settlement of the dispute.

With their help and guidance we are sure to go forward to victory.

I wish to state at this time that I am a member of Local Union 367 and their authorized spokesman for this broadcast, and again repeat the opening statement I made, that many people believe vital construction work of a military nature will be stopped; this is not true.

Local Union 367 has notified all contractors of this type of work that we will continue to man their jobs at the prevailing wage scale, plus retroactive pay from the day the men are dispatched.

By telephone yesterday, Sam Odle, business agent of Local Union 367 brought Clayton Bilderbach, International Representative of our craft up to date on all details of the strike.

In this conversation Bilderbach again stated that under no circumstances should we withdraw our letter to the outside contractors, consenting to man their jobs at the present wage scale, plus retroactive pay from the date of the dispatch of the men to the job, pending a settlement.

A settlement which all of us hope will come soon.

Thank you for listening, and good night.

AMERICANS ARE A CURIOUS LOT—MOST OF THEM LIKE TO HEAR BOTH SIDES OF ANY QUESTION—HERE IS OUR SIDE

FAIRBANKS, ALASKA, July 24, 2950.

Mr. SAM ODLE,
Business Agent, Local 367,
Anchorage, Alaska:

Wage negotiations complete here with the following contractors signed up at new $3.50 per hour wage rate.

P. S. Lord Co., Portland, Oreg.; L. E. Stevens Co., Cincinnati, Ohio; R. G. Chapman Co., Tacoma, Wash.; West Coast Plumbing Co., Seattle, Wash.; Wilbur-Bell Co., Fairbanks; Gull Plumbing Co., Fairbanks; Fairbanks Plumbing Co., Fairbanks; Berry Plumbing Co., Fairbanks; Baggett Plumbing Co., Fairbanks; Hemen Refrigerator Co., Fairbanks.

CARL J. SLATBURG,
Business Agent, Local 375.

(Copy of letter to all plumbing and heating contractors who now hold military contracts in the jurisdiction of local 367, United Association of Plumbers and Steamfitters:)

ANCHORAGE, ALASKA, July 22, 1950.

GENTLEMEN: The Plumbers and Steamfitters Local 367, of Anchorage, Alaska, at their regular meeting of July 21, 1950, voted to call a strike, effective July 26, 1950, at 8 a. m.

Upon receipt of a letter from your firm, stating that you will meet all conditions and wage rates eventually agreed upon by the members of local 367, and the Master Plumbers Association of Anchorage, retroactive to the effective date of the strike, July 26, 1950, at 8 a. m., we will continue to furnish men to your firm at the existing wage rate of $3 per hour.

It is not our intention to inconvenience those plumbing and heating contractors who are not signators to the local agreement, nor do we wish to hinder in any way, the progress of vital military or civilian installations.

Cordially yours,

SAM ODLE,
Business Manager, Local 367.

The widely held public belief that vital military construction is jeopardized by the present dispute between the Master Plumbers Association of Anchorage, and the members of local 367 is not true. All contractors on this type of work have been notified by this local union that we will continue to man their jobs at the prevailing wage scale of $3 per hour, pending a settlement of this dispute.

The plumbers and steamfitters of Anchorage, local union 367, at their meeting on July 21, 1950, voted to strike on July 26, 1950, at 8 a. m. Only those who have been members in good standing for the past 6 months were eligible to vote. This action was founded on the knowledge that an adequate wage was necessary to carry them through the slack winter months. The sequence of events leading to this vote date back to March 1947. At that time the Birch-Johnson-Lytle Co. signed a contract with the Army covering all military construction in the jurisdiction of this local. This contract, No. 1000, was a cost-plus-fixed-fee arrangement with the Government and proved unsatisfactory to all parties involved. Industrial contractors were dissatisfied because this type of work was not open to competitive bidding. The Army was dissatisfied because each project undertaken was excessively costly both in money and man-hours. Labor was dissatisfied because wage rates were established in Washington, D. C., and wage adjustments necessary because of the ever increasing high cost of living in the Territory of Alaska were often delayed a year or more.

The members of local 367, together with members of other crafts in the building and construction trades council, sought to discover some means by which the welfare of each party concerned could be improved. In order to induce the Government to award contracts on a competitive basis, labor agreed to (temporarily) accept a lower scale of wages than that then prevailing in Anchorage. In November 1948, the Government called for competitive bids on military construction. Subsequently these contracts were awarded, and the experiment proved to be successful for two of the parties involved.

The Army had the satisfaction of seeing their work completed months ahead of schedule, and at a great saving in money.

That the contractors fared well was evidenced by their eagerness to bid on the contracts awarded for the 1950 construction season. In almost every instance the successful bidders on the current construction program were awarded the contracts at a figure far below the engineers' estimate of cost, in some cases, nearly 40 percent.

In the spring of 1949, local 367 found itself in the peculiar position of having to decline a proffered increase of 13 cents an hour, which was granted to all other crafts in the building and construction trades at that time. Two of the major plumbing and heating contracts for 1949 had already been awarded on bids based on our 1948 wage scale, and to have accepted the increase would have have worked a hardship on all plumbing and heating contractors.

So that we would not again find ourselves in the position we occupied in March 1949, and have to decline another prospective increase in wages to protect the interests of the several master plumbers, we took the precaution at that time to notify all prospective bidders that we would recognize only the prevailing Anchorage wage scale in 1950. The experimental lower wage scale had proved its point and served its purpose. We agreed then to work until March 1, 1950, at the 1948 wage scale.

We were approached by all plumbing and heating contractors who contemplated submitting bids on the 1950 construction program, for a wage scale on which to base their bid estimates. All were advised that our proposed wage scale was $3.50 per hour, and to submit their bids accordingly. Three of the successful bidders have since informed us that their bids were based on this wage scale.

In January we began our efforts to negotiate a wage agreement for 1950 with the master plumbers association of Anchorage. To date they have made no fair or reasonable offer.

To promote harmony within the plumbing and heating industry of Anchorage, the members of local 367 have worked for a lower wage rate than was consistent with the increases accepted by the other building crafts since March 1, 1949. All other building crafts have received two wage increases since that date.

We feel that our recent action was taken with the interest and welfare of the entire community at heart. A 40-hour week will have a decided tendency to spread the available work over a greater portion of the year. Business and industry will benefit from this stabilization of economy. Families will be attracted to Anchorage by the assurance of a fair annual living wage. Wages earned in the Territory will be spent in the Territory. Alaska is on the verge of statehood. Opponents of statehood in the Senate have stressed the fact that Alaska is sparsely populated. We feel that the only way to overcome this obstacle is to make this area more attractive, economically, for permanent residents. A fair wage agreement, as asked by the members of local 367 is a firm step in this direction.

UNITED ASSOCIATION OF PLUMBERS AND STEAMFITTERS, LOCAL 367.

Our Civil Defense Isn't

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. GORDON CANFIELD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 11, 1950

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Hanson W. Baldwin, from the New York Times of August 11, 1950:

OUR CIVIL DEFENSE ISN'T—AND SOLUTION IS DOUBTED TILL WE SET UP WAYS OF DISPERSION AND CENTRALIZATION

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

City, State, and Nation have awakened suddenly since the guns started firing in Korea to the importance of civil defense in the atomic age.

But many of the steps so far taken, and the plans being made, though impressive on paper, have but limited value. Several of the basic problems of civil defense have been attacked but sketchily, if at all.

The old adage, an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure, is just as applicable to civil defense as it is to health. Yet, so far, we are stressing the cure rather than the prevention.

The New York City Fire Department has estimated the cost of new equipment needed to fight atomic conflagration at $100,000,000. A $450,000,000 shelter-building program for the city has been proposed, and we are organizing auxiliary police and firemen and medical and hospital aid.

Now these all are desirable measures, provided they do not detract from more important steps, but they represent at best palliatives, not protection.

Against an atomic attack such measures are no defense. They may serve at best to reduce the casualty list. Against attack by conventional explosives they are far more useful. But no really heavy and continuous bombardment with conventional explosives is likely against any mainland United States area. The distances from Russian bases are too great.

THE DANGER INCREASES

The threat from atomic attack is, however, a real one, not acute perhaps today, but more dangerous with each passing month, as Russia acquires a stockpile of atomic bombs and the carriers to bring them here. We have discovered civil defense at the eleventh hour. Shelter-building programs, desirable though they may be, could not possibly be completed for months or years. Yet a well-rounded civil defense program must be put into effect immediately.

We must put first things first, and two things above all should have priority.

First, as Dr. R. E. Lapp, atomic physicist, said recently at Colgate University, the only effective atomic defense "involves before-the-fact measures, not after-the-fact relief."

This means a program, not merely a blueprint or a plan, for evacuation of hundreds of thousands of people from our large cities. The immensity of this task is self-evident. Shelter, food, transportation, and a means of subsistence must be provided for those evacuated.

Dispersion is the main defense against atomic attack. For the same reason, we "will begin to be serious about the protection of our cities," in the words of Dr. Lapp, "when we stop cramming more buildings into them."

PROBLEM OF DISPERSION

The reduction of the density of population is an imperative. It does no good to eliminate slums only to replace them with model skyscraper apartments, as New York is doing.

Again, in Dr. Lapp's words, "even if you increase the size of your fire department to 10 times its present size, it will not have much effect on fire damage."

"To be truly effective, before-the-fact measures must be undertaken," he declared. "Such projects as green belts or fire lanes through a city will be most effective in confining the myriad fires which break out simultaneously after a bomb explosion."

If Central Park were extended from the East River to the Hudson, such a fire lane would be far more effective in the saving of life and property than all the shelters and extra fire equipment now planned.

In the same way the recently instituted examination of ships entering New York harbor is largely meaningless and would be farcical if such serious issues were not involved. The much advertised inspection of the Polish liner Batory, during which crews' lockers were searched presumably for the atomic bomb, would have been completely futile had an enemy chosen to use the Batory as a Trojan horse and to conceal an atomic bomb in its cargo.

AN IMPOSSIBLE TASK

Only a complete inspection of the entire cargo of a vessel before it enters port, not after, could hope with certainty to reveal the presence of an atomic bomb in time to prevent catastrophe.

A superficial Geiger-counter search would not necessarily reveal the atomic bomb's presence. Packing crates would have to be opened. All the cargo would have to be removed, obviously a gargantuan and impossible task for our small force of inspectors, one that could not be carried out at sea.

So far, therefore, we have been making gestures, but that is about all. Until a better intelligence system is developed, until a more complete and thorough program for the control, routing, and inspection of foreign-flag ships is put into effect, and until an orderly rehearsed evacuation of part of New York City's population has been conducted, we cannot claim to have reasonable civil defense.

The second basic civil defense problem that must be tackled is the problem of national organization. Civil defense against the atomic bomb is too big a problem to be shouldered by city, State, or section. An atomic catastrophe in New York would require assistance from all neighboring States. There must be an effective Federal organization and coordinating authority, something that does not now exist and apparently is not being planned.

The blueprint for this was laid out in the Hopley report, which was shelved, but the President emasculated the program 2 years ago when he divided various functions of civil defense among some 27 Government agencies.

NO UNIFIED OFFICE

Today, civil defense on the national level is headed by Dr. Paul J. Larsen, director of civilian mobilization for the National Security Resources Board.

The Board itself has been limited by Presidential directions to planning and advisory functions. It is not an operational agency. Dr. Larsen's office is only one small cog in the Board. The level of his office is in no way commensurate with its importance. He has no real authority, a very small budget, and ill-defined responsibilities.

All the major aspects of civil defense should be brought together in one office, which ought to be either an independent executive agency under the President, or a principal division of the Board. The National Civil Defense Office must have authority at least to coordinate State and regional efforts. This may require congressional action, but it must be met. Civil defense must be decentralized in operation and administration, but centralized in policy and planning and coordination.

Until these two problems are resolved, evacuation and dispersion programs drawn up, and a real National Office of Civilian Defense established, there will be no civil defense worth the name.

"Our basic strategy must be to have done our job before the bomb drops," Dr. Lapp has stated. "Any civil defense plan which is based upon after-the-fact relief measures is doomed to failure."

A Vote on the Mails

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHESTER C. GORSKI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 11, 1950

Mr. GORSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by H. I. Phillips from the Buffalo Courier-Express of July 31, 1950:

MUSE, NEWS, AND VIEWS—A VOTE ON THE MAILS

Congress has been forced to schedule a vote August 14, on the matter of bringing the mail box back into American life and restoring the letter carrier to his position as a morale builder. For which three cheers. In the dizzy Washington scene with all its flubdubbery, snafu, red tape, and waltzing in the dark, few things have seemed as incredible as the April blitzing of our once great post-office service. Public indignation has at last resulted in forcing the House to show whether it regards the mail as important.

By a push-button routine the Postmaster General has made the United States mail service a shadow of its old self. That old-time institution, the summer resort postcard, has been getting through by luck only, national love life has been notably slowed up and the order-by-mail routine made a vaudeville gag. It may be for years and it may be forever has replaced the time-honored post office 'Not snow, nor rain, nor heat, nor gloom of night stays these couriers from the swift completion of their appointed rounds." An Administration that has spent millions of dollars for experiments in global economies has repudiated the efficacy of a 3-cent postage stamp.

Congress and the Postmaster General have turned the mail service into a study of tortoise life. The schedule of collection hours on the street corner mailbox has been replaced by a notice "The acceptance of a letter by this box is not to be interpreted as a promise to deliver or as an indication of any intent to deliver. This is purely a prospectus proposition."

The post office window, long the most dependable thing in American life, has become a part-time opening in a deep-freeze unit. If you want to be sure of attention you have to bring your own opener.

By the April order of Postmaster General Donaldson the letter carrier has been seen this summer as infrequently as the milkman. He has become strictly a once-a-day operator, except in some business zones. Post offices have become so jammed with unassorted mail that postal workers detailed to assort it had to be qualified mountain climbers, yodeling as they worked. "Did you get my letter?" has become a query calling only for the reply, "No. What made you think I might?" The greatest mail service in the world has been hamstrung, pulverized, hogtied and left a shambles by any comparison with the past. And not until the other day did Congress get around to scheduling the matter for attention. August 14 is the date. We shall see what we shall see. And we hope we don't have to wait to get the result by mail.

Forty Million Dollars to Northern Wisconsin in Federal Aids

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, to give all people an insight of just how a Congressman can be of help to the folks back home by being on the job, I wish to have printed in the official RECORD a report to the people to this effect. I propose to do this county by county for each of the 14 counties in my district.

The Federal-aid programs outlined below are all sound and needed. I supported all of these aids and had a direct part in formulating laws in Congress which outline these Federal aids for the people back home. All of these aids were drawn up and passed into law during my term in Congress.

On each of these Federal-aid programs I appeared before the proper committee and helped draw up the bills which are now law. After they became law I saw to it that each county back home got its fair share. Many of the applications for these aids were handled through my office. When many of the applications were slow in being approved, as soon as my office was contacted I got positive action.

My office has always been a clearing house for all these projects. When not handled properly your Congressman was the first to hear about it. When slow in being approved, your Congressman was the first to hear about it. When any information was desired, your Congressman has always supplied that information. When push was needed to speed approval, your Congressman was always on the job to give it a push. It has never been necessary during my tenure in Congress for any county, city, or town to send a representative to Washington. All they had to do was to contact me by mail or phone and they got action at once.

In my term as a Member of Congress I receive numerous invitations to travel all over the world at Government expense. I am one of the very few who refused. I turned all of them down. I stayed on the job and worked on the job to get things done. It has never been necessary to censor me to devote full time to my job, because I am always on the job 12 to 16 hours a day. I never took 3 months off from my public job to go around campaigning as some candidates for Congress do. My services are always available. This is why northern Wisconsin got so much with so little effort. Northern Wisconsin would not be in very good shape today without those Federal aids.

Here is how my being on the job has brought huge dividends to the folks in northern Wisconsin. Here is a list of projects and the amount of Federal money for each coming into northern Wisconsin during my term in Congress.

ONE MILLION FIVE HUNDRED THIRTY-FOUR THOUSAND FOUR HUNDRED AND THIRTEEN DOLLARS FOR HARBORS IN NORTHERN WISCONSIN

This is the total sum contributed by the Federal Government during my service in Congress in the Tenth District for rivers and harbors projects. During my tenure I introduced bills so that at the present time every harbor has been or is under consideration and has been or will be approved for work to be done.

Each appropriation act was watched carefully by me to make certain that work was included for our district. The current appropriation act will result in an additional amount of at least $218,900 for our district. The breakdown during my tenure per year for the $1,534,413 already contributed by the Federal Government is as follows:

1943 (laws passed before O'KONSKI's term)	$52,173
1944 (start of O'KONSKI's term)	110,995
1945	153,849
1946	119,433
1947	160,919
1948	153,919
1949	195,899
1950	369,326
1951 (this year's appropriation bill)	218,900
Total Federal aid to harbors for northern Wisconsin during my term in Congress	1,534,413

SUPERIOR HARBOR

During my term in Congress, maintenance work has been done on Superior Harbor in the amount of $920,901, and the estimated expenditure in the present appropriation bill for 1951 is $168,000 for maintenance work on Superior Harbor. Four thousand five hundred dollars as a result of a bill by me will be spent before 1951 for a new survey of needed improvements in the Superior Harbor. Total for Superior Harbor alone during O'KONSKI's term, $1,093,401.

I have introduced and secured the passage of a resolution for the investigation of the need for further new work on Superior Harbor. A public hearing has already been held. The Army engineers advise me that their report will be completed in 1951, following which I will see that it gets in an appropriation bill and later gets an appropriation for the new work needed. I have not yet been turned down on any harbor project I requested during my tenure in Congress.

ASHLAND HARBOR

I have secured the authorization for and the appropriation for the completion of new work on Ashland Harbor to widen the west channel to a width of 750 feet, and the work is now in progress. It is expected it will be completed in 1950 at an estimated cost of $45,000. Maintenance work done on Ashland Harbor during my tenure in Congress totals $29,959. Total I secured for Ashland Harbor, $74,959.

PORT WING HARBOR

I have introduced and secured the passage of a resolution and have secured the passage of an authorization and appropriation for new work on the Port Wing Harbor of widening the channel 50 feet between the piers with a depth of 15 feet and dredging the two inner channels to a depth of 8 feet at an estimated cost of $20,000. The work is now in progress and is expected to be completed in 1950. Maintenance work done on Port Wing Harbor during my term in Congress totals $199,666, with an estimate of $15,000 more for 1951. Three thousand two hundred and ninety-nine dollars was spent for surveys and planning during my term in Congress. Total money I secured during my term for Port Wing Harbor, $237,965.

BAYFIELD HARBOR

I have introduced and secured the passage of a resolution and have secured the passage of an authorization in Congress for proposed improvements on Bayfield Harbor in the amount of $130,000. The improvements proposed consist of extending the city pier and the city breakwater by 118 feet each and dredging in the municipal harbor basin. Besides $5,117 has been spent during my term for planning and surveys for improvements. Total authorized funds I secured for Bayfield Harbor during my term, $135,117.

SAXON HARBOR

I have introduced and secured the passage of a resolution for the improvement of Saxon Harbor and a preliminary report has been turned in. It was sent back to the district engineers for some changes. The proposed work for this Harbor is estimated at $306,000 for new work. I will obtain the authorization for this in the 1951 Rivers and Harbors Act. Approval is too late for this session of Congress. Seven thousand one hundred and sixty-one dollars has been spent as a result of my resolution for surveys and plans on Saxon Harbor. Total planned or spent for Saxon Harbor during my term, $313,161.

CORNUCOPIA HARBOR

I have introduced and secured the passage of a resolution for the improvement of Cornucopia Harbor. The report has been submitted to the Chief of Army Engineers and calls for an estimated amount of $169,500 for proposed new work. I will obtain the authorization for this in the 1951 Rivers and Harbors Act. Maintenance work done on Cornucopia Harbor during my term in Congress amounts to $31,023. Besides, $4,500 has been spent on a survey and planning of needed improvements during my term in Congress. Total planned or spent for Cornucopia Harbor during my term, $205,023.

HERBSTER HARBOR

I have introduced and secured the passage of a resolution for the improvement of Herbster Harbor, and the report is due on this in August 1950. The report is expected to provide entrance piers, dredging and entrance channel, and providing channels in an easterly and westerly direction from the inner end of the entrance channel. It has been difficult to get the Federal Government to undertake new harbor developments in this crisis. I look for favorable action in spite of this difficulty. It must be remembered that according to the rules set down it takes 3 to 5 years to get a new project approved. No Congressman or Senator has ever done it in less time. Herbster is due this year. Six thousand nine hundred and forty-two dollars as a result of my resolution has been spent on surveys and planning for Herbster Harbor during my term. This is the first time the Federal Government has shown interest in a harbor at Herbster. It could not show that interest except for my resolution. The fact that $6,942 has been spent by the Federal Government for surveys and plans shows serious interest and a bright future. Not until I was elected to Congress did the Federal Government show any interest in Herbster Harbor.

SIX MILLION NINE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SEVEN THOUSAND TWO HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-THREE DOLLARS FEDERAL ROAD AIDS FOR NORTHERN WISCONSIN

The postwar Federal Road Aid Act was first passed in 1944, when I was a member of what is now the Public Works Committee. I had a direct hand in drafting this legislation. The distribution of money on a mileage basis rather than a population basis was a hard-fought victory for Members of Congress like myself from rural areas who put up the fight for this provision. Northern Wisconsin benefited much from this provision in the law. Read here what this Federal aid has brought to northern Wisconsin.

Federal aids for roads to Tenth District

Ashland	$1,211,349
Bayfield	497,036
Burnett	46,727
Douglas	1,666,177
Iron	31,266
Lincoln	479,250
Oneida	728,133
Polk	291,274
Price	675,279
Rusk	521,000
Sawyer	368,531
Taylor	193,816
Vilas	140,000
Washburn	87,445
Total Federal-aid highways to northern Wisconsin during my term in Congress	6,937,283

The wide difference in amounts to various counties is not the fault of the Federal Government. The county must act first. Then they go to the State. The State then comes with its plan to the Federal Government for approval. There was no trouble in getting approval at the Federal level. Some counties felt little need for Federal funds or new or improved roads. Hence the difference in figures for counties. It should be noted that as of May 1, 1950, more than $10,838,000 was yet available as unused and unprogrammed funds for the State of Wisconsin. In other words, there was that much more money available to counties in Wisconsin not applied for. This is evidence that the Federal aid was overabundantly available. Federal aid for roads was one of my first and major interests as your Congressman. The fact that more Federal money was available than actually applied for by counties and States is proof that the Federal Government has more than done its part in this respect while I have been serving you in Congress.

FIFTEEN COMMUNITIES IN NORTHERN WISCONSIN IN FEDERAL HOSPITAL PLAN

I have long felt that the answer to socialized medicine was to provide better and more hospital facilities and I have, therefore, supported the Federal Hospital Construction Act. This act was passed during my term in Congress. Under it 15 communities in northern Wisconsin will receive considerable Federal assistance in an outright grant for the construction of new hospital facilities or for the expansion of present facilities. I vigorously supported this legislation and had a hand in formulating this legislation.

The following communities in the Tenth District have received or are approved to receive funds to date under the plan: Osceola in Polk County has been approved for Federal funds in the amount of $57,492. Spooner in Washburn County is approved for a Federal grant of $80,775. Minocqua-Woodruff in Oneida County is approved for a Federal grant of $54,585.

Other northern Wisconsin communities included in the plan are as follows: Park Falls with an "A" priority. Amery, Hayward, Rhinelander, Eagle River, and Merrill with a "B" priority. Medford and Tomahawk with a "C" priority. Superior with a "D" priority. Ashland with an "E" priority. Ladysmith and Frederic with an "F" priority.

Under the Federal public law the Federal Government's share can go as high as 50 percent or as low as 33⅓ percent. The State can exercise its judgment in determining the percentage, and in Wisconsin the Federal share was set at 45 percent for all projects in the State.

In the hospital program the Federal Government's responsibility has been met. It is now up to the State and local communities. I had an active part in formulating and supporting the Federal aid for hospitals program. Continuation of this program can bring a million dollars or more of Federal grants to northern Wisconsin.

PREPARATION FOR UNEMPLOYMENT

For a time after World War II it looked like there might be an unemployment problem. Foresight on the part of Members of Congress like myself wanted in readiness a plan of public works so that we would not be caught napping as once happened. We formulated an advance planning program of Federal money advances to communities to plan for much needed public works.

If the unemployment problem did arise, we were, in addition, ready to pass legislation of Federal grants to the local communities for building of public works such as schools, streets, sewers, city halls, and so forth.

More than 30 communities in northern Wisconsin received a total of $155,945 of Federal money for advanced planning. More applications are pending. Most of the applications were handled through my office.

Applicant	Type of project	Federal advance approved
Jacobs	Water facilities	$500
Mellen	Sewage facilities	2,000
Do	do	2,250
Do	River improvements	2,800
Ashland	School facilities	10,500

Hayward	Sewage facilities	6,300
Spooner and Beaver Brook.	School facilities for school district.	4,834
Spooner	Public library facilities	1,050
Grand total during my term for advance planning of public works.		155,943

ONE MILLION EIGHT HUNDRED SEVENTY-THREE THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED AND FIFTY DOLLARS IN FEDERAL AIRPORT PLAN FOR NORTHERN WISCONSIN

During my term $1,873,550 is the amount of Federal funds allocated for the airports in the Tenth District of Wisconsin which are included in the national airport plan. The national airport plan has been drawn up entirely during my term in Congress. I have worked for and watched appropriations and authorizations to make certain that northern Wisconsin received an equal and just share. Twenty-seven communities in northern Wisconsin are presently included in the national airport plan. Several of these communities have already requested funds. Some have received them. Others have not yet made their applications.

Other communities than those now included may be given consideration by showing local interest in assuming the sponsor's share of the cost and in making application as the plan may be changed from year to year.

AIRPORTS IN TENTH DISTRICT INCLUDED IN FEDERAL AIRPORT PLAN AS OF 1950

ASHLAND COUNTY

Ashland: New site has been selected. Class 3 airport. For feeder-type service. Federal funds requested. Ashland also designated for seaplane base and helicopter service.

Clam Lake: New site not selected. Class 1 airport. Federal funds requested. Airport programed.

BAYFIELD COUNTY

Cable: Presently a class 1 airport. Proposed airport is class 1. Federal funds have been requested. Airport programed. Some Federal funds have been granted.

FOREST SERVICE RESEARCH CENTER, RHINELANDER, WIS.

There has been a long felt need for a forest service research center in northern Wisconsin. After serious study it was decided to locate this center at Rhinelander, Wis.

I appeared before the proper committee to plead for an appropriation for this project. I was successful in getting money to start this center in the fiscal year 1947.

An average of between $30,000 and $35,000 is spent each year by the Federal Government to keep this center going. Total expenditures by the Federal Government for this center started during my term and continued since it was started, $125,000.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION PROGRAM

Electrification of farms and small towns has been among my chief interests as a Member of Congress. Every REA bill got my full interest and complete backing. I fought every attempt to reduce or slow down the REA program in northern Wisconsin. I was always on the side of those who fought valiantly for full-speed ahead on this program. As a result of this effort 10 electric coops received loans totaling $17,003,000 for facilities, distribution and lines. This is over $17,000,000 to the northern Wisconsin REA during my term in Congress. Not only did I work for appropriations for the REA, but on many of the applications for these loans, I had a direct hand in getting approved. So add $17,003,000 to benefits received by northern Wisconsin folks for REA during my term in Congress. Ask the REA officials how willingly and effectively I have been of service to them.

The northern Wisconsin REA electric cooperatives which received loans during my term are as follows:

First. Head of the Lakes Cooperative Electric Association, Superior, six loans, totaling $731,000 for distribution and lines.

Second. Chippewa Valley Electric Cooperative, Cornell, four loans totaling $808,500 for distribution lines and $7,500 for office facilities.

Third. Taylor County Electric Cooperative, Medford, three loans totaling $470,000 for distribution lines.

Fourth. Clark Electric Cooperative, Greenwood, seven loans totaling $1,051,000 for distribution lines and $95,000 for headquarters facilities.

Fifth. Barron County Electric Cooperative, Barron, eight loans totaling $1,734,500 for distribution lines and $10,500 for office facilities.

Sixth. Polk-Burnett Electric Cooperative, Centuria, five loans totaling $1,651,000 for distribution lines and $40,000 for office facilities.

Seventh. Jump River Electric Cooperative, Inc., Ladysmith, eight loans totaling $1,190,000 for distribution lines.

Eighth. Price Electric Cooperative, Phillips, six loans totaling $1,385,000 for distribution lines and $65,000 for office facilities.

Ninth. Bayfield Electric Cooperative, Inc., Iron River, six loans totaling $1,264,000 for distribution lines.

In addition the Dairyland Power Cooperative Dam and auxiliary power facilities on the Flambeau River in Rusk County received $6,500,000. This dam supplies power to the REA co-ops in northern Wisconsin.

REA loans to improve rural telephone service also got my support. Several applications have already been made and action should go along very shortly. This will bring added Federal aid and improved telephone service to remote rural areas.

SCHOOL-LUNCH PROGRAM

Almost $150,000 comes to northern Wisconsin schools as Federal aid for the school-lunch program. Nine years of teaching in high schools and colleges have put me in a position of personal knowledge of the need and the good of such a program. I have appeared each year before the proper committee to get adequate funds for this program. This is another of the good Federal aids that no one would banish. This Federal aid brings $150,000 a year in employment and food to northern Wisconsin folks. I had a most active part in setting up this program and securing enough funds for its operation.

FIVE MILLION DOLLARS IN RFC LOANS TO SMALL BUSINESS

During my term in Congress the RFC has loaned more than $5,000,000 to small businesses in the Tenth District. Every applicant who wrote me got immediate results. Sometimes applicants did not contact me until after they were turned down. Even then I got to work and in most cases succeeded in getting the loan approved.

My offices handled the processing of more than 40 loans. On another 40 loan applications information and procedure were secured through my office. About 50 cases are still pending and securing my help. No small-business man who contacted me was refused action or help on my part. So here we have another five million of Federal money coming to northern Wisconsin folks.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENTS

During all the years the United States of America was at war, northern Wisconsin was one of the few areas in the Nation which did not get or have a major military establishment of some nature.

That condition has changed. During my term a classified military installation is being erected in Polk County at an estimated cost of $1,250,000. This is a permanent installation during peace or war. It will employ during normal times 200 employees—about 100 military and about 100 civilian.

Northern Wisconsin is coming to the front in this recognition. One installation usually brings another. The future in this respect is bright. The point to note is that for the first time northern Wisconsin is recognized.

POST-OFFICE BUILDINGS FOR NORTHERN WISCONSIN

During my term I worked unceasingly to improve the postal facilities of northern Wisconsin. As a result of my efforts, 14 cities in the district are marked and approved by the Post Office Department for new post-office buildings.

Congress was almost ready to vote funds for the construction of these post offices under a public-works program to relieve threatened unemployment in 1948. The unemployment problem never materialized so the program was not brought up for passage.

Tomahawk is on the preferred list for needed improvements. Site for a new post office has already been selected. A new post-office building at Tomahawk is a certainty in the immediate future.

Other cities on the preferred list already marked for new post-office buildings are: Amery, Eagle River, Frederic, Grantsburg, Hurley, Luck, Mellen, Phillips, St. Croix Falls, Shell Lake, Spooner, Three Lakes, and Washburn.

FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION

The Farmers Home Administration to help needy and marginal farms, to encourage farming, has been a pet hobby of mine while in Congress. No agency in our Government is more justified in its existence. Funds for this work were always my deep concern. Being a farmer by background, I understand their problems. My first 18 years were spent on a family owned farm which reared a family of 10 children.

FHA leaders and officers will verify how I have sold its existence to fellow Members of Congress. It was this kind of selling to city Congressmen that kept the program going. Drought loans alone as a result of my bill, the first so introduced, brought $450,000 for farmers stricken by the drought disaster. During my term in Congress, FHA loans to northern Wisconsin farmers exceed the $3,000,000 mark.

It should be mentioned here that when legislation was passed to help drought-stricken farms with soft loans, northern Wisconsin farmers were the first designated by Federal authorities as a disaster area and were, therefore, the first in the Nation to receive this aid. This was directly handled by my office upon application of a county agent.

FLOOD-CONTROL PROJECTS

All rivers which flow into Lake Superior from the counties of Douglas, Bayfield, and Ashland are being investigated as a result of my bills to determine what flood-control work needs to be done on each. These streams include: Onion River, Sioux River, Whittlesey Creek, Amicon River, Brule River, Namadji River, Black River, Middle River, Poplar River, Iron Ore River, White River, and numerous other streams.

In addition my bills resulted in a War Department study on the flood-control needs of the Bad River which floods so seriously at Mellen and Odanah. The Army engineers feel that flood conditions at Mellen can be improved by straightening, deepening, and widening the stream bed and increasing the floodway capacity of several bridges and at Odanah. It may be possible by a combination of diking, filling of low areas, and relocating of some buildings to reduce flood damages.

I am advised by the Army engineers that these two reports will be completed and submitted by August 1950. As soon as they are in and approved, I shall get them in the next authorization act of Congress so that the needed work will be done. All this is the result of resolutions introduced by me and passed by the Congress.

All streams that flow through the Tenth District into the Mississippi via the Wisconsin River and the Chippewa River are now under investigation for flood control and these include the following: East Fork of Chippewa River, Brunet River, Thornapple River, Elk River, Flambeau River, Jump River, Fisher River, and Yellow River, all of which flow into the Chippewa River; Somo River, Spirit River, New Wood River, Cooper River, Prairie River, Pine River, and Rib River, all of which flow into the Wisconsin River. This work is the result of resolutions introduced by me and passed by the Congress.

If it is found after the War Department surveys that any of these are under Federal jurisdiction, I will see that action is taken to get funds for any such project. I have never been turned down yet on any of these bills and requests if, after War Department survey, it is shown that these rivers are or can be placed under Federal jurisdiction. If after the survey and study they recommend funds for projects, I will get these funds for them. In no case has Congress turned me down on any of these projects.

WORK ON BEHALF OF INDIANS

During my term in Congress the Indian population of northern Wisconsin received much attention. Ten bills were introduced by me to improve their conditions and standing. Among the most prominent of these bills are:

First. Bill to give more land to Lac Courte Oreilles Band's Reservation. Passed the House April 4, 1949.

Second. Bill to give more land to Bad River Band. Passed the House May 2, 1949.

Third. To end discrimination laws against Indians. Defeated in House August 1, 1949. It applied only to Wisconsin. Members of Congress want it to apply Nation-wide, but Congressmen from other Indian States are against it.

Fourth. Bill to place Indian reservations in Wisconsin under Wisconsin laws in certain acts. Passed House October 17, 1949.

Fifth. Bill to speed claims of Indians against Federal Government. Passed House June 5, 1950.

Sixth. Bill to appropriate $5,000,000 in Wisconsin to rehabilitate all Wisconsin Indians. Committee approval expected soon.

Seventh. A bill to advance 80,000 dollars Federal money for School of Town of Hunter. Passed and now law. School being built.

There is not a Member of Congress who has introduced more bills for Indian welfare than I have. House action is easy. The Senate not so easy. But I have done my part. No one has ever done more or better for the Indian welfare than I have.

CONCLUSION

This folks, is a repartee to you on my work on your behalf. It is a true report of the highlights of my activities. This is the report I would deliver to you in person if it were permissible for me to come home.

With the present world crisis there is too much for me to do here protecting your interests. Under such conditions I will not leave my post here to go around campaigning. The people want me to stay on the job and I intend to stay on the job.

After reading this report you the folks back home are the only judges as to what you are going to do about it. It is up to each and everyone of you the folks back home.

Hoarding Condemned by Camp Fire Girls—Drive Inaugurated To Secure Pledges Against Hoarding—Camp Fire Girls Will Ask Homemakers To Promise To Purchase Only Normal Everyday Needs of Their Families

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 11, 1950

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Richard W. Blalock, president of the National Council of Camp Fire Girls, has telegraphed the President of the United States regarding the campaign being launched by 360,000 Camp Fire Girls throughout the length and breadth of our country. This patriotic campaign by one of the finest organizations in the United States is of paramount importance. It is with pride that I disclose that the president of this great organization resides at Marshall, Tex., and is therefore one of my constituents.

Mrs. Blalock, the council's Blue Bird leaders, Camp Fire guardians, Horizon Club advisers, and every one of the splendid young girls who are members of the Camp Fire Girls deserve unstinted praise for undertaking this great drive against hoarding. Hoarding in times of stress is the equivalent of giving aid and comfort to our enemy. There is an abundant supply of the necessities of life for us all and the supply will continue to be ample if a few of us do not fill our basements and attics with supplies for which we have no immediate use. As to those items of merchandise which may be considered luxuries, surely our money may be put to far better use through systematic purchase of United States E or other bonds.

In her telegram to the President, launching the "I Won't Hoard" campaign, Mrs. Blalock stated that 360,000 Camp Fire Girls will ask shoppers to sign the following pledge:

Camp Fire Girls, the homemakers of tomorrow, ask you to sign this pledge: "I promise to purchase only what is necessary for the normal everyday needs of my family. I will not hoard such items as sugar, fats, nylons, or canned goods."

This fine group of young American girls will, I know, perform splendidly and spread the gospel of patriotism in every city, town, and village of our country. I know that many other organizations of our young people will join in this campaign against hoarding. I salute the Camp Fire Girls for undertaking this campaign and all organizations composing our patriotic youth who are truly not only the homemakers but the leaders of tomorrow.

I am happy to have the privilege and opportunity of including Mrs. Blalock's telegram to the President in its entirety, as well as the bulletin of the Camp Fire Girls headquarters in New York, outlining the details of the "I Won't Hoard" campaign. The telegram and the bulletin follow:

NEW YORK, N. Y.

President HARRY S. TRUMAN,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.:

I Won't Hoard is the campaign being launched by 360,000 Camp Fire Girls across the country who will ask shoppers to sign the following pledge: "Camp Fire Girls, the Homemakers of Tomorrow, ask you to sign this pledge—I promise to purchase only what is necessary for the normal everyday needs of my family. I will not hoard such items as sugar, fats, nylons, or canned goods." In sponsoring this community service project Camp Fire members are pointing up the organization's Home Craft program which stresses wise buying, and its Citizenship Craft program which emphasizes service to and for the community. Since the founding of Camp Fire Girls in 1910 conservation of our resources and consideration for the needs of others have been two of the most important features of our program. We believe that our members will be able to influence cautious buying habits among millions of people throughout our great country.

Mrs. RICHARD W. BLALOCK,
President, National Council of Camp Fire Girls.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC RELATIONS,
CAMP FIRE GIRLS, INC.,
New York, N. Y., August 1, 1950.

To Blue Bird leaders, Camp Fire guardians, Horizon Club advisers.
From National Department of Public Relations.

Enlist your girls in Camp Fire's newest community service project—the "I won't hoard" campaign. Your girls can do a major job in their community by helping to make their neighbors aware of the need to buy only consumer goods necessary for normal living. With this in mind we have had the following pledge printed:

"Camp Fire Girls, the homemakers of tomorrow, ask you to sign this 'I won't hoard' pledge: 'I promise to purchase only what is necessary for the normal every-day needs of my family. I will not hoard items such as sugar, fats, nylons, or canned goods.'

"——— ———."

We have enclosed 30 of these pledges for you to divide among members of your group. If you need more pledges ask your local chamber of commerce, board of trade, better business bureau, local printers, or any other persons who might be willing to cooperate by mimeographing extra pledges.

Our national president, Mrs. Richard W. Blalock, wishes all of us to give this project our sincere support, especially since conservation of our resources and consideration for the needs of others are two of the most important things a Camp Fire member learns.

We have asked executive directors, presidents of councils where there are no executives, and chairmen of independent leaders associations to get in touch with their mayors, chamber of commerce presidents, heads of the board of trade, and civic and service club officers to ask for their endorsements. We have also requested our executive directors to make arrangements with local merchants for Camp Fire girls to obtain pledge signatures from their customers.

Please check immediately with your executive director, council president, or chairman of your Independent Leaders Association to see what plans are being made in your area. If you are a Lone Leader you will want to get in touch with your own civic authorities before meeting with your group.

Your girls might take turns obtaining pledges in their neighborhood stores. It would be advisable not to have too many girls stationed at one store. Be sure that each girl has a supply of pledges and several sharp pencils.

At the end of a month please send your council a report of the number of signed pledges your girls have collected.

The "I won't hoard" project gives Camp Fire girls an opportunity to show their families and neighbors what is meant by home craft, wise buying, and citizenship craft, concern for and service to the community.

You will discover that "I won't hoard" pledges will make new friends for Camp Fire girls and influence more people in becoming better citizens. We know that you and your group will do an outstanding job in bringing this about.

P. S.—Not a moment should be lost in getting this program under way.

New Look at Statehood

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. L. BARTLETT
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 11, 1950

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Daily News of August 10 commented editorially on Alaska and Hawaii statehood urging prompt action on the two bills which are now pending in the Senate. Under leave to extend my remarks I include that editorial:

Senate Democratic Leader SCOTT LUCAS has come out strongly for the Alaskan and Hawaiian statehood bills.

In a brief speech Tuesday on the Senate floor he underscored one of the many reasons for admitting Alaska to the Union without any further delay.

"From the standpoint of our own defense," he said, "Alaska is in a strategic and a very critical position. Everyone who has talked to the military about the situation, or who knows anything about what is going on in the world at the present time, can reach only one conclusion, which is that Alaska is one of the outposts which will be of extreme importance to the defense of all the States of the Union."

Reminded by Senator KNOWLAND, of California, that Hawaii was equally important to the security of the United States and equally deserving of statehood, Senator LUCAS said he was "just as strong" for admitting the one as the other.

Then he revealed why the two measures had not been brought before the Senate, though they have been approved by the Insular Affairs Committee. He said the Democratic leadership had been told by Senator EASTLAND, of Mississippi, that if either bill were brought up he would try to displace it by pushing the Mundt-Ferguson measure to the front. If that happened, said Senator LUCAS, he feared some Senator might try to attach the civil-rights amendment to the Mundt-Ferguson bill, thereby creating "a difficult parliamentary situation."

Maybe so. But we have an idea that Mr. LUCAS as majority leader can get around the straw-man obstacle in some way, particularly since President Truman's message to Congress makes possible a brand new or revised bill dealing with subversives and internal security, which is the subject of the Mundt-Ferguson bill.

In any event, we hope the Senate majority leader takes a new look at the parliamentary situation and finds a way of bringing these two important statehood bills up for prompt action. The House of Representatives has passed them, both major parties and the administration are for them and now Mr. LUCAS has left no doubt about his stand.

The whole question has been thrashed out thoroughly before the House and the Senate committee. As President Truman has pointedly observed, it will take only 10 minutes to pass these bills.

Marine Corps Reserve Officers Association Calls for Community Employment Plans Now for Reserves Being Called to Duty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 11, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to call to the attention of the Congress a letter sent by one of our former colleagues, the Honorable Melvin A. Maas, a brigadier general in the United States Marine Corps Reserve and president of the Marine Corps Reserve Officers Association to the membership of MCROA.

General Maas has called upon the membership of MCROA to exert every possible effort to back up their fellow Marine Reserves now being called to extended active duty. In his message to MCROA chapter presidents in some 50 cities, General Maas said:

We members of the Marine Corps Reserve who have not been called and who may not be called for some time while the corps builds up its strength in platoon and company officers have a great responsibility to those now being called, particularly the volunteer enlisted Marine Reserve.

I call upon all chapters to spearhead community programs aimed at making certain that these Reservists now being called to duty will receive exceptional opportunities for employment upon their return. Many of the enlisted marines will have no reemployment rights because they are not now working and have no work experience. In particular, we must make certain that no marine wounded in the present conflict shall have any trouble in finding employment upon his return to civilian pursuits. We will not fail our wounded upon their return. But, planning is necessary in advance and each community should consider this matter, not when the men come home but when they are leaving.

We naturally welcome and will solicit the active support of the Reserve Officers Association and the National Guard Association in making this a truly national community endeavor. However, we shall go forward ourselves at once because of the immediate mobilization situation which confronts the enlisted ground reserve and junior combat-experienced officers in the corps.

We have already formed local committees of Marine Reserve lawyers in several cities to handle legal matters for Reserve units called to duty. This work will increase and expand. We are actively cooperating with marine recruiting officers across the country to bring the finest young men into the corps and once again rebuild it into a realistic instant force in readiness. In Seattle this week our Reserve officers worked with the unit being mobilized there for 2 days in handling legal problems. In Fresno, our National Chaplain, Rev. Paul J. Redmond, captain, (ChC), USNR, retired, helped sparkplug a citizen's committee in handling these and other matters for the local detachment prior to its departure for Camp Pendleton, California. In Washington, D. C., the chapter president, Capt. Robert Leonard, has offered all possible assistance to the Fifth Reserve Battalion and has named Maj. Helen Crean as contact with Maj. David Condon's men at Camp Lejeune. He has named Capt. John Pratt as head of a team of lawyers to assist in this work.

First MCROA Chapter to embark on the legal assistance phase of the Reserve mobilization was the Louisville (Ky.) Chapter under the leadership of Capt. Stephen Cisler, chapter president. As other opportunities for service arise in backing up the officers and men who will fill out our Fleet Marine Force to combat strength from its present skeleton force, we shall notify individual Reserve officers as well as chapters.

This message by General Maas is only the latest in a series to MCROA chapters and individual members offering Marine Reserve officers an opportunity of assisting those whose call to active duty has been so speedy.

Let's Take It Easy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 9, 1950

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission of the House to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article by George J. Burger, Jr., which appeared in the Burger Tire Consultant Service Bulletin. Mr. Burger's father is a resident in New Rochelle, in the Twenty-eighth Congressional District of New York:

LET'S TAKE IT EASY

We do not know, any more than you do, what international developments will bring in the next few weeks or months.

But we do know that unless producing and selling businessmen pitch in wholeheartedly to help curb the present wave of hysteria buying, the task of supplying our fighting forces and keeping the country on an even keel is going to be very tough. At worst it may become impossible for Government to conduct even the limited Korean war without controls to check inflation and curb shortages. At best it may become necessary for our industry and others to engage in some sort of voluntary allocations.

There's no doubt that a war-frightened public has gone hog wild. In some cases buying has been so heavy that temporary shortages have appeared on certain tire sizes.

More than this, there have been some disturbing reports about the actions of certain factors within our industry. One, that a certain tire supplier is refusing to sell at least some of his dealers in less than trailer-load lots. Another, that one big auto maker is buying for inventory far above his known immediate requirements. There's no doubt that if we looked far enough we could find some small and large dealers who are thoughtlessly riding the crest of the wave.

This sort of stuff doesn't make sense.

Certainly no secret should be made of the fact that if war with Russia does come there will be tire shortages and rationing. We could be cut off completely from far eastern rubber-producing areas. We haven't enough of a stockpile on hand and we haven't the synthetic rubber producing capacity to support a world war and business as usual.

But at the same time the consuming public—all the way from large corporations to individual car owners—should be impressed with the fact that we aren't yet in such a war. We may never be. Neither have we been cut off from the Far East. Additional synthetic rubber plants are in production. Tire manufacture for peacetime use is running at record rates. Manufacturer inventories are ample. No consumer who really needs tires has been unable to procure them—except where greedy neighbors have commenced hoarding.

More than this, the greater needless buying the greater the pressures on prices. Prices are already up. This means that war charges and daily living costs are going up too. You, the consumer, and we are going to pay for this—not only in daily purchases, but in increased Government deficits and taxation.

You know, there's one thing that Stalin & Co. would dearly love to see—America going into a tail spin on its own initiative. That's what is in the book of Marx. And that is exactly what we are in danger of building up to now.

So, let's take it easy. And let's tell our customers to use their heads. Let's not bring on more inflation, with resultant bureaucratic red tape of controls when there is no major war. Let's use restraint—our men in Korean fox holes will benefit, too.

INDUSTRY REVIEW

Prices up: Tire makers have increased prices on replacement passenger tires by 5 percent, and on replacement truck tires by 7½ percent. Last week prices on original equipment tires were raised from 8 to 10 percent. Prices on original equipment truck-bus tires went up 12½ percent. And prices on original equipment farm implement tires went up 6 percent.

NOTE.—Talk in Washington is that Congress may act on the sweeping price increases that have come about on many commodities since the Korean war started.

Rubber stocks: The United States Department of Commerce reports that May 1950, natural rubber inventories totalled 101,079 tons, as compared with 106,124 tons in April and 111,875 tons in May 1949. May 1950 synthetic rubber stock totaled 74,672 tons, as compared with 83,440 tons in April and 112,739 tons in May 1949. These stocks are less than a 2 month's supply at current consumption rates.

Synthetic rubber operations: Now that Government has decided to expand its synthetic-rubber program, just what is what? Seventy-five percent of the Nation's Government-owned GR-S production facilities are now operating, compared with 63 percent before the expansion decision. One hundred percent of the Government-owned butyl facilities are now active, compared with the former 81 percent. And 82 percent of the butadine facilities are in action, compared with the 69 percent that were active before the order.

Veterans of Foreign Wars Present Protest to Senator Connally Against World Government and Atlantic Union

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks I am including a letter by Clyde A. Lewis, commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, addressed to Senator CONNALLY, chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. The attitude of that great veterans' organization has considerable bearing upon the propaganda now being waged for world government and the Atlantic Union:

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS,
OF THE UNITED STATES,
August 7, 1950.

MY DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: I note by the New York Times of this morning that nine former officials of the Department of State have written you asking your support of the Atlantic union resolution.

On behalf of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, I earnestly request that you give this matter your most serious consideration before acting, and that, unless better arguments than have been heretofore forthcoming are supplied, you refrain from rendering the requested support.

I assure no organization on earth is more anxious to take effective measures opposed to communism than is the Veterans of Foreign Wars. But we are just as concerned to see that in the process we do not give away our national inheritance to the point of impoverishing the Nation and relinquishing the freedom of its citizens.

We are opposed to the resolution of the Atlantic Union Committee for at least three basic reasons:

1. The proposed coalition of nations would not have their military power enhanced as a result of such a union as is proposed. The member nations still would have the same arms and the same manpower as now. Their striking ability could not be increased through a merger of men of all nationalities and languages. And the United States would have entered a body the decisions of which would override those of the executive, legislative and judicial branches of our own Government.

2. The proposed Atlantic union would split the world on a color line, thus affronting nations friendly to us which would not be invited as members. Its establishment would be a signal to Russia to speed up her military production in what could become the greatest arms race in history. The Atlantic union's formation would weaken the structure and the basic conception of the United Nations.

3. The Atlantic Union Committee is the political arm of Federal Union, Inc. Federal Union, Inc., proposes a world currency which could seriously damage the position of the United States in world trade.

We would like to point out that the Department of Texas of the Veterans of Foreign Wars has gone on record as being strongly opposed to world government. And I believe it is only fair to say that passage of the Atlantic union resolution in question would be a significant step by the United States Congress toward a world government.

The fact that support of the Atlantic union resolution was urged on you by nine former officials of the Department of State might seem to indicate the support of that Department. In actuality, as evidenced by the enclosed copy of Assistant Secretary John D. Hickerson's testimony, the Department has not endorsed world federation plans and has said that matters of such import must be decided by the people as a whole.

Also enclosed are these other documents:

A Warning on World Government, reprint of an article appearing in Harper's and written by Senator Warren R. Austin.

World Government—Medicine with a False Label, a speech prepared by the American Sovereignty Section of Veterans of Foreign Wars.

World Government—No Answer to America's Desire for Peace, a copy of a speech delivered at Ellensburg, Wash., by Mr. Frank Holman, former president of the American Bar Association.

We particularly commend your attention to that section of Mr. Holman's speech concerning the effects of international treaties on domestic law.

I deeply appreciate the fact that in these troubled times your hours are more than fully occupied. But we hope you will find the opportunity to study the enclosed material and reach the same conclusion we have.

With every good wish, I am
Respectfully yours,
CLYDE A. LEWIS,
Commander in Chief.

The Road Block in UN

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAY LeFEVRE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. LEFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Mark Sullivan which appeared in yesterday's New York Herald Tribune.

Mr. Speaker, it is high time the administration recognizes the threat of communism not only in the United Nations but throughout this fair land of ours. If the United Nations is going to be effective and the instrument for bringing about lasting peace, we either have to reorganize it without Russia and its satellites or start a new organization made up of those nations which disavow communism. After the sincere and conscientious efforts we have made toward making the United Nations the representative body to bring world peace, it is disgraceful to have the Russian representative, Mr. Malik, delay the progress expected of UN and so disgracefully attack our own Government as the aggressors in the Korean war. Certainly the one-world idea is blasted. Russia has definitely proved she will not work with us so now we must organize the anti-Communist nations in our fight for survival.

Mr. Speaker, there is plenty to do right here at home. Since the Korean war began, reports are that many leading Communists and fellow travelers have turned turtle claiming that they are loyal Americans. These people must be watched. Now is the time for us to clamp down on these Communists and fellow travelers as probably they are just keeping under cover in the expectation that the Red army will some day strike against the United St tes and give the signal for fifth column action on the American home front. We have been gullible dupes. This Congress must act promptly and pass all the provisions of the Mundt-Ferguson Communist-control bill and put real teeth in it. The article follows:

THE ROAD BLOCK IN UN—MARK SULLIVAN OFFERS A REMEDY: A UN THAT EXCLUDES RUSSIANS

(By Mar Sullivan)

The war in Korea, and the wider war in prospect—along with accompanying developments in the United Nations—are at a stage which presents a primary need. The need is to know the objective for which we fight—the objective, that is, other than the military one of victory. In the lack of understanding th s ultimate objective, and keeping it in mind, we are likely to experience again the futility and disappointment which was our fate following the First and Second World Wars.

In the present war we have no recognized and consciously self-chosen objective other than the military one, which is defense against aggression by international communism wherever it attacks—a series of repetitions of Korea. In the sense other than military we have no objective that is equivalent to what military men call over-all strategic concept.

This is not a new phase, it has been our national way. As put by a distinguished military historian, Hanson Baldwin, of the New York Times: "The United States has fought wars differently from other peoples. We h ve fought for the immediate victory, not for the ultimate peace. * * * We have had no * * * well-defined political objective to chart our military action. We fought to win—period."

Yet war should have an objective additional to the military one; there should be a purpose for which military victory is sought. This was emphasized by ex-President Hoover, in a speech he made last month at the dedication of a memorial to William Allen White at Emporia, Kans. Mr. Hoover cited the words here quoted from Mr. Baldwin, and for himself added: "The valor of our men won great battles. But we have won no lasting peace. However, from these sacrifices we can deduce some vital truths. I suggest to you a fundamental truism. War is justified only as an instrument for a specific consequence. That consequence for America was lasting peace."

During any war, lasting peace is a hope and ideal, tacit in the minds of practically all, and sometimes expressed in slogans, such as the First World War's "the war to end all wars." During the Second World War the hope was expressed in another slogan, "One world," the peace was to be not only lasting but universal. Toward the end of the war this ideal was given form; an institution to embody it and operate it was set up, the United Nations.

Presently we recognized that the United Nations would not bring lasting peace; it would not even bring the formal peace settlement with our recent enemies that normally should have followed the ending of the war. The reason was Communist Russia. In conference after conference, within the United Nations and out, Russia prevented peace settlements. We were forced to recognize that Russia did not want peace, indeed that prevention of peace was a conscious purpose it held. It wanted continuation of postwar chaos to the end of promoting communization of the world. Within the United Nations Russia used its membership, not to cooperate for peace but as a means of promoting hate and fear among peoples.

After some 5 years of this there was general recognition that the United Nations, with Russia and its satellites holding membership, could not be an instrument for lasting peace. This general recognition, and a proposed way out, was in a speech ex-President Hoover made last April 27 to the American Newspaper Publishers Association:

"I suggest that the United Nations should be reorganized without the Communist nations in it. If that is impracticable, then a definite new united front should be organized of those peoples who disavow communism. * * * It is a proposal to redeem the concept of the United Nations to the high purposes for which it was created."

Two months after Mr. Hoover spoke, with the outbreak in Korea June 25, the United Nations pulled itself out of futility into vitality. It asked its member nations to join with the United States in opposing the Korean aggression, and practically all except the Communist ones did so. But Russia remains within the United Nations and enlarges the perverse use it makes of its membership. It happens that for August the presiding official of the Security Council is Russian Representative Malik, and he makes use of that position for delay and denunciation. The other members seek some means by which the Russian representative can be checkmated. If they look logic and fact in the face, their problem is how to achieve a United Nations that does not contain Russia.

Statement of Louis Bartlett, Attorney for the Central Valley Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE P. MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, the Honorable Louis Bartlett of Berkeley, Calif., is recognized as an authority on water and power problems in the West.

He recently made a statement before the Water Resources Policy Commission that should be preserved for future reference.

Under unanimous consent I therefore include it as part of my remarks:

MEMORANDUM FOR WATER RESOURCES POLICY COMMISSION, SUBMITTED JUNE 24, 1950, BY LOUIS BARTLETT, ATTORNEY AND FORMERLY LEGAL AND ECONOMIC CONSULTANT FOR THE CENTRAL VALLEY PROJECT FOR THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

A large number of the questions to be answered by your commission cannot be answered without exact knowledge of facts, which, though available, have not been assembled and published.

I

For example: Questions 2, 3, and 4 refer to reimbursable and nonreimbursable costs of projects.

The answer you seek, in the context of the Central Valley project, is extremely difficult. Power is generated at the Shasta Dam by the Bureau of Reclamation and now sold to the Pacific Gas & Electric Co., which resells it over its system. The price received by the Bureau not only pays the cost of the power, but includes repayment over a term of years of the cost of irrigation features. When the west side main transmission lines and lower voltage lines are completed, all cities and irrigation districts in the area will have the right to receive Shasta power at the price the P. G. & E. pays for it near the dam.

The following table, prepared by the Bureau of Reclamation, is a comparison of what all the irrigation districts taking power at one point only, paid the P. G. & E. in the years cited, and what they would have paid the Bureau of Reclamation if its transmission lines were then available. (See vol. XLIV, No. 3, Transactions of the Commonwealth Club of California, November 28, 1949, p. 143.)

Source: U. S. Bureau of Reclamation.

This table shows an average saving of 38 percent by the districts. A number of cities buy power from the P. G. & E. and usually resell it at lower rates than the company's, and make substantial profits, greatly in excess of the taxes paid by the company. These profits are used for rate reductions and local improvements or tax reduction.

It should be possible to obtain from cities, Federal agencies such as the Army and Navy which buy large quantities of power, and public districts of all kinds, the exact amounts they now pay to the P. G. & E. for power, and in what quantities and uses, and to obtain from the Bureau of Reclamation the exact cost to these same agencies of power generated at Federal power plants delivered direct by Bureau of Reclamation lines. With these data it will be possible to answer much more accurately a number of the questions now subject to investigation by the Water Resources Policy Commission. It is information to which the public and Congress are entitled, since Congress provides the money for the project, and the tax payers pay the initial costs, whether reimbursable or not. The table included above is a pattern which gives a clear and understandable idea of these relevant facts.

II

What happens now to the 38 percent average savings that Bureau of Reclamation power will give the irrigation districts?

If we can assume that the P. G. & E.'s operating expenses are not grossly in excess of those of the Bureau of Reclamation, the 38 percent savings go for P. G. & E. taxes, dividends, surplus, and miscellaneous purposes; some political, disguised as donations to charities, Christmas trees, memberships in organizations, etc.

California taxes its public utilities on their real and personal property. It cannot tax the United States Government's lines, so this tax on consumers in California is unnecessary where the Bureau of Reclamation lines are available. These latter, not only pay their own way at the reduced rates they charge, but in addition, reduce the cost of irrigation by ultimately paying off all costs allocated to irrigation features of the Shasta Dam.

Since a constant effort is being made to persuade the public that the construction of transmission lines by the Bureau of Reclamation will hurt the public generally, and the stockholders of the P. G. & E. particularly, and public support is necessary to carry on whatever policies this commission ultimately recommends, it would be helpful if a study were made in the Central Valley showing the growth of electric needs and facilities, both public and private. This will show that additional publicity-owned generating and transmission facilities will not impair the financial status or profits of the privately-owned utility. Actually, increasing power needs in the Central Valley area are so great that both public and private systems in northern California failed to meet the needs in 1948, and rationing practices were put in force by the Public Utilities Commission of California. To keep up with the demand, both the Bureau of Reclamation and the Company are building new installations.

At the hearing before your commission at Berkeley on Saturday, June 24, I asked permission to supplement the written statement left with you by additional comments. I am, therefore, respectfully submitting the following, which relate to point (d) of your assignment, viz: "Desirable legislation or changes in existing legislation relating to the development, utilization, and conservation of water resources."

This memorandum raises these questions:

(a) What water rights become appurtenant to land in a watershed other than that of origin of the water, when brought there by Federal project?

(b) Particularly when the imported water is product of a number of different streams feeding a canal to the land served;

(c) The practicality of transferring control of imported water from the Bureau of Reclamation to the irrigation districts served.

These topics are illustrated by conditions in the Central Valley project of California.

(a) and (b) The main purpose of the Central Valley project of California is to transfer surplus water from the Sacramento River watershed to the southern two-thirds of the Central Valley where there is a water deficiency.

The waters of all of the northern California rivers involved flow into the delta of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers, and will be taken from that point by a high level canal to the Mendota pool on the San Joaquin River, where they will be turned into the channel of the San Joaquin River and flow back north. Coincidentally, the waters of the San Joaquin will be deflected at the Friant Dam and used in the upper (southern) San Joaquin Valley.

Thus, the waters of the Delta-Mendota canal will be a part of the flow of the Sacramento, Feather, Yuba, American and other rivers. If farmers receiving that water acquire a water right, to what water does it attach? In these circumstances, what is the legal relation between the individual irrigator, the district of which he is a member, and the Bureau of Reclamation as to the water received?

(c) At the hearing before the commission a great number of organized groups took the position that the Bureau of Reclamation should have no control whatever over the irrigation districts receiving water from the Central Valley project, even though a portion of the cost was repayable to it, because the districts themselves were ready, willing, and able to pay their share of the reimbursable costs and needed no direction. Among these were the State chamber of commerce, various local chambers of commerce, the Irrigation District Association of California, and many individual irrigation districts. Few, if any, dirt farmers protested.

In the 1930's there were approximately 4,000,000 acres of land in these districts with approximately $100,000,000 of bonds outstanding, which would indicate an average debt of approximately $25 per acre. Over $80,000,000 defaulted as to principal and interest. Those in default took advantage of the Federal bankruptcy law under which the RFC bought the bonds in default and accepted new bonds as security for new loans.

In making these loans the value of the lands and the probability of repayment were carefully surveyed by the RFC and the bonded debt scaled down. The new loans in no case exceeded 75 percent of the outstanding old bonds surrendered, and as little as 6 percent in one instance. The average loan was about 50 percent of the face of bonds then outstanding.

The claim that all irrigation districts are now ready, willing, and able to pay their share of irrigation costs, should be considered in the light of this experience, particularly since all agriculture is now being subsidized by the Federal Government on the parity-price principle and that the so-called Brannan plan which will reduce the present subsidy somewhat is meeting very strong farm opposition in Congress.

These facts are clearly relevant to whether the present moderate controls by the Bureau of Reclamation in furnishing water to irrigation districts should be abolished or transferred to the State of California.

When Loyalty Is Misplaced

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DONALD L. JACKSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Evening Outlook, Santa Monica, Calif., for August 5, 1950:

WHEN LOYALTY IS MISPLACED

In his press conference Thursday, President Truman took note of a suggestion made by Democratic Representative PERCY PRIEST, of Tennessee, who is the Democratic whip in the House. Representative PRIEST had said that Secretary of State Dean Acheson and Defense Secretary Louis Johnson should resign. Mr. Truman said that Secretaries Johnson and Acheson would not resign as long as he is Chief Executive.

The Department of Defense and the Department of State are the two most important agencies of our Washington Government today. The first is headed by a man who arbitrarily stopped construction of a new aircraft carrier, cut the Marine Corps to a skeleton force, refused General MacArthur's request for a larger army in Japan, persuaded the President to veto an addition to the Air Force—and then boasted that we were ready to whip Russia. Yet Secretary Johnson spent $13,000,000,000 on national defense last year, without achieving any kind of war preparedness.

As for Secretary Acheson, he stood out for more than a year against any aid for the Chinese Nationalists, against any arms for the South Koreans, against any defense of Formosa, against any realistic policy of combating communism in Asia and the Pacific. For more than a year he tried to appease the Chinese Communists and opposed every suggestion that General MacArthur be consulted in far-eastern policy. Even today he is standing out against a loan to Spain, and President Truman again is siding with him.

Apart from any question of their individual competence, Secretaries Johnson and Acheson have always pulled in opposite directions and still are in disagreement as to United States policy in Asia. The President has listened first to one and then the other, with the result that our shifting policy deceived the Russians into thinking that this country would not fight for Korea. It was the utter inconsistency of American policy in the Orient, added to our military unpreparedness and the State Department's lack of realism, which landed us in the Korean mess.

Yet President Truman thinks he must go on being loyal to both Secretary Acheson and Secretary Johnson. Presumably he will go on listening to their conflicting counsels and blowing hot with Johnson one day and cold with Acheson the next.

Mr. Truman's code of loyalty, which he learned under Boss Prendergast, might be respected if it acknowledged any higher loyalty, such as that to the national welfare. But in the present instance it reminds us of the equally misplaced loyalty of Secretary Acheson when he said, "I will not turn my back on Alger Hiss."

It is truly appalling that this great Nation must continue to muddle along, through a great world crisis, with Louis Johnson running the Defense Department, Dean Acheson directing foreign policy, and Harry S. Truman trying to fill an office for which he never was fitted.

The Hungry Horse Road

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, many of the dams and reservoirs now under construction or proposed for construction by the Federal Government will cause the flooding of Government-owned lands and improvements administered by Federal agencies other than the agency constructing the dam. It is customary for the constructing agency to plan for replacement in kind of physical improvements which will be submerged or otherwise rendered useless by the reservoir. Providing a duplicate road, camp ground, or administrative headquarters in lieu of submerged improvement may not, however, furnish the same degree of transportation service or allow resources to be utilized to the same extent as was possible with the original improvements.

Following the principle of replacement in kind a narrow road is replaced with a narrow road without regard for possible lack of similarity in the conditions at new and old locations and the impact of additional travel and, consequently, the probable need for higher road standards because of reservoir construction. Roads submerged by reservoirs are often on comparatively flat valley bottom locations where they can be widened and improved at comparatively low cost. Relocation of such roads above reservoir levels often places the road on steep, rugged side hills where subsequent improvement is many times more costly. Consequently, the construction of a reservoir often leads to a triple impact on road conditions, two roads required in place of one in order to serve both sides of the reservoir, costlier betterment because of rougher country and need for better roads because of traffic induced by the existence of the reservoir.

It does not seem reasonable to burden the appropriations of an agency administering Federal lands with the increased cost of road work made more expensive and more urgent because of the construction of a dam by another Government agency. To follow such a procedure will, moreover, mean a long delay in the restoration of adequate transportation facilities for some of the federally administered areas where reservoirs will be built. It may also mean the disruption of local economy.

The latter is a matter to consider in conjunction with the replacement for a road to be submerged by the Hungry Horse Reservoir in Montana. On July 17, Senator MURRAY, speaking from the floor of the Senate, requested that the current appropriation for forest development roads and trails be increased by enough to improve the roads around this reservoir—the road which the Bureau of Reclamation proposed to build on the west side of this reservoir. In opposition to this request several Senators stated that this road cost should be borne by the agency building the dam.

In this instance the Forest Service has a large block of timber adjacent to the new reservoir which, properly harvested, will contribute a payroll to the area of over a million dollars annually. Under the present policy of replacement in kind, the Bureau of Reclamation, which is building the dam, will build a road suitable for hauling only a very small part of the timber that can be harvested with an adequate road. The road as planned will accommodate only comparatively light loads and only during the few dry summer months. Economic utilization of this timber requires the use of large trucks and spring and autumn as well as summer logging. It will be years before Forest Service appropriations for development roads and trails afford the funds that will be needed to improve the narrow road that will be built as part of the Hungry Horse project. Meanwhile the local communities and the State will lose the value of a million-dollar annual payroll and the Government stands to lose by insect infestations and the decreased productivity of the timber lands.

The road that is necessary for the proper administration and utilization of the timber in that area should be built now as a part of the Hungry Horse project and not be left for the Forest Service to do after the dam and reservoir are finished. The same conditions as outlined for the Hungry Horse project will prevail on other similar projects proposed in the West.

This additional road work will not contribute to flood control, power, and irrigation benefits that will accrue from the construction of the dam, and so I propose that this cost will not be a reimbursable item in the construction of the dam.

Since the agency administering the land is required to completely alter its plans for the area when such a reservoir is built, and since the administering agency is best fitted to analyze the effect of reservoir construction on its plans, I propose that the cost of revising these plans, as well as the construction costs be included in the cost of the reservoir and dam.

Mr. Speaker, in order to correct the present situation, I am today introducing H. R. 9427 and I hope the House Committee on Public Lands will call for hearings on this measure as soon as possible.

Outlawing the Communists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY M. JACKSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial that appeared in the New York Times on Sunday, August 13, on the subject, Outlawing the Communists.

The New York Times is noted for its thoughtful editorials, which try to present both sides of an issue fairly. With the growing interest in the internal security of the United States, the arguments set forth in this editorial should be of interest to the membership of the House.

I invite particular attention to the following sentences:

To outlaw the Communists as such comes perilously close to outlawing an idea, and there is no law in the world strong enough to do that. No matter how wicked or objectionable the idea may be, it can be overcome only by other ideas. The founding fathers realized this, and their descendants should never forget it.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that is an excellent statement of a fundamental principle of democracy. I commend this editorial to my colleagues.

The editorial referred to follows:

OUTLAWING THE COMMUNISTS

"Congress should enact legislation to outlaw the Communist Party and all of its affiliated agencies and publications. * * * It is * * * absurd to permit a 'Russian party' on our ballot."

These words pose a question which is increasingly forcing itself upon the attention of all thinking Americans. The words are not those of irresponsible extremists. They come, rather, from Freedom House, a highly respected, liberal-minded body of citizens of various political views but of unified devotion to American democracy.

The problem of outlawing the Communist Party goes to the very roots of our entire political system. It is essential that the answer be found through mature consideration, not through emotional judgment. The peculiar difficulty of this problem lies, of course, in the nature of the Communist Party itself. The primary reason not to outlaw the party springs from the most fundamental principle of the American political system. The freedom of assembly, of speech and of press guaranteed by the Constitution obviously is not merely freedom for those with whom we agree. It is freedom for those with whom we disagree, for the dissenter, the unorthodox, the unpopular. It is freedom to denounce the existing Government and to advocate a peaceful change in the political or economic structure.

On the other hand, it is not freedom to commit or promote sabotage or sedition or to attempt to overthrow the Government by violence. Nor it is freedom to assist our enemies in time of war. But a good argument can be made that if any of those things is done, there are ample laws (perhaps with a few minor additions) to protect the integrity of the United States. Any action of treason, or espionage, or sabotage, or violence, is punishable under existing law. In this way we are protected against Communist action. But to outlaw the Communists as such comes perilously close to outlawing an idea, and there is no law in the world strong enough to do that. No matter how wicked or objectionable the idea may be, it can be overcome only by other ideas. The founding fathers realized this, and their descendants should never forget it.

By attempting to legislate against the party as a whole it would appear that we negate the principles of a liberal democracy; we deceive ourselves into thinking that we have added to our own armor; we take a long step toward the very totalitarian danger from which we are trying to protect our country and we do not actually eliminate a single Communist; we merely drive him underground, where he is harder to find and to watch.

Against these arguments we submit that there is no longer any doubt that the Communist Party follows the policy of the Russian Government, rather than our own, and that it aims at the overthrow of democratic government, either through internal pressure or with Russian assistance. The recent decision of the United States court of appeals affirming the conviction of 11 Communist leaders, noted that "the violent capture of all existing governments is one article of the creed of that [Communist] faith, which abjures the possibility of success by lawful means." In the light of this decision, it would certainly not be illogical to declare the party outlaw. As Justice Jackson said in a recent opinion, "Conspiracy, violence, intimidation * * * are all that keeps hope alive in the Communist breast."

It was, we believe, President MacCracken who advised the girls in a graduating class at Vassar to "keep an open mind, but not so open that your brains fall out." In our pursuit of the true essence of freedom at a time like this we find ourselves much in danger of having it happen to us.

Yet for the reasons given here it seems to us that the course of wisdom is to defer action at this time. The issue can be solved pragmatically. If and when it becomes evident that order cannot be maintained without outlawing the Communist Party, then we shall support the executive branch of the Government in taking that step. We hope that time will not come. But if it should, such action would not then be in conflict with Mr. Truman's words, which we endorse, "It would be tragic in the highest degree if we were to frighten ourselves into destroying those very liberties which are the basis of our moral leadership in the struggle for peace."

Bunk

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the oft-repeated statement made by the administration's spokesmen, in substance and to the effect that all who venture to criticize any administration suggestion or program give aid and comfort to Stalin is nonsense—a thinly disguised attempt to intimidate, to stifle criticism.

The Saturday Evening Post characterizes the attempt in this way—I quote:

WE CAN'T SELL OUR IDEALS ABROAD IF THEY DIE AT HOME

Hardly had the Korean incident settled down to the status of normal war news when Senator LUCAS, of Illinois, made in the United States Senate a remark which represents one thing that we hope will be avoided for the duration. Senator TAFT had urged the resignation of Secretary of State Acheson on the obvious ground that events had cut the heart out of the Acheson policies. LUCAS' comment was that TAFT'S speech gave aid and comfort to Stalin, and there should be nothing but unity from now on.

The public and Members of Congress will have to be on the alert lest present events provide the opportunity for closing the book on the blunders of an administration which made this Red thrust inevitable. Unity is all very well, but a group of politicians who messed up a peace the way the Truman-Acheson policy makers have done will bear watching as they try their skills in a new field. If it is to be considered immoral to criticize the man who wouldn't defend Formosa 24 hours before President Truman ordered that such a defense should be set up, it is difficult to see what area for free discussion remains. Freedom of criticism is now more important than ever, but it will take stout men to defend it.

The Truman administration will be sorely tempted to use the fracas in Asia as a pretext for pushing all sorts of socialist planning and governmental boondoggling, on the theory that it is needed for national defense. As the Wall Street Journal warned on the first day of the Korean incident, "National defense in the lexicon of Washington means more government regulation, more government control over the economy and over the people. Any man who now speaks up for economy or freedom from controls can have a shooting war thrown at him." Senator LUCAS set the pitch on the very first day.

Another thing we ought to be thinking about is political warfare, whether the war remains cool or gets hot. We must be far clearer than we have been in explaining what we will settle for. "Unconditional surrender" convinced the Germans and Japanese that for them it was victory or destruction. In Russia and its satellites there are millions of people who regard war as the one hope of liberation. Millions of Russians felt that way about Hitler's invasion of their country in 1941. At least two Ukrainian armies went over to the Germans in the first few weeks, and more would have followed had Hitler paid any attention to political warfare. Why must we wait for a general war before making the American position more attractive to outsiders?

Up to now, evidence of confidence in our own way of doing things must have come through only dimly to the Orient. Our diplomacy has been party to betrayals and intrigues with Communist infiltrators. Almost at the hour of the strike in Korea, American officials were assuring reporters that Korea was not our baby. When we propose economic assistance to backward areas, it is not by means of the tried American way of private investment, but via a gigantic boondoggle sifted through the United Nations bureaucracy. The peoples who have run under Stalin's umbrella have not done so from love of communism, but from fear that they will be abandoned. President Truman's forthright act did much to restore the prestige which Roosevelt and Acheson had done so much to shatter. But not even MacArthur and a flock of B-29's can keep hope in free America alive in the world if liberty and individual enterprise are assassinated here at home—by the same breed of planners and stuffed shirts who have done so much to murder them abroad.

It Is the Duty of Every Citizen To Be Vocal as Well as Patriotic in Times Such as These

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. JENISON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. JENISON. Mr. Speaker, the responsibilities of the perilous times in which we live must be shared alike by officials of the Government and private citizens for a satisfactory solution can come only from a mutual understanding of the situation. I have received a letter from a constituent expressing a viewpoint deserving consideration by the Congress. Under permission granted by the House, I am including the text of his letter in the Appendix of the RECORD. The writer, Mr. Joseph E. McNaughton, is publisher of the Effingham (Ill.) Daily News, executive of a radio station serving the same area, and an informed student of public affairs. His letter follows:

EFFINGHAM DAILY NEWS,
Effingham, Ill., August 7, 1950.

Hon. EDWARD H. JENISON,
Paris, Ill.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN JENISON: Since I believe it is the duty of every citizen to be vocal as well as patriotic in times such as these, I want to point out a situation which worries me.

American troops are fighting on the Asian land mass. I wonder if this is the smart way to fight Russia. Russia can use hundreds of thousands of satellite troops to bleed us in an Asiatic land war.

I am strongly of the opinion that we must be very careful not to permit Russia to bleed us while fighting Russian equipped satellite troops who are inflamed with revolutionary verve.

It seems to me the best policy is to prepare with all posisble speed and vigor and then to fight more or less the type war the English fought against Napoleon. Sort of a low manpower loss perimeter war. While we are fighting the perimeter war I suggest we send highly trained secret military, espionage, and sabotage agents into enemy lands, and broadcast propaganda to enemy peoples on a great scale.

I'm not a bit sold on receiving revolutionary Asia on the point of our lance in enormous, sanguine, close range Verduns.

Far better for us I believe to produce military supplies in vast quantities and using such places as Japan and Formosa as bases, blast the Russian, Chinese, and so forth, factories and cities into ruins with air power.

A war which finds our infantry fighting Russian mercenaries and not bombing the factories in Manchuria which supply the Russian infantry strikes me as asinine, and the very reverse of the type war we should be fighting. If we must pit our manpower against the Asian hordes, for God's sake let's bomb hell out of the factories which are supplying the enemy.

Thanking you for your indulgence.

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH E. MCNAUGHTON,

Farce of Soviet Collaboration Leading United States to Global War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 14, 1950

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Boston Sunday Herald of August 13, 1950:

FARCE OF SOVIET COLLABORATION SEEN LEADING US TO GLOBAL WAR

(By Jan Ciechanowski)

Wars are not won by military effort alone. The United States won the last world war not only because its Army, Navy, Air Force, and war production were powerful, effective, and perfectly coordinated. The American victory was also largely due to the fact that, while hostilities lasted, its foreign policy was likewise coordinated and consistent with its war effort.

While the shooting war lasted, it would have been unthinkable for the diplomats of the two fighting camps to hold joint conferences even for the purpose of mutually complaining to one another of any single aggression launched by any of their country's allies.

However insistently we stress the official version that the war in Korea is only a clash between the aggressive North Koreans and a United Nations police force, we know that, in reality, it is a shooting war between the Soviet-led forces of communism and the American-led forces of western democracy.

In the light of this fact, the current meeting of the UN Security Council, presided over by the delegate of Soviet Russia—the power behind the Korean aggression—appears somewhat incongruous.

We know that the North Koreans are entirely armed, equipped, and at least partly commanded by the Soviets. We have reason to expect that, when the tide of battle turns in favor of the American troops, Communist Chinese reinforcements, likewise armed and commanded by the Soviets, will enter the fight against the American UN forces.

Notwithstanding these circumstances, the American Government is still acting as if it believed that the Soviets might be swayed by diplomatic arguments at the United Nations Council and influenced to change their policy of world domination to one of collaboration for a one-world peace.

Surely, in the face of the record, such a hope appears to be unfounded. From the outset the Soviets have almost completely stalemated the UN. At the UN and at other conferences they managed to prevent the United States of America from achieving any of its major postwar policy aims such as the conclusion of peace treaties with Germany, Austria, and Japan.

UNTENABLE SITUATION

They brought about the partitioning of Germany, Austria, and Korea. They created an untenable situation in Trieste and in Korea. They have violated practically every clause of every treaty they ever signed. They have never ceased to attack and to vilify the United States of America in their speeches, their press, and in their skillfully conducted propaganda.

They have caused American diplomatic officials to be insulted, arrested, expelled, and restricted in the performance of their normal duties in Soviet-enslaved, satellite countries. They are now working to turn the Asiatic peoples against the United States of America and its allies. They have succeeded in dividing the world, which was to have been a one world of peace, into two opposing worlds of communism versus democracy.

To continue to ignore the present cleavage of the world and the growing menace of the ever dynamic Soviet policy can only lead to disaster. To allow the Soviets to misuse casuistic and parliamentary dilatory methods in order to prevent the UN Council from performing its duty, while American soldiers are fighting and dying in a war launched and directed by the Soviets, does not appear to make sense.

TWO AXIOMS

Two axioms stem from logic and history, namely, that once hostilities have started, it is futile to count on the effectiveness of diplomatic methods that have failed to prevent them and, that in the course of a conflict the side whose troops are retreating can hardly expect to obtain fair terms of peace by negotiation.

One might also add that, while a conflict is actually in progress, diplomatic moves intended to placate the enemy are doomed to failure. For instance, the United States of America could not seriously hope to placate the Soviets by not opposing the admission to the UN of Communist China.

The Soviets would certainly interpret such a move as a sign of weakness and as an attempt at appeasement, while American prestige would be lowered in the Far East and, particularly, in Indochina, the Philippines, and Japan and among the European allies of the United States of America.

LIKE IT OR NOT

Whether we like it or not, in Korea the Soviets have challenged the United States of America and not the UN Their chief aim in returning to the UN Council after a 7 months' long walkout is to stall the Council's work until the UN police force is thrown out of Korea. Their second more far-reaching aim is to show their power to the nations they are trying to draw away from American leadership by intimidation.

Their third aim is to probe American determination by means of direct challenges, in the hope that they will succeed in demonstrating the weakness of American policy, should the United States of America fail to take up their challenge.

Surely it is time to face the fact that the world is divided and cannot be united by using defensive diplomatic means. It is time to realize that there are in existence two rival international organizations: the UN, still ready to follow the American lead, and the Sovietic Cominform, the international branch office of the Moscow Communist Vatican.

The record shows that the UN can only function on the portion of the globe still free from Soviet domination and, even there, only when the Soviets do not take part in its meetings.

The Soviets are certainly not anxious for western democracies to collaborate in their Cominform in the shaping of a Communist world. On the other hand, the American-led western democracies still appear to regard the presence of Soviet Russia in the UN as indispensable to its functioning in the task of working out and of defending the democratic way of life in the portion of the world still outside the iron curtain. We have thus reached a supreme paradox in statesmanship.

The time appears to be ripe for taking up Herbert Hoover's suggestion and either finding the procedural way to expel the Soviets as an aggressor power from the UN or to set up a new international organization without them on truly democratic lines. It is urgent to do so while American leadership, coupled with the growing danger of Soviet aggression is still sufficiently potent to convince the American-led nations that their security and the survival of democracy make it imperative.

To continue the tragic farce of Soviet collaboration allegedly for peace and democracy in the present UN and to pursue a policy still on the defensive in the face of the Soviet challenge, is the surest way of drifting into another war.

Diplomatic Blunders in the Far East

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD R. FORD, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks, I am referring to various editorials from the July 24, 1950, issue of Life magazine.

No one should object to sound criticism or an evaluation of their past actions. Only the weak, when previous mistakes are more obvious than ever, hide under a self-preservation smoke screen and say, "This is no time for bygones."

Ever since the Soviet aggression into South Korea, the Democratic administration leaders have been wanting the public to forget the terrible diplomatic blunders of the State Department in Asia and the Far East. Fortunately the American people, through editorials such as those in Life magazine, are being told the truth. The full and complete truth of our Pacific stupidity may hurt the "let the dust settle" policy makers of the State Department, but the full and complete truth as to why we have lost China and why we are currently fighting a war in Korea will be helpful in setting a proper course in the months ahead.

The Life magazine editorials of the afore-mentioned date demand the resignation or dismissal of Acheson. If Secretary Acheson does not publicly disavow his previous China and Pacific policies, I likewise believe he should resign. If Mr. Acheson is now convinced of the fallacies of his underlings, those who assisted in setting the bankrupt Pacific policy, and will renounce straightforwardly their views, then he is qualified to remain in the President's Cabinet in the months ahead. However, if Mr. Acheson still believes in such previously discredited theories for combating Communist influence in Asia, and is only standing by till we win in Korea, then he should leave his present position of responsibility. This is no time for half-hearted cooperation. Either Mr. Acheson is wholeheartedly opposed to Communist and fellow-traveler policies in the Far East, and if so he should publicly renounce all past views, or he should step aside for another who will do more than acquiesce by silence.

In the newspapers for August 8, 1950, that so-called expert for the Far East, Mr. Owen Lattimore, urges that Communist China be seated in the United Nations. This is the same tune played by Joe Stalin and the Russian delegate to the United Nations, Mr. Malik. Birds of a feather seem to flock together.

In closing let me compliment the editor of Life magazine for discussing frankly matters which too long have been glossed over and covered up by the administration leaders.

Advice to the North Koreans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD O. LOVRE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. LOVRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I want to call the attention of the Members of this body to the following statement sent to me by Mrs. E. C. Slocum, of Mound City, S. Dak., for the enlightenment of the North Koreans:

You poor misguided brown brothers. You let the Russians lead you into killing your brothers of the South. All they want is to have you kill and be killed so they can come and live in your homes and take your land and make into slaves to work it your women and children. When it is too late, your spirits will look down and see this, but you cannot come back to make it right, for you have heard and minded the Russians now, and that is why you must mind them forever.

The Spanish Question

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, the viewpoint of one of the foremost Catholic priests in my district on the Spanish question has been ably presented in a letter written by Msgr. Vitus Stoll, of Creston, Iowa, to the editor of the Des Moines (Iowa) Register. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include Father Stoll's letter:

HE THINKS SPANIARDS HAVE MORE FREEDOM

To the EDITOR:

The Franco question seems to be fast drawing to a close. Prepare to weep, ye editors of the Register, who have coddled Russian communism for 25 years and bewailed the "tyranny" of Franco.

The Spanish question unleashed a great deal of anti-Catholic prejudice, carefully cloaked behind a pretended love of popular freedom. No doubt the Spanish people have more true freedom now than under the brutal republic that did not hesitate to shed blood for the sake of interests that had no connection with any particular form of government Spain might have. Lodgeism, syndicalism, socialism, communism, liberalism, proletarian lust for power, sectarianism, all were clamoring for the death of the Catholic church. Neither age, nor sex, nor God's law received any consideration. Eleven thousand clergy and religious were slain in cold blood. * * * but it is to no purpose to rehash the lurid story. The so-called republic died the death it deserved. Let the coddlers of communism mourn, the rest of us thank God that we still have a foothold for freedom there.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Another step, of course, remains to be taken before the problem is completely disposed of. Ambassadorial relations must be restored. There should be little difficulty. We have chosen to hold our ground against Moscow from now on. It will be a costly and deadly affair, thanks to the Communists, fellow travelers, pinks in pulpits and editorial chairs, Russia's friends in the State Department, all of them will continue some show of resistance till the very end.

But how is it that President Truman did not see the light all these years and insist on leaving undisturbed the settlement Roosevelt had made of the Spanish question? May not it be that nature denied Mr. Truman any flicker of the statesman's vision, and imparted to him only the short sight of the politician? He may have deemed it smart politics to play up to Mrs. Roosevelt, who herself deemed it smart to play along with leftists, religious bigots, and doctrinaire editors.

COMFORT TO RUSSIA

Mr. Truman should have seen that such people eventually gave aid and comfort only to Russia. At last he sees it now to his humiliation, and the humiliation of his Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, whom he even went out of his way to belaud as the greatest Secretary of State since the days of Charles Evans Hughes. Not such as he were a Hull, a Marshall, a Stettinius, a Byrnes, who, one by one, found no good purpose and no honor in continuing to serve him.

Now that the dead bodies of American soldiers are being brought back, the people may yet arise in wrath and demand to know, why all this stupidity, blindness, graft, waste, and unpreparedness in the face of rampart surging communism.

VITUS STOLL.

CRESTON, IOWA.

Props Under the Economy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT B. SCUDDER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. SCUDDER. Mr. Speaker, for many years when I was in the California Legislature, I could turn to the pages of the Petaluma Argus-Courier to read very discerning comments on the news of the day. In Congress I have continued to follow the editorial columns of this newspaper. Under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include in the RECORD an excellent editorial on the Nation's economic situation. It was written, I presume, by John A. Olmsted, publisher of the Argus-Courier, and appeared in the August 4, 1950, edition of that newspaper.

PROPS CAN'T SAVE US FROM ULTIMATE COLLAPSE

We have knocked the New Deal and the Fair Deal to a fare-thee-well for several years now and have seen no good in them. The trend has been in the wrong direction and we have tried to point out the fallacies of most of the New Deal reasoning.

There is one effect of both of them, however, which seems temporarily to have created a good effect.

This effect is pointed out by Fortune magazine which says:

"It may well be that the 1932 style of depression has become a political impossibility. Government is now the employer or purchaser of nearly one-quarter of the goods and services produced by the United States economy. In the other three-quarters of the economy—through credit, tax, and monetary powers, through labor and welfare legislation, through subsidies, guaranties, and controls of one sort or another—Government has a great deal to say about what goes on. In all this apparatus there are obvious elements of built-in stability for the economy."

In other words the Government, with the powers it has taken unto itself, can prevent a depression or control the economy to the extent that no incipient depression can become disastrous, at least for the time being.

This is accomplished by putting props under the weak places, just as we might put props under the collapsing portions of an old house.

These props keep the economy going until the elements which have tended to destroy the whole structure can be to a certain degree controlled. We can still live in the old structure.

These props however, lead us into very dangerous positions. No prop can strengthen an old house to the point that the house will be as good as new. But we get the idea that we are safe as long as we prevent this or that segment of the economy from collapsing.

Fortune goes on to say that there are "some dangers to the mainsprings of the economy. Here it is the trend rather than any very palpable damage to the business mechanism that is disturbing."

In other words, Fortune takes a roundabout, highfalutin way of saying that we can stop a depression by giving the economy a shot in the arm once in a while.

The magazine goes on to say that an economy that is 25 percent government can work, at least for a time, and work very well. But it looks with misgivings upon the supposition that, because this 25 percent control works for a time, we can go on up the control ladder to 30 percent or 50 percent and be assured that that percentage will work, even for a short time.

Yep, we can prop the old house from time to time and still make it livable for a time. But it isn't safe to count on the old house to suffice for the kids when they grow up.

That's what's the matter with the New and the Fair Deals. They figure on the props for the time being—especially at election time, and ignore the future consequences.

Some day this old economy of ours is going to collapse like the deacon's one-horse shay, if we don't quit depending on props to keep it from collapsing.

Every time we use a prop on it we go deeper and deeper into debt and it costs more and more to keep the old structure from going to pieces. So we pile debt onto debt and cost onto cost without stopping to think where such a course leads in the end.

Fines and Jail Sentences Under the Brannan Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I have just received a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Brannan, criticizing me for a speech I made over 5 months ago which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and then reprinted to meet the demand of Members who wanted extra copies of it. Mr. Brannan advises me now that he is "both surprised and alarmed to discover" that my speech pointed out that the so-called Brannan plan bill, S. 1971—introduced by Senator ELMER THOMAS of Oklahoma—contained 15 pages of penalties ranging from fines to jail sentences for those farmers who failed to keep books according to the directives of the Secretary of Agriculture or who made false reports or records. The penalties vary up to $1,000 in fines and up to 1 year in jail, or both.

Mr. Brannan advises that these provisions were put in the bill to reduce penalties ranging from fines up to $10,000 or 5 years in jail, or both, which would be applicable under general statutes already on the books, to the operation of the so-called Brannan plan program were it enacted into law.

The Secretary inadvertently has let the cat out of the bag.

First, he concedes, whether he intends to do so or not, that drastic fines and jail sentences would have to be in the law to make his plan operate.

Second, he discloses that he has not studied the matters of fines and jail sentences, or he would know that S. 1971, the so-called Brannan plan bill, states in the penalty section that—

> The remedies and penalties provided in this title shall be in addition to and not in substitution for any of the remedies or penalties under existing law.

In other words, this bill, instead of reducing penalties, confirms existing penalties and adds new ones.

Third, the bill creates a new crime in America, the failure of farmers to file reports, which the Secretary of Agriculture under the bill may prescribe as he pleases.

I have searched Mr. Brannan's speeches, and nowhere do I find that he has ever mentioned these drastic penalties, either those in the bill or those already on the statutes which he now reveals would be applicable.

Certainly Mr. Brannan would not want me to be a party in any conspiracy to keep the facts from the American people generally and our farmers specifically.

The Secretary makes a plea for cooperation and fair play in the consideration of farm programs. With that plea I am in hearty accord. If I have stood for one thing more than another during the time I have been in Congress, it is that agricultural legislation should be kept out of partisan politics. I have served under both Republican and Democratic Secretaries of Agriculture, from W. M. Jardine to Clinton P. Anderson. Every one of these men viewed farm questions from the standpoint of the national interest and kept them out of partisan politics. They worked with Republicans and Democrats, with farm organizations and farmers in trying to reach a solution of the vexing problems of agriculture. That, I am sorry to say, cannot be said for the present Secretary.

For 24 years I have served on the House Committee on Agriculture under both Republican and Democratic leadership. Never during that time has there been partisanship on that committee. There have been differences of opinion, yes, but politics has not entered in. That is the case today under the leadership of our able and distinguished chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina, HAROLD D. COOLEY.

I am anxious to cooperate with the Secretary of Agriculture. I know that the leaders of the farm organizations are anxious to cooperate. I know that Members of Congress of both parties feel the same way. But there cannot be this cooperation unless Secretary Brannan is willing to treat agriculture and agricultural legislation as his predecessors have done—as an economic and not a political problem. Whenever Secretary Brannan is in the frame of mind to consider it from that standpoint, he can count on my hearty cooperation.

Red Russia Really Dumb—Not Clever

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Bill Cunningham, from the Boston Sunday Herald of August 13, 1950:

RED RUSSIA REALLY DUMB—NOT CLEVER

(By Bill Cunningham)

The hope was expressed in this space last Sunday that Russia would be charged unequivocally, by name, and without further delay with international crime in the case of Korea and that unless her agent, Mr. Malik, reformed in his parliamentary conduct of the United Nations Security Council meetings, that he be challenged and forced to surrender the gavel. Part of that hope was realized this past week, when both the United States and British representatives spoke Russia's name for the first time, and if they didn't charge Russia with starting the war in the East, they did charge Russia can stop it if she will.

So far as Malik goes, he's still going—after 2 weeks. By what even the President of the United States has now publicly denounced as a filibuster, this latest of the moon-faced Muscovite flap-jaws has managed to keep the world's police body from considering anything. If the issues weren't so serious, the entire performance would be comical.

The Council has been barred from considering the questions the whole world waits to hear, because Malik refuses to give his decisions, as presiding officer, over whether the representative of the Korean Republic, meaning South Korea, can take his place at the table. The question, with deadly persistence, keeps being brought up by Dr. T. F. Tsiang, the representative of Nationalist China—a gentleman who's anathema to Malik, anyhow.

Dr. Tsiang keeps arising to a point of order and demanding a ruling. Sometimes he does it in no more than a half dozen words. The Russian then explodes a speech, seldom shorter than 45 minutes, in which he abuses the United States, Nationalist China, goes into a lot of meaningless gibberish concerning the history of the point, or even yields the floor to other orators.

But he won't render a decision. Hence, there's been no business, and there may be no business until his turn in the chair ends on midnight of August 31. In line with the suggestion made here, the other delegates, in secret meeting and open discussion, have discussed at least three ways of dispensing with Malik.

One of these would be to amend the rules. The second would be to boycott any further meetings while he is presiding. The third is to demand a special session of the United Nations General Assembly and take the issue of Malik to it. It is believed at the site that any of these methods might work, but it likewise considered that the precedent established might be dangerous, that any of these moves could be called undemocratic and that, as matters stand to here, Malik's malingering isn't too important anyhow.

It's not too important, unless Russia has further aggression in some other quarter immediately in mind, because the Korean action is already under way, its legality within the framework of the United Nations already established, the call has already gone forth for as many troops as the member nations can spare, and there's nothing further for the Security Council to do, but stand to its guns.

FROM CENTURION TO CLOWN HIS ROLE

Unless there's something more to the Malik performance than he's indicated to date, he's merely turning from a forbidding into a comical figure. The Kremlin's centurion is becoming the Lake Success clown. When he came roaring back to take over, there seemed to be two dread possibilities. One was that he might be moving in to block unified action against the next Red strike—possibly against Formosa, where we're out on a limb. This he could do by hurling the Russian veto, thus cutting us loose on our own.

The other possibility was that Russia might be planning, through him, to curse us all for the record, withdraw from the United Nations for good, and consider herself provided with full pretexts for war. We can still keep our fingers crossed, but 2 weeks of the gentleman's allotted four have elapsed.

There are no reports of new action in the vicinity of Formosa and, so far at least, Mr. Malik has shown no signs of walking out. Rather, he seems determined to sit it out.

The various experts are now trying to figure what the Russian reasoning is, and the nearest to unanimity is that Russia may feel she's profiting vastly from the Malik tirades against the United States delivered on the soil of the United States. These are being beamed all over the Asiatic world, and their impact as propaganda cannot be measured from this distance.

Following the old sports proverb, "Never underestimate the opposition," we'd be foolish not to grant that this impact may be terrific. There seems to be just as good a chance, however, that the Russians have no very real idea of what they're doing, that they're simply caught on a foolish spot with, as the Hollywood phrase is, egg on their chins, and that they're doing what they're doing because they don't know what else to do.

The popular theory in this country is that the Russians are far cuter than we are, that they are equipped with a diabolical cunning that enables them to outfigure, outmaneuver, and outtrick us every time, whereas the record clearly proves them utterly and stupidly dumb. They haven't gained anything they haven't been handed, and they'd have a lot more now if they really had been smart.

The faithful here have heard that expounded from this pulpit steadily since 1945, 1946, and 1947 when this correspondent had the chance, first to study their armies in Germany, and later their negotiators at San Francisco, Paris, etc. Now others are newly publicizing the same conclusions. From Germany, recently, the crack Associated Press correspondent, West Gallagher, summed up the serious and damaging diplomatic mistakes the supposedly smart Russians have made in Europe ever since the end of the war.

He likened their record to Hitler's, recalled that when the Nazis were rolling, Hitler's slightest move was awesomely regarded by us as a stroke of malvolent genius. The Nazis were supposed to have the best propaganda, the most miraculous spies, the most efficient general staff, the most ruthless and effective planning. When, however, the show was over, captured records and other irrefutable evidence revealed that Hitler was a vain, misinformed little man, and that most of the rest of the machine was more horrendous in our imaginations than it was in truth.

If Russia had really been smart in Europe, she'd have most of it by now. So far as Germany's concerned, if Russia had cooperated with us, instead of pulling back and drawing a deadline through the middle of Berlin, she'd have veto power now in the handling of all Germany, including the vital Ruhr, which she so burningly covets. But Russia would not cooperate in the allied control council.

COMMUNISTS IN GOVERNMENT

Communists were in the governments of France and Italy and were integrated into every labor union in Europe. Cleverness, instead of stupidity, would have called for disarming cooperation instead of snarling obstruction in all these key places. Instead of winning friends and stealing power, as they easily could have done, they merely aroused opposition, forced coalitions in defense of the common cause, and lost out completely, with Russia calling all plays from Moscow.

Their most monstrous blunder of all was Foreign Minister Molotov's walking out of the founding meeting of the European recovery plan in Paris. This cost them any chance to help regulate the ERP with consequent credit to themselves. This left us all the credit, and the full chance to combat communism by the elimination of much of the misery upon which communism thrives.

Then such things as the Berlin blockade, and their dropping all pretensions of friendship to turn terrific propagandistic tirades loose against the United States and Britain, started pulling the western nations together again, bringing the Atlantic Pact and the rest.

The whole constitutes one of the greatest records of consistent diplomatic stupidity in the history of the world.

There's a lot more of this—their inability to handle their own creature, Tito, their noisy foozles in Greece, and Iran, their stupid and futile boycott of the United Nations, and now the bovine Mr. Malik and the item of Korea.

Most experts are agreed they're now making their greatest mistake of all, that instead of Malik's making face for Russia in Asia or anywhere else, he's really the greatest engineer of unity the western world could possibly wish. For, whatever he is or is not doing for Russia, he's surely hammering the 53 nations who've endorsed the UN action in Korea into a solid ferrous unit against his own nation and all its procedures. By vilifying and antagonizing these 53 nations, with his repeated libels against their decency, integrity, and truthfulness, he's turning the entire world security organization into a vast, determined and solidly unified anti-Comintern pact. So, in just about such words, wrote James Reston of the New York Times from Lake Success the other day. This is the dumbest of all their performances, and if they are working around in a general way toward making war on us, they couldn't possibly be rendering us greater service. The mouthy Mr. Malik is doing far more for us at the moment than we could ever hope to do for ourselves.

It's not superintelligence the Russians have on us. In the fields of diplomacy, it's duplicity. In his new book Behind Closed Doors, Rear Adm. Ellis M. Zacharias, former deputy head of the Office of Naval Intelligence, gives a new interpretation of Yalta, which is where it all began. As a matter of fact, it's Stalin's own interpretation, given in direct quotes.

Part of the Yalta agreement called for universal suffrage, secret ballots and a free election in Poland. This caused great consternation in Red circles in Poland because Stalin already had a puppet government operating there and had assured the members they would be permanent.

These wildly distressed native commissars appealed to Stalin's personal representative in Poland, Nikolai A. Bulganin, for an explanation. He truthfully said he was stumped but that he would fly to Moscow and ask the generalissimo, himself. Now I quote the book:

"Bulganin flew back to Lublin with the message. He said, in effect (and we heard his words repeated by one of the men who had actually been present at this momentous Bolshevik palaver):

"The Yalta declaration is a scrap of paper. It was necessary to satisfy Roosevelt and Churchill—but we will not abide by it. We will go ahead with our plans as stated to you by the great Stalin. I give you my word that you have nothing to fear. You will be the government of Poland, no matter how these elections might turn out and whatever might happen in the meantime. Be steadfast and have faith in Stalin.'"

They have that sort of duplicity. They have complete control of their people, and they have a much more fatalistic, or realistic, approach to war. Our own is very weak in comparison. Their standard of living is so low that war is no sacrifice, and since the government owns all materials and sets all wages they can wage war at a fraction of the cost to us.

We could very easily fight ourselves broke. In fact, we may not now be far from it. The basic cost of equipping one United States armored division today is $20,000,000, and that's only the primary expenditure. Medium tanks cost $400,000 each. A heavy bomber costs $4,000,000. Modern jet fighters with all spare parts cost $632,000 each.

These prices have skyrocketed since before World War II. The jet fighter costs $632,000 now, but the pre-World War II fighter cost but $28,800. The heavy bomber today costs $4,000,000, but the twin-engined bomber, the "heavy" of its day, cost but $123,000. The medium tank costs $400,000 today. Before the last war, it cost $30,000.

These astounding figures are cited as part of the answer of "what happened to the $50,000,000,000 spent on national defense?"

Even the Congress, not easily stunned by financial figures, is asking how the new costs could possibly have gone so high. Some of the increases must be charged to inflation, they say, but the bulk must be charged to the installation of delicate and costly equipment such as radar.

If weapons now cost this much, and if we're to go into all-out production—the talk is of complete mobilization—it will be necessary to cut every production cost possible, and that in a nation going really all out, would include labor. The Russians have no such troubles as ours. Nobody gets rich out of war with them. Not even a war worker can truthfully say, "I never had it so good." That's not true here, as memories not older than 7 or 8 years can attest.

Before we were even in the war, in the days of lend-lease, I was interviewing a local merchant marine officer who several times made the bleak and bitter run to Murmansk. I was asking him if he'd seen any Russians and if so, what his impressions were.

He said he saw plenty of them at Murmansk, both men and women, because they unloaded the boats. They were wonderful, he said. They were working only for Russia. Working hours, weather, long labor without rest meant nothing, as long as they were unloading those supplies for their soldiers. Their only interest was in emptying the boats as fast as possible, so the boat could turn around and hurry back here for more.

INSTANCE OF RUSSIAN DEVOTION

As an instance of their devotion, he cited the case of a middle-aged woman who had been working for hours on the docks when the Germans pulled one of their infrequent air raids. Word came down to her that her home had been struck and her family killed. She left the dock and went up to the ruins. Her home was truly gone, and her children had perished inside it. Within an hour or two, tearless and grim of face, she was back on the docks working without a word on her job. This was to be her revenge—working harder.

"And what were these people paid?" I asked him.

"Paid!" he echoed, "I don't think they were paid anything. I never saw any money, nor heard any mention of it. As nearly as I could see, they were merely trying to help their country."

I have never seen the official pay scale of the Russian Army, but I am informed that the Russian private soldier is paid $16 a year. From what I saw and heard in Europe, most of his food, funds and incidental treasure is looted from the neighborhood through which he is marching, or where he is billeted. He doesn't cost his Government much.

There, in their primitive lives, their loyalty and their far lower expenses is the real strength of the vast, conglomerate nation we're embroiled with. It's not their superior intelligence because they haven't any.

It doesn't take much memory to recall what our picture on the home front was when we were fighting for our lives a few years ago. The American war machine could stall and GI's die and to hell with 'em, while John L. Lewis struck his mines. A 6-week course in some high school cellar turned $30-a-week help into "skilled mechanics" ready to draw junior executives wages, with time-and-a-half for anything over an 8-hour 5-day week. The CIO took over the merchant marine, and the unions screaming against "war profiteers," profiteered the most richly of all.

This time, if we have to go, there should be a universal draft and a new sort of law that would pay the workers in war plants exactly what the men in uniform get, even less, if anything, because they don't have to risk their lives. Of course, that won't be done because the politicians haven't guts enough to propose it, let alone vote it.

We conceivably could fight ourselves broke, and so become the natural victims of communism through complete economic collapse, but, again, Russia wouldn't deserve the credit. She'd simply be standing by when it happened, ready to step in and take over.

The Russians are really stupid. They only look brilliant in flashes because we seem to have the exquisite genius of being stupider at all vital times. You've just seen a classic example in the end of the Pax Trumana. Wait until we really start to mobilize, and then watch the rest.

Statement Made and Resolutions Adopted at Fifteenth American-Russian Festival, Stratford, Conn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM BENTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two remarkable documents which were contained in the program of the fifteenth annual American-Russian festival held on Sunday, August 13, at Stratford, Conn., and sponsored by the Holy Ghost Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church and the Carpatho-Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church of St. John the Baptist, of Bridgeport, Conn. Many thousands of Americans of Russian descent attended this festival, at which Governor Bowles and I spoke. These are the people whose relatives are not only sitting in the front row facing the iron curtain, but are locked up behind it. These are the people, these are our fellow Americans, upon whom the strain of divided loyalties might be expected to fall, yet there is no trace of communism among them. The first document, prepared by Father Simko, of the Carpatho-Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church of St. John the Baptist, explains the faith of these people, their faith in our American democratic way of life, in sketching the contributions of these two great and prosperous Russian parishes to America.

The second document was eloquently presented to the 5,000 people gathered at Woodland Grove in Stratford by Father Kivko of the Holy Ghost Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church. Father Kivko asked for a show of hands on this resolution, a copy of which is being presented to President Truman, Governor Bowles, Senator McMahon, Representative Lodge, and myself.

Mr. President, every hand in that great assemblage was raised. Here we have moving testimony to the strength of our free institutions—to their overwhelming appeal to those Russians who are among us and who have become such a vital and important part of the great industrial city of Bridgeport and of many other communities through Connecticut and the Nation.

Mr. President, I am inviting these two documents to the attention of Mr. Edward Barrett, Assistant Secretary of State, who is my successor in the State Department responsible for the Voice of America broadcasts. I think that he and his people may find material in these two documents most suitable for our international broadcasting.

There being no objection, the statement and resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR CONTRIBUTIONS TO AMERICA

Greetings, dear brothers and sisters in Christ: a most sincere welcome is extended to everyone, both young and old, today in attendance at the fifteenth annual American Russian festival.

This event is a great and public manifestation of loyal and patriotic American citizens of Russian extraction residing in the large metropolitan Bridgeport area.

All of us are here to demonstrate our devotion to the land which has given to us the blessed opportunity to live peacefully with our neighbors and the freedom to secure for ourselves and our families an abundance of happiness and the better things of life.

The greater majority are those who came as immigrants to these shores from Russia and Carpatho Russia some 30, 40, and 50 years ago to settle in New England and made Bridgeport, Conn., one of the great colonies of American Russian life. At once they took the necessary steps toward citizenship. Then they gave their will, heart, and strong arms to help mold this magnificent land by going into the factories and mills, and to till the soil as farmers. They were then and still are today a frugal and moderate people, imbued with a deep religious piety, to which imposing edifices of God are everlasting tributes.

In World War I our nationality was in the forefront to come to the aid of its adopted country. World War II brought even greater sacrifices. Over 1,000 young men and women of both parishes are veterans of the last global conflict. Today we stand ready again to perform our duty as good citizens.

The last 15 years has brought a new generation to carry on a magnanimous tradition given to us by those early immigrants. These are our young Americans born here, and as products of American schools and culture will further enrich the American scene with their family and religious background. They are priests, doctors, dentists, attorneys, legislators, teachers, skilled technicians, engineers, scientists, and prominent in the industrial and commercial life to America.

Our people have made the most of their opportunties guaranteed them by the United States Constitution regardless of race, color, or creed. America is proud of them. And American Russians are proud to be true citizens of this land of the free and the brave. Na Mnohaya i Blahaya L'eta.

Rev. JOSEPH G. SIMKO.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED THIS DAY AT THE FIFTEENTH AMERICAN-RUSSIAN FESTIVAL, WOODLAND GROVE, STRATFORD, CONN., SUNDAY, AUGUST 13, 1950

1. Over 5,000 members of St. John the Baptist Carpatho-Russian and the Holy Ghost Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Churches of Bridgeport, Conn., together with affiliated veterans chapters, clubs, fraternal societies, and numerous other groups residing in the vicinity are assembled here today, to demonstrate not only their religious and brotherly unity in the one Holy Eastern Orthodox Catholic faith, but to express most emphatically the unanimous acceptance of the following declaration:

2. Whereas native-born and naturalized citizens of the United States of America from Russian and Carptho-Russian ancestry wish to declare their gratitude to this, the greatest and most democratic country on earth for the opportunities and for the cherished freedoms guaranteed by our Constitution; be it firmly

3. Resolved, That we assert complete loyalty to the United States of America and support of President Harry S. Truman in pursuing his present policy in voicing a courageous, active defense of the principles of democracy against Communist aggression, both here and abroad, which dangerously threatens the peace of the whole world.

Copies of this declaration will be sent to President Truman, Governor Bowles, Congressman Lodge, Senator McMahon, and Senator Benton.

Program for America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER FERGUSON
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, all Members of the Senate who heard him speak on July 18 will recall the forceful address by the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] on a program for America. That address has received just recognition in an editorial appearing in the current issue of Life magazine. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Life magazine of August 14, 1950]

PROGRAM FOR AMERICA

Senator STYLES BRIDGES, of New Hampshire, made a speech on the floor of the Senate which he entitled 'A Program for America." It was so packed with good sense, high courage, and statesmanly foresight that we are delighted to make it the basis of our own checklist of what, as a Nation, we need to do.

Here are some of Senator BRIDGES' points. The comments represent his views, except for what we have put in parentheses:

1. Call the National Guard to the Federal service at once.

2. Establish immediately an American radar network (to make an interceptor air force effective).

3. Mobilize full-speed, around-the-clock industrial production to provide military equipment of the best type available. The American people are ready to use steel for tanks instead of for automobiles.

4. Establish and activate a civilian defense program. It is almost criminal to have advanced 5 years into the atomic era without having such a program in full force.

5. Congress should at once prepare legislation to provide 100-percent mobilization of our people and our resources for enactment within hours when and if it is needed. This program should be aimed solely at achieving the safety and security of the United States. It is no place for dreamy planners to impose the controls which will lead this Nation to socialism.

6. Handout programs should be ruthlessly abolished. (P. S. We add: so should the pork-barrel grabs that 47 Senators voted on July 27 to keep in the rivers, harbors, and flood control bill.)

7. Register all Communists in the United States * * * immediate enactment of the Mundt-Ferguson bill.

8. Clean out the State Department. For many years our State Department has been infiltrated with men who either have unbelievably poor judgment or whose loyalty is open to serious question. When a naval officer loses his ship or runs it aground in the mud he is court-martialed. But when foreign-policy advisers lose a continent, they are applauded or even promoted.

9. Improve and expand our intelligence operation. (In cruder words, this means underground operations in iron curtain countries.)

10. Mobilize anti-Communists everywhere. Make use of the Chinese Republican Army, the stateless Europeans, and, if MacArthur advises it, arm and train Japanese divisions. Make Spain a full partner in the fight against communism. * * * We should ask ourselves two questions: Does Spain oppose communism? Will the Spanish fight communism? The answer to both questions is "Yes."

11. Stop all trade between the Soviet Union and its satellites with the United States and its allies, which, directly or indirec y, has military significance.

12. Advise our allies that we will not assist countries which continue to pamper and coddle a fifth column.

Senator BRIDGES' program was set forth way back on July 18. So far very few of his points have been carried out, though all of them are important and most are essential. But it is profoundly encouraging that we have leaders like Senator BRIDGES setting the pace for the administration. They express the sentiments of the American people in terms of their practical knowledge of what can and must be done.

Protection of Government Against Communist and Subversive Groups

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Facing the Future in a Fog of Doubt," published in the Catholic Review of August 11, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REVIEWPOINT—FACING THE FUTURE IN A FOG OF DOUBT

Never before have the people of the United States faced the future of such fearful possibilities for themselves and their country. And never have they faced a crisis from a position of so little confidence in the ability of their leaders. And never have they been in a position where they could not count upon the loyalty of the men in whose hands rested the decisions that could determine the event of victory or defeat, success or failure, survival or absorption.

Disloyalty charges did not originate with Senator MCCARTHY: His was simply the latest official voicing of the situation that gave birth to the Dies committee. Citizens everywhere had long been disturbed by the vote-bartered tolerance of F. D. R. and the open favoritism of his consort toward Communists.

The over-all picture of investigations into subversive and disloyal activities has been that of alarmed patriots trying to find out the truth and smugly confident politicians pooh-poohing the efforts openly, and at times obstructing them, in the attempt to cover up against any suggestion of political venality or treasonable opportunism on the part of the recent administrations.

The result has been to leave the people with the impression that our country is led by a group upon whose integrity they cannot count. Call the defect ineptitude, inefficiency, bungling, temporizing, timidity, disloyalty, treason—it remains true that America faces a future of unforeseeable and vital possibilities under the guidance of leaders who have proved their inadequacy. And they are practical enough to know that this is a situation which invites and presages failure.

Had there been on the part of our leaders an open, earnest, fair attitude of cooperation with the loyalty investigations, Americans would have been restored to a sense of confidence. They are not dismayed to face enemies. They are alarmed at the possibility of finding themselves stabbed in the back.

Nor have the doubts been diminished by the conviction, with evidence beyond reasonable likelihood of error, of the originally disdainful Mr. Hiss. Nor is it likely that any book, however timely to the publishers, will offset the fact of a China policy that could not have suited Russia better had it originated, as it may have, in the Kremlin.

Everybody, except official Washington, is aware of Communist infiltration in radio, stage, screen, unionism, higher education, Baltimore, a quiet ammunition dump for Communist activities convenient to the Capital, has its little expressions of subversive activities from the halls of Hopkins to the purlieus of racketeers.

A recent Johns Hopkins New-Letter, which I have not yet seen disavowed by university authorities, seemed to think it had restored Lattimore to impeccability with a banquet and called upon its readers to attempt the restoration of Hiss. The editor missed the implication that followed from associating the professor with the convict.

The entire effect is to leave the American public in a fog of uncertainty and doubt. We know what America has always stood for; but we are not sure that our leaders know. We know the America we will fight and die for; but we cannot feel too sure that the America we love will survive our sacrifice. We cannot, from this fog of doubt and suspicion of disloyalty, see where we are going and whether what we get to will be worth striving for.

Our leaders are being persuaded this way one day, and that way the next, which indicates uncertainty at the top—so it is not strange that this should be communicated from the high places down to the stratum of even the most humble of citizens. Our statesmanship is very much like an unpleasant weather report—cloudy, with fog.

And the shame and pity of it all is that the clouds can be dispelled in a moment by the determined and patriotic action of loyal leaders.

The Copper Tariff

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRIEN McMAHON
OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Copper Tariff," published in the Washington Star of August 13, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COPPER TARIFF

The Senate as a whole, at the earliest possible moment, ought to undo the mistake made by its Finance Committee in voting to table the House-approved bill to suspend the tariff on imported copper. Looked at from any angle—from the standpoint of protecting our own domestic industry, from the standpoint of our inter-American relations, or from the standpoint of our shortage of this critical material in a time of grave world tension—the tabling action simply lacks justification.

Under the House bill, our 2-cents-a-pound copper tariff—which was suspended throughout the Second World War but which became operable again last June 30—would be done away with for another year. Led chiefly by protective-minded members from the mining States, however, the Senate committee has in effect buried the measure by a surprising vote of 9 to 4, even though not a single common-sense argument, in the light of present-day realities, seems possible to advance in defense of the burial.

Actually, as far as our domestic producers are concerned, the plain fact is that they require no protection. As matters stand, wholly apart from the need to build up our strategic stockpile, the amount of copper being turned out in this country is nowhere near enough to satisfy civilian consumption and our stepped-up military demand. In such circumstances, imports from abroad can hardly have an adverse effect, and the 2-cents-a-pound duty is therefore lacking in sense.

The only thing the duty can do is to hurt the economy of Chile, and to a lesser extent Peru. As it operates now, its effect is to deprive the Chileans of dollar income that they sorely need. They are among our very best friends in South America. Accordingly, in terms of our good-neighbor policy, we are working against our own best interests, as well as theirs, in imposing a tariff on their copper—a tariff altogether unnecessary for our own industry.

In view of all this, it must be hoped that the Senate will show more wisdom in the matter than has its Finance Committee. The mistake that has been made can be corrected if approval is won for Senator MCMAHON'S proposed amendment to the House-approved bill providing for duty-free, imported scrap metals. This bill has already received the committee's favorable vote. If Mr. MCMAHON'S proposal is enacted, regular copper will be included and the tariff on it thus will be suspended.

If the Senate takes this action, the scrap-metals legislation will then go into conference or reconciliation with the version passed by the House. Since it has already approved suspension of the copper tariff, the House will almost certainly go along with the MCMAHON amendment. Some such legislation is necessary to reverse the short-sighted position taken by the majority of Senators on the Finance Committee.

Necessity for Propaganda Campaigns

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD two illuminating news dispatches on the front page of yesterday's New York Times; one by Richard J. H. Johnston from Tokyo which points up the problem of morale among our forces now fighting in Korea, and which shows once more how we have neglected the psychological factors not only in dealing with the Koreans but in handling our own Armed Forces; and the other by Robert Trumbull from New Delhi which describes the rise of anti-United States feeling in India. Here again we see a failure in the implementation of our foreign policy by the worldwide campaign of truth which is called for in my Senate Resolution 243. Mr. Trumbull quite properly points out that if east-west relations are to be improved, it is essential that these divergencies in philosophical approach be recognized and taken into account. Evidence continues to pile up on all sides that our traditional reliance on military, economic, and diplomatic policy is not enough; that we must supplement these three aspects of our foreign policy with a fourth, a great psychological offensive in the field of ideas.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GI'S IN KOREA HANDICAPPED BY UNAWARENESS OF MISSION

(By Richard J. H. Johnston)•

TOKYO, August 11.—A lack of psychological preparation for violence and the dangers of armed combat has proved one of the greatest weaknesses among average American soldiers in their efforts in Korea to stem the relentless and fanatical tide of Communist invaders.

On one's return to this headquarters after more than 2 weeks with the troops along the fringe of the defense line, an evaluation of the GI's predicament in Korea begins to take form.

The average GI seems not to know why he is fighting in Korea. He does not seem to understand why as a United Nations soldier he has only South Koreans beside him in the battle line. He appears puzzled that he was thrust with all haste from the soft comforts of garrison duty in Japan, Okinawa, and Hawaii, or the peaceful atmosphere of the United States into the filth and violence of the battlefield.

He faces a foe who is zealous, resourceful, and hard. All of this adds up in the GI's mind to a conclusion that someone has put him into a mess he does not understand.

This correspondent has talked with soldiers beside thundering artillery pieces, on chow lines, in convoys moving to the front, in fox holes, aid stations, ambulances, and hospitals, aboard trains and planes to and from the battle area, aboard troop ships tied up at Korean piers, in the heat of sun-baked river beds and at lonely mountain-top outposts.

Only a few of the older noncommissioned officers and officers expressed knowledge and understanding of the significance of their mission.

But to the GI who must bear the brunt of the fighting, the realization that service in the regular peacetime Army involved the risk of death on a strange battleground came only when he moved into the combat area.

GI IS DISILLUSIONED

"The recruiting posters didn't say anything about this," one young infantryman said as he moved toward the front. "I'll fight for my country, but damned if I see why I'm fighting to save this hell hole.

"I heard some stuff on the way over about this being a United Nations deal. Where's the rest of the United Nations?"

Asked what they were doing when this war began, the soldiers gave such replies as these:

"I guarded dependent houses on Okinawa."

"I swam every afternoon at Waikiki."

"I just finished basic training back in the States."

Talks with troops who had been blooded in battle revealed bitterness and a conviction that they were being sacrificed to American unpreparedness.

The flame of determination here glimmered fitfully in a few individuals. The majority revealed no inspired determination.

VETERAN FIGHTS FOR LIFE

"I'll tell you what I'm fighting for," a veteran of the Bulge said. "I'm fighting for my life."

The tragic commitment under the press of events of handfuls of troops daily in the war left the GI's with a feeling of hopelessness and nakedness.

They saw themselves as a small scattered band dropped into the Korean Peninsula with paralyzing suddenness. They had at the time only a thin tenuous supply line. Behind them lay the homeland, momentarily neither at peace nor at war.

There have been acts of heroism, but in the words of one colonel:

"Acts of heroism inspire others to do the impossible, but in war the final impossible can be achieved only by teamwork. We have an army but no team. We are only a handful here and the enemy seems limitless. We can hold for a while here and there, but until there are many more of us, there is little we can do except die."

A commander of infantry said: "I can tell my men what to do. I can show them how to do it. But until they understand why they are doing it, they can't do it well.

"These men are doing the best they can, but as you can see it's not enough."

His observations were paraphrased by a 19-year-old corporal, recounting his experiences after his position had been overrun:

"I keep asking myself what I am doing here. The funny thing is I can't answer my own question."

ANTI-UNITED STATES FEELING IS ON RISE IN INDIA—NEWS OF KOREAN DESTRUCTION SETS OFF WIDE CRITICISM OF POLICIES IN ASIA

(By Robert Trumbull)

NEW DELHI, INDIA, August 12.—Anti-United States feeling in India never has been so widespread as it is now. With every day of the Korean war bringing more news of bombed cities and flaming villages, the unpopularity of the United States is growing.

This adverse sentiment appears to be based mainly on two factors. The first is abhorrence of the involvement of Asians in what Indians consider essentially a quarrel between the United States and the Soviet Union. The second is the inability of Indians to feel the same urgency in the struggle against the world Communist movement as the United States does.

With Parliament in session, it has been possible to assess public opinion throughout India as reflected in the public and private utterances of legislators from every province. United States Embassy officers also have noted a growing criticism, or at least a questioning of United States policy among their acquaintances in official circles here.

Premier Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and other intellectuals disagree with the United States policy in a limited sphere bound by their specialized approach to world problems. On the lower levels, there is simply distrust of the western powers on general principles, coupled with a native inability to understand the United States point of view in the conflict with Russia.

The political thinking of the ordinary Indian seems to be based on looking backward and on a philosophical disregard of immediate consequences. There is a strong tendency to suggest what the United States should have done in regard to Asian problems 4 or 5 years ago, without any proposal as to what it should do now. The fatalistic Indians, who perhaps are more conscious than the Americans of the magnitude of time stretching before man, seem more willing to let history take its course, confident that right will win out in the end.

Many Indians are unworried that communism may win in Korea and Indochina at this stage. They argue that if the United States system is better, it eventually will come to the top; so what does the moment matter? This illustrates one of the divergencies between eastern and western thinking that appear irreconcilable.

Descending from this metaphysical plane to everyday considerations, many Indians feel that the United States action in Korea represents foreign domination in Asian lands, which they resent. Several declare passionately that the United States should get out of Japan, Korea, Indochina, Formosa, and wherever else it may be involved in Asia and let the Asians settle their own problems.

In this, there is something of the philosophy that motivated the late Mohandas K. Gandhi, when in 1942 he suggested to the British that it should be no concern of theirs if anarchy and chaos resulted if they quit India at that tense period. Any feeling of responsibility by the major powers toward the less advanced countries of Asia is resented as being patronizing.

Nothing, except possibly the development of the atomic bomb, has hurt the United States in Indian eyes so much as its alliance with the French in supporting the Bao Dai regime in Indochina. Anything having to do with France in Indochina represents western colonialism to the Indians. What the alternative to Bao Dai might have been does not worry the Indians as a group; there again they do not share the United States' sense of urgency in the Communist crisis.

It is plain to observers here that if East-West relations are to be improved, it is essential that these divergencies in philosophical approach be recognized and taken into account. The existence of inherited and unchangeable suspicion of western motives in Asia also must be accepted as a fact.

Many Indians refuse to appreciate the harsh facts of the war. This refusal stems from the Indian conviction that war is a confession of failure in foreign policy and merely compounds the error. However, Premier Nehru believes it is right to meet aggression with force. It was on the premise that aggression existed that he has put an Indian army in the field on this subcontinent several times since India became independent in 1947, and that he has backed United Nations' action in Korea.

The horror of the consequences of war is universal, but to the Indians there is a special horror when it is Asians who are suffering. Accounts of repeated bombing of Seoul by the United States aircraft and reports of villages left in flames as United States troops withdraw arouse indignation here. Consideration of military necessity is overshadowed by the fact that an Asian people is "getting it in the neck again."

The Indians argue that killing Koreans and destroying property is not making friends for the United States in Korea, or in India. But they can suggest no alternative that meets with the United States ideas of the urgency of the situation.

One of New Delhi's major newspapers recently commented—it has been printed often in India—that the United States dropped atomic bombs only on the Asian people, the inference being that the United States did not want to use the bomb on Europeans. This illustrates the kind of thinking that the United States is up against when it tries to win good-will in Asia.

The expensive United States "compaign of truth" has had a reaction in some Indian circles opposite to that intended. To be the target of a propaganda drive is resented here. The result of this propaganda often has impelled the Indians to go to Russian sources to see what the Soviet replies.

Soviet literature is available at low price, whereas United States books are prohibitively expensive.

Military Considerations Are Behind Loan to Spain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OWEN BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanmous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Military Considerations Are Behind Loan to Spain," written by Randolph Leigh, and published in the Washington Sunday Star of August 13, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MILITARY CONSIDERATIONS ARE BEHIND LOAN TO SPAIN—ADVANCING UNITED STATES FUNDS TO FRANCO GOVERNMENT MAY BE FIRST STEP TOWARD CREATING STRONG BASTION TO STEM COMMUNIST AGGRESSION

(By Randolph Leigh)

The pending loan to Spain would mean for the United States the crossing of the Rubicon, or perhaps it should be said the crossing of the Pyrenees. The amount itself ($100,000,000) is trifling alongside the billions poured out for the perennial revival of our Allies in Europe in the last 33 years.

It would be significant, however, as the first deliberately and solely military move made by the United States in a struggle which up to the present has been treated as primarily diplomatic. Korea was a diplomatic bluff which, being called, had to be turned over to the unalerted military. Whether it was a justifiable risk on the diplomatic level, time alone will tell.

Heretofore we have masked sentimental and economic considerations behind military considerations in our aid to Europe. That is, we wanted to help certain nations because we like them. We also wanted to assure the sale of our surplus goods, thereby hedging against a recession. We hoped that the aided nations would be inspired and inspirited to vote down communism. In due time, according to the diplomatic theory, this example of a richer life through right thinking and voting would triumph over the concepts of communism.

SOURCES OF OPPOSITION

Likewise it was believed that these revived nations would soon rearm themselves in their own and our interests, thus serving as our first line of defense in Europe. In this way a military argument was adduced from a basically ideological development.

The chief difficulty with this theory was the "in due time" element. It soon became apparent that Russia, and not the United States, was to be the timekeeper. We will probably never know whether the complete European aid plan would have worked fully or not, for it now seems certain that it will have to be merged with a plan which will be primarily military and only secondarily propagandist and economic. The granting of the Spanish loan would mark the beginning of the changeover from the old plan to the new.

When we recall other leaders whose aid we have welcomed in the last 2 wars, our choosiness regarding Franco is puzzling.

Opposition to Spain outside the administration actually springs from two totally different sources, namely, Communist agents seeking to deprive America of an excellent military base, and thoroughly loyal Protestants who honestly fear Franco as a tool of Catholicism. That communism is the stronger factor in this turmoil is indicated by the fact that less fuss has been made over the question of the reappointment of a representative of the President at the Vatican than over the recognition of Franco as a possible tool of the papacy.

SPAIN OUSTS REDS

The fact that aid to Spain will have to override all these obstacles will emphasize the urgency of the military considerations prompting such a decision, if it is made. Obviously this small loan to Spain, would be only a first step. It would mean besides:

1. That we would build a strong base in Spain and increase and strengthen Spanish armies, already of considerable strength and in high morale.

2. That we would indirectly serve notice on our long-subsidized and at present surprisingly tranquil allies in Europe, especially Britain and France, that unless they can speed up their preparedness we must fall back on a stronger bastion, Spain, as a bridgehead for both Europe and Africa.

3. That we would inform Russia by deeds that we do not intend to let her select her own battlefields and her own timetables around the world, but are going to create bases and raise mercenaries in all major areas.

4. That with Spain and Spanish Morocco as a background we would be able to make Britain's great contribution of Gibraltar play a much larger role than in the last war, when it was dangerously hemmed in. With the most recent weapons used against it and with Spain again neutral, Gibraltar would probably fall or be deprived of its worth.

FIGHTING NATION

Oddly enough the chief factor which has blocked aid to Spain will make her attractive as a military ally—she has rooted out Communists. Few things have been more alarming to our strategists than the fact that neither Britain nor France has been rigorously against local Communists. The situation has been similar in the smaller western nations. France is today about 25 percent Communist, according to general report.

Spain, by contrast, is ruthlessly anti-Russian, to a degree found nowhere else in Europe. In an ideological war a friendly population is of immense value to an army, and a hostile one is a source of perpetual danger. That is one of the reasons that Spain rates high as a possible base in the calculations of our strategists.

Furthermore, the Spaniard himself is a great fighter. Professor Sorokin calculated that over a period of 1,000 years Spain had done more fighting than any other power in the world.

The Iberian Peninsula, with Portugal thrown in, has, in addition to good harbors, numerous physical advantages as a base. The Pyrenees are the most formidable natural barrier in Europe, higher on the average than the Alps. They are, besides, flanked by water, whereas the Alps always have been bypassed to the northwest. In addition an enemy landing on the northern or eastern coats of Spain would soon find himself confronted by secondary mountain ranges parallel to the coasts.

Spain is twice as large a base as Britain and a much better protected one than France or Germany, both of which are wide open toward Russia. Another factor is that the Spanish population is practically self-sustaining, whereas Britain presents a heavy problem with its hungry and crowded civilian population which can neither produce the food it needs nor earn the foreign exchange with which to pay for it from overseas.

Spain is slightly short of food and fuel but her people have never lived in the style in which the United States and Canada generosity have enabled the British public to continue to live even after it lacked the funds to pay its own way. Therefore, dollar for dollar, the effect of American aid on public opinion in unaccustomed Spain would be far greater than in long-habituated Britain. Of course, the United States will continue to do all she can for Britain and in turn hopes for continued aid from Britain as an ally and a base. Nevertheless many strategists think that as of today Spain is a more important base than Britain, or certainly is as important. Beyond any doubt they would welcome her as an ally, regardless of rating.

MIGHT SLOW SOVIET

A rarely mentioned but important factor, if we are to stand for a time on the defensive in Spain, is that of the atmosphere around the mountains. The French slopes of the Pyrenees have the clearest atmosphere anywhere in Europe outside Greece. This would expose an enemy attacking from the French side—assuming that the Russians got that far—to severe punishment from the air in an attempt to break through the mountain barrier.

It is hardly too much to say that a broad-scale deal with Spain at this time would almost certainly mean that our global strategists had won a memorable victory.

It would also put Russia on notice that we were ready, if necessary, to enter upon a struggle to the death—along Roman-Carthagenian lines—and reaching to the uttermost parts of the earth. That might give her pause. Failing that, it would certainly give us a better chance.

Cackling Can't Win Wars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Cackling Can't Win Wars," written by Roscoe Fleming and published in the Denver Post of August 11, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CACKLING CAN'T WIN WARS

(By Roscoe Fleming)

Once upon a time there was a little red, white and blue hen who was so busy taking care of her own chicks and a whole flock of adopted ones, that she sometimes wondered how she was going to get through the day. She found some grains of wheat and she said:

"Now, who will help me sow this wheat?"

"Not I!" said most of the barnyard animals in chorus. "We have so many unprecedented prior commitments and our military, economic and social conditions are so deteriorated that with the utmost consideration it is utterly inexpedient for us to accede to your extraordinary request. But please accept our good wishes."

"Then I'll sow it myself," said the little red, white and blue hen.

When the wheat was grown up tall and ready to cut, she asked:

"Now, who will help me cut the wheat?"

"Not us," said most of the animals.

"The concomitants and varying implications of our domestic situation combined with the urgent requirements of our foreign involvements render it to our utmost regret impossible to alleviate the exigencies of your situation. In fact, we were just about to ask that you clean up this dirty barnyard in your spare time."

"Then I'll cut it myself," said the little red, white and blue hen.

Then she asked: "Now, who will help me thresh the wheat?"

"Not me," said most of the other animals. "The combined revalutory effort of inflation, deflation, and the revaluation of the franc, lira, peso, piennig, and pengo, plus categorical exorthosis in world trade, render too exiguous our ability to aid. In fact, we were just about to ask that you keep the children for the afternoon."

"Then I'll thresh it myself," said the little red, white, and blue hen.

When the wheat was threshed, she asked: "Now, who will help carry the grain to the mill?"

"Not us," said most of the animals. "The emergency situation in our interior departments, coupled with foreign and domestic trends, compel us retroactively and regretfully to withdraw. Accept instead, Excellency, our most distinguished considerations. In fact, we were just about to ask you to pump us a pail of water."

"Then I'll take it myself," said the little red, white, and blue hen.

When the wheat was ground, she said:

"Now, who will help me bake the bread?"

"Not us," said most of the animals. "In view of the rapidly deteriorating decline of our heavy industry, combined with the exigent requirements of defense and domestic expropriation, we are fully involved without assuming any of your responsibilities. In fact, we were just about to ask you to run to the village for us."

"Then I'll bake it myself," said the little red, white, and blue hen.

When the bread was baked she said: "Cluck, cluck. The bread is done; it's light and sweet; now who will come and help me eat?"

"We will," said most of the animals in chorus. "In fact, we were just about to suggest that we all have a bread-and-butter picnic dinner—you to bring the bread and butter, of course."

In short, when are some, not all, of our alleged partners in making a brave new world, going to cut the cackle and can the gobbledegook, and really start helping us to keep the present one from flying to bits?

Communist Peace Propaganda

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, Martin Ebon wrote an excellent factual summary and analysis of the efforts being made in the world by the Communist Party to delude decent people into supporting its deceptive and vicious peace petition. It appeared in the Christian Science Monitor on August 3, as follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor of August 3, 1950]

UNITED STATES COMMUNISTS PUSH PEACE PLEA IN EFFORT TO CAMOUFLAGE INTENTIONS

(By Martin Ebon)

The Communist Party of the United States is finding peace a still powerful slogan in its current campaign for 5,000,000 signatures endorsing the Soviet-sponsored appeal of the permanent committee of the World Peace Congress.

This congress, which met in Stockholm from March 15 to 19, initiated a world-wide campaign for signatures and drafted an appeal which has been circulated in all parts of the globe. The Stockholm meeting represented the continuation of a series of peace conferences that begun in Wroclaw, Poland, in autumn, 1948, and continued with congresses in New York, Paris, Prague, Montevideo, Mexico City, London, Melbourne, Toronto, Vienna, and many other cities.

The Communist peace offensive represents a well-prepared propaganda effort to use basic human desires for lasting peace as a means of obtaining support for the policies of the Soviet Union and its satellites, while strengthening opposition to the efforts of the United States and those United Nations members now backing the Republic of Korea against Communist invasion.

CAREFULLY WORDED APPEAL

The Communist appeal, in order to gain maximum support, is worded in a way that makes it widely acceptable. Here is its brief text:

From a talk by Valentine Gorin over the Moscow Radio, July 7:

Subject: The Workers of America in Their Struggle for Peace.

Excerpt: The Christian Science Monitor states that Americans are sending to Congress an unprecedented number of letters demanding an end to the armaments race. Members of Congress are obliged to admit that the avalanche of letters is a truly spontaneous and sincere expression of the popular masses. The newspaper adds: "If one looks through the enormous batch of letters, there can be no doubt left as to the feeling of Americans and their ardent desire for peace."

ITEM JUXTAPOSED

This item is juxtaposed with a report on the "peace" campaign undertaken by United States Communists.

"We demand the unconditional prohibition of the atomic weapon, a weapon of aggression and mass extermination of human beings, and the institution of strict international control to enforce this. We shall regard as guilty of war crimes the government that is the first to use the atomic weapon against any country."

The world-wide drive for signatures has, of course, brought the greatest results in the Communist-controlled countries. In the United States the Communist Party began its campaign in early June. During a 3-month period the party seeks to obtain 5,000,000 signatures. The campaign began with a rally at New York's Manhattan Center.

ROBESON SPEAKS

Paul Robeson, the singer, made the keynote speech, in which he stated: "We shall impose the peace. We do not ask for peace. We demand it."

The rally also heard an address by Abbot Simon, executive secretary of the Peace Information Center, an especially established organizational clearing house for the propaganda drive.

Among the speakers was Dr. Joseph Fletcher, clergyman of the Episcopal Theological Seminary of Cambridge, Mass. Dr. Fletcher had attended the All-Australia Congress of Partisans of Peace, which took place at Melbourne from April 16 to 21. At the New York meeting he said:

"No peace movement which refuses to recognize the Communist and Socialist world can succeed. For the coexistence of different social orders we must accept the coexistence of different social ideas in our own community."

ROGGE DISAGREES

Also present was O. John Rogge, former Assistant Attorney General. However, the Communist Daily Worker noted that Mr. Rogge attempted to "put equal responsibility for the cold war on the United States and the Soviet Union." For this attempt, the paper reported, Mr. Rogge was "sharply slapped down" by Rockwell Kent, artist, and Albert E. Kahn, an official of the International Workers Order, an organization listed as subversive by the Department of Justice. (Mr. Rogge has since denounced the Communist invasion in Korea.)

Following this rally, the peace commission of the national committee of the Communist Party of the United States published the itinerary of its campaign as follows:

"July 4: First national mobilization, with mass outpouring to the beaches, camps, resorts.

"August 6: Second national mobilization, the anniversary of the Hiroshima bomb, 1,000 open-air rallies and shop-gate meetings, booths and tables for street-corner collection of signatures.

"September 4: Labor Day mobilization—brigades, caravans, motorcades to rural communities, fairs, countryside.

"October 24: United Nations Day—conclusion of campaign, delegations to UN."

HIGH LIGHTS OF CAMPAIGN

These are the high lights of the Communist campaign. The Communist Party's peace plan, under the slogan, "Every party member a fighter for peace," calls for 1,000 party members to pledge to collect 500 signatures each, 10,000 members to pledge individually to collect 200 signatures, and 20,000 members a minimum of 100 signatures each.

Incentives, in the Russian tradition of Stakhanovism, are not lacking. Those who pledge 500 signatures are known by the party as heroes and heroines of peace. There are also sentinels of peace, and peace stewards.

The campaign is not, however, for the most part done directly by the Communists as Communists, but either through the peace committee or through the Labor Conference for Peace This organization has been formed by Communist-controlled unions and by Communist splinters of other unions.

On July 25, the Labor Conference for Peace advised Andrew Cordier, executive assistant for UN Secretary-General Trygve Lie, that it had collected 1,250,000 signatures for the peace appeal. However, Marcel Scherer, coordinator of the labor conference, quoted Mr. Cordier as stating:

"It is urgently important that the police action in Korea be brought to a quick end. And, if we can bring it to a quick end, the question of the A-bomb becomes academic."

Since the beginning of the Korean hostilities, the peace campaign slogans have been supplemented by the phrase: "Hands off Korea. We want peace."

Coincidental with the Communist Party's efforts, the National Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions—which denies any connection with the Communists—has adopted a five-point peace plan. The council sponsored the cultural and scientific conference in defense of peace which took place at New York's Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in the spring of 1949.

PROGRESSIVES HAILED

At its national convention on April 30, Harvard University astronomer, Dr. Harlow Shapley, retired as chairman and Dr. John H. DeBoer became chairman of the national council.

Three days before, the Moscow newspaper Trud published an article which observed that, although American progressive circles had begun to circulate the Communist appeal, the United States peace front was still weak and feebly organized. The Soviet paper added:

"In the struggle for peace an important part is played by the United States Progressive Party, which unites representatives of the intelligentsia, certain strata of workers, Negroes, farmers, the petty bourgeoisie and middle classes, which stand in opposition to the big monopolies.

"The growing movement for peace throughout the world is a guarantee that the criminal conspiracy of Wall Street against the peoples of the world will be thwarted."

Since then, the Soviet press has reflected that the peace campaign is making good progress in the United States.

The United States Communist Party's peace commission has advised members that "the party's peace campaign is our major task for the next months." The commission added: "It is primary and transcends all other issues and struggles. But the other and very important issues will go on, and the party must learn how to dovetail them, and win them, in the course of the peace campaign."

"If we can reach millions with the peace appeal," the commission observes, "we shall be involving new millions in the success of all other struggles."

Obviously, the Communist—using the innocuous labels of the peace committee, the labor conference, and other organizations—are reaching a relatively wide public with its on-the-surface nonpartisan peace appeal. The signatures of those Americans who signed the peace appeal are scheduled to be presented at a second world peace congress to take place in Italy in the autumn.

On August 8, another article by Neal Stanford in the Christian Science Monitor describes this Soviet peace petition, alias the world peace appeal or the Stockholm resolution as a phony and proves it beyond any possible question of doubt.

The American Communists are adept in this technique of coercion and word-twisting and have deceived all too many good American citizens. I hope and urge that our Committee on Foreign Affairs will schedule an early hearing on House Concurrent Resolution 247 so that the Congress may be given an opportunity in the near future to add its warning and advice to that being given so effectively by the American press and radio, the American religious organizations, the American veterans' organizations, the American labor unions, and other groups in this country.

I hope all my colleagues will note particularly the date set by the peace commission of the national committee of the Communist Party of the United Sates and will recognize that they propose to use Labor Day for their vicious and un-American purposes. That is but 3 weeks from yesterday. I hope it will also be noted that October 24 is scheduled for the date when delegations will be sent to the United Nations. By that date I hope that the united efforts by the executive department, Congress, and patriotic American organizations and groups will result in the elimination from this Kremlin-sponsored petition of the names of everyone except avowed Communists in this country.

The article is as follows:

PEACE PROPAGANDA—AN INTIMATE MESSAGE FROM WASHINGTON

(By Neal Stanford)

WASHINGTON.—The Soviet peace petition, alias the world peace appeal or the Stockholm resolution, is a phony.

Nothing illustrates this better than the following two incidents:

The first concerns the International Congress of Architects that was scheduled to meet in Warsaw this October. A meeting of the executive committee of this international professional body was held in Paris in May. Its purpose was to prepare the agenda and list of activities for the Warsaw meeting.

Presumably, the architectural profession is nonpolitical. At least in noncurtain countries political ideology does not color the professional proclivities of the architectural fraternity. But behind the iron curtain apparently there is no such thing as a nonpolitical vocation or activity.

It has become common knowledge that Communist writers, musicians, and natural scientists are prisoners of the party line. But not until this Paris meeting of the executive committee of the International Congress of Architects has it been made clear that architects in Communist countries are also subject to party discipline.

At Paris the representative of the organization of Polish architects handed down the following two-point ultimatum:

1. The Polish architects cannot continue to participate in the activities of the International Congress of Architects if Yugoslavia continues to be represented;

2. Poland's architects demand that the International Congress of Architects approve the Stockholm peace petition or be branded an organization no longer serving the progress and development of architecture.

Of course the Polish demands that Yugoslavia be thrown out of the organization and that it support the Stockholm petition were unceremoniously rejected. The result was that the Polish representatives, copying the tactics of their Soviet mentors, walked out of the ICA in a huff.

The October meeting of the ICA, it perhaps should be added, is going to take place, but in Paris, not Warsaw.

The Communist technique of coercing groups and individuals to support the Stockholm petition dramatically failed in this instance. But what is perhaps more important, the public got a good look at how Communist propagandists work to line up people and organizations behind the Kremlin's phony peace proposal.

The other incident also involves Poland, and shows how the Communist regime in Warsaw is using the Stockholm petition to win its war with the Roman Catholic Church. It also shows how any agreement with Communists means only what they interpret it to mean.

In the recent church-state agreement in Poland that was supposed to stabilize relations between those two strong forces, it was agreed among other things that the church would use its influence to instill respect for state authorities among the people and work for peace.

Now Communist dogma holds that the Stockholm petition, despite its spurious nature, is a major milestone toward peace, and that all peace-lovers must sign it—if they don't they are considered warmongers.

In Poland the Communist regime has been using this bit of dialectic sophistry to purge Poland's church schools of unsympathetic instructors

This is the technique: The officials call in the church instructors in a locality and ask them to sign the Stockholm pledge. If they demur—as most Roman Catholic priests would do, being aware of the spurious nature of the petition—they are reminded that the church is committed to working for peace; that this is a peace resolution; and that if they refuse to sign it the state has no alternative but to forbid them to continue teaching the young, as apparently peace is no longer their purpose.

By this technique of coercion and word-twisting, the Warsaw regime has forced not a few priests to sign the petition. It then announces to the local populace that the best proof that the peace petition is genuine is that their church leaders have signed it.

By such deceptive and coercive means do the Communists manipulate organizations and individuals in order to present an impressive list of signers to their hypocritical peace appeal.

Wisconsin Central Airlines Franchise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a press release which I issued on an aviation subject vital to my State, namely, immediate renewal of the temporary franchise of Wisconsin Central Airlines.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this statement, which includes a letter which I have directed to the Civil Aeronautics Board, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILEY BLASTS CIVIL AERONAUTICS BOARD'S FAILURE TO RENEW WISCONSIN CENTRAL AIRLINE FRANCHISE

"The strongest possible" protest has been sent by Senator ALEXANDER WILEY (Republican, Wisconsin) to the Civil Aeronautics Board because of its failure to issue an immediate extension of franchise of Wisconsin Central Airlines.

Senator WILEY has denounced the Board's "unfair" decision to follow a lengthy hearing procedure that will take perhaps a year to review the franchise. The time lag, said WILEY, would "leave the airline hanging in mid-air" and would "cripple it."

The senior Senator from Wisconsin pointed out that the CAB's refusal comes at a time when "Wisconsin Central Airlines is prepared to do the finest and most important job that it has ever done in its great record of service to Wisconsin" by handling needs arising out of the present Korean emergency.

WILEY pointed out that 10 Wisconsin cities will be deprived of regular certificated airline service, unless the franchise is immediately renewed. He appealed to the Board to grant a petition for rehearing filed by the airline's attorneys.

"The State of Wisconsin has appropriated a million dollars in the last 2 years in order to improve the airports served by Wisconsin Central. In addition, the various air-minded communities have matched that total. * * * Let not the CAB kick Wisconsin and its communities in the teeth by this crucial decision. We won't stand for it, I assure you."

FULL TEXT OF WILEY LETTER

The full text of Senator WILEY'S letter to Acting Chairman Oswald Ryan reads as follows:

"I am writing to you and to the other members of the Board to respectfully convey my strongest possible recommendation that the CAB immediately kindly reconsider its unfortunate action taken in connection with the Wisconsin Central Airlines. As you know, the Board decided not to issue a show cause order—either favorable or negative, but to hold a hearing at a later date as to the extension of the temporary Wisconsin Central franchise.

"I deeply regret to say that the failure of the Board to issue a favorable show cause order will practically cripple this vital airline. It would in effect be telling the airline to hang in mid-air for a year or so while the lengthy hearing procedure is under way—a sheer impossibility for Wisconsin Central at a time when it is prepared to meet the present emergency by doing the finest and most important job that it has ever done in its great record of service to Wisconsin and our neighboring States.

"Airline must secure larger planes

"The action of the CAB was taken at a time when the airline was prepared to convert to DC-3's to replace the obsolete Lockheed 10-A's. Lacking a favorable show cause order, it will be impossible for the airline (a) to secure private financing to cover the cost of the DC-3's nor (b) could the airline obtain an RFC loan for that purpose.

"DC-3's obviously will be becoming as scarce as proverbial hens' teeth shortly. Speed in their procurement is essential. The airline has done a magnificent job for Wisconsin and its neighbors and to place it in this continued grave jeopardy with inadequate equipment is, I believe, unfair to the State of Wisconsin, to the people and industries of my State, as well as to Michigan, Illinois, and Minnesota.

"It is, moreover, unfair and harmful to the interests of the United States Government itself as will be shown in this letter and as I hope to cite in speaking to you over the phone shortly. I cannot believe that the Board was aware of all the harmful consequences that will now result if your action stands. I realize that the Board is tremendously busy with innumerable actions, but I feel that a reappraisal of the situation is essential.

"May I make the following further points on this issue:

"Airline has done superbly even with small planes

"1. I believe that the Board did not give a fair appraisal to the outstanding record of the airline in view of CAB's constant attempted comparison between Wisconsin Central with its nine-passenger planes and other feeder airlines with their modern 21-24-passenger craft.

"2. It is inconceivable to me that this action of the Board could have been taken in view of the excellent traffic record established by Wisconsin Central (particularly in recent months) which has involved waiting list passengers on nearly every flight. It would appear that the Board's decision was based on the company's traffic prior to its acquisition of up-to-the-minute navigational aids which have tremendously improved its brilliant reliability record of flights completed.

"Wisconsin Central gets only small United States mail subsidy

"3. I invite your attention to the fact that according to the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee report, the airline gets one of the smallest amounts of subsidy of any feeder airline in the United States. It is realized that this determination arises from the fact that Wisconsin Central provides exclusive service to a large number of cities, and it is important to note that the total subsidy received was approximately one-half that which was paid to certain other feeder airlines.

"4. Wisconsin Central is anxious to get the new craft so as to pay its own way insofar as possible rather than to have to appeal to the Federal Government later on for retroactive mail increases.

"CAB is kicking my State in the teeth

"5. The State of Wisconsin has appropriated a million dollars in the last 2 years in order to improve the airports served by Wisconsin Central. In additdion, the various air-minded communities have matched that total. Anyone who has lived in these towns knows what a herculean effort they made to improve their airports—what tremendous financial sacrifices individuals, businesses, and organizations have made in chipping in the total. Let not the CAB kick Wisconsin and its communities in the teeth by this crucial decision. We won't stand for it, I assure you.

"6. I understand that this is the first time in the CAB's history that the Board has failed to come to a show cause order in connection with the renewal of franchises of a feeder airline. I feel that this is a very bad precedent which will harm not only Wisconsin Central but other feeder airlines in the future.

"7. Yes, I cannot conceive that the Board was aware of all of the dangerous consequences of its failure to provide the favorable show cause order. That failure was equally as bad as if the Board had decided to issue a negative show cause order.

"Ten Badger cities will be harmed

"8. If Wisconsin Central Airlines is forced out of business as now looms probable, it will mean that practically every community in Wisconsin will be deprived of vital aviation service with the exception of Madison, Milwaukee, La Crosse, and Eau Claire. The following cities would lose certificated airline service—Oshkosh, Green Bay, Marinette, Clintonville, Stevens Point, Wisconsin Rapids, Wausau, Rhinelander, Land O'Lakes, Beloit, and Janesville. This will prove extremely dangerous to our country, especially in view of the fact that Wisconsin is prepared at the moment to again make tremendous contributions to the national defense effort, as it made in World War II.

"9. I invite your attention to the fact that the Federal Government has poured in hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of dollars into Wisconsin airports in its matching program. Those funds will be comparatively wasted if one Federal agency—your own—decided to persist in its present position. Soon the National Defense Department will be clamoring for Wisconsin goods shipped by air freight, but it too will find that it, as a Federal agency, will have been harmed by the actions of another Federal agency—namely, your own.

"So, may I respectfully urge that you grant the petition for a review of your action and that you further decide to issue an immediate favorable show cause order to Wisconsin Central.

"I know that all the members of the Wisconsin delegation—both Democrats and Republicans, as well as legislators from our neighbor States—join with me in this earnest appeal.

"Thanking you and with all good wishes, I am

"Sincerely yours,

"ALEXANDER WILEY."

Who Aided Korea?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, Russian communism in its march on Manchuria, China, Korea, and the rest of the world is not only aided by the ships paid for by the taxpayers of the United States but the GI's who served in the South Pacific know something about tanks. I am including a letter addressed to me as to what happened in one single instance of some 175 tanks sealed off for American security.

AUGUST 12, 1950.

Representative WEICHEL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: So Russia has our ships.

This comes from a GI who for good reasons must remain nameless.

He was on Okinawa in the maintenance department. Some 175 tanks were sealed up for security.

These tanks were sold to Russia for $12 a ton.

And these tanks are those in Korea. Russian guns only.

I happened to be on a broadcast with a correspondent interviewing a GI. He said to him these Russian tanks are good. "Good," said the GI, "these are the same tanks I—" bang, they went off the air.

Yours sincerely,

The Measure of a Man

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 19, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, it was recently my privilege and pleasure to participate in paying a well-earned tribute to one of Brooklyn's foremost citizens. It was the occasion of his fourteenth anniversary as Democratic leader of the second assembly district, which was coincident with his thirty-eighth wedding anniversary.

In this time of stress, when so many of our acts are determined by the economic pressures which affect our personal needs, it is refreshing to note that there are still many citizens whose daily actions are motivated by the common needs of the community, rather than by their own welfare.

Such a one, I am happy to relate, is one of my neighbors who has devoted his entire adult life to the service of the people of the district in which he resides.

I speak of the Honorable Joseph B. Whitty, the chief clerk of the appellate term of the supreme court of the second judicial district in the State of New York.

He was a close personal friend of the late Franklin D. Roosevelt and Alfred E. Smith, and is an ardent supporter of Senator HERBERT H. LEHMAN and President Harry S. Truman.

As a member of the Democratic State Committee of the State of New York he has sponsored for public office men who have risen to great heights and who have brought credit to their sponsor. These include Supreme Court Justices Joseph Fennelly, Murray Hearn, E. Ivan Rubenstein, and Michael F. Walsh; County Judge Samuel S. Leibowitz, City Court Justice Sylvester Sabbatino, United States District Judge Leo F. Rayfiel, Magistrate Albert D. Schanzer, Commissioner Maurice H. Matzkin, State Senator Louis L. Friedman, Assemblyman J. Sidney Levine, Councilman Edward Vogel, and this humble speaker, as well as a host of others, too numerous to mention.

Mr. Whitty has led every worthwhile civic activity in our neighborhood. He has led the fight for more schools, better housing, veterans' rights, reduction of local assessments, and innumerable similar activities. He has been chairman of the Red Cross drive, the Boy Scout drive, the cerebral palsy drive, the cancer drive, and many other charities. The Democratic meeting rooms at 1634 East Fifteenth Street, Brooklyn, have been made available by him for these and other worthy endeavors as their local official headquarters.

Mr. Whitty has for many years been Chairman of the Christian Committee for Palestine, and has worked closely through the years with Mr. Benjamin G. Browdy, now president of the Zionist Organization of America. He has contributed to and has always been active in Catholic, Jewish, and Protestant affairs of the community.

Such service should not go unnoticed. I am happy to place upon the record this tribute to Mr. Whitty for his selfless service to the community in which we both reside.

The Copper Tariff

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, unity in the national effort at a time of crisis like the present requires that special local interests be laid aside. At this point actions speak even louder than words and pleas for unity sound hollow if not accompanied by performance. American mining communities cannot be harmed today with the great demand that exists for copper in the defense effort by a suspension of the tariff. These are the real points involved in the refusal to continue the wartime suspension of the tariff on copper dealt with in the appended editorial from the New York Times of Thursday, August 10:

THE COPPER TARIFF

On June 30 a tariff of 2 cents a pound on imported copper, suspended during the war, went back into effect. On Tuesday the Senate Finance Committee rejected by 9 to 4 a bill to restore that suspension. This seems to us a short-sighted and ill-advised decision. Copper is one of the most important raw materials in our defense program. The committee has chosen a time when we are facing great inflationary pressure to try to force a cut in our copper imports and add to consumer costs. At the same time, the tariff would deal a hard and unnecessary blow to Chile, where copper is the major export. Peru would also be hard hit, but it could stand the blow better.

Chile is one of our true friends in Latin America and a country that has progressed well toward the sort of democracy we like to see. It is Chile that is leading the move to organize the Latin-American countries into a collective effort for the United Nations in Korea. At the moment, Chilean economy is severely extended by inflationary factors and a reduction of her dollar income would be serious.

W. H. Hoover, president of the Anaconda Copper Mining Co., said last month that a restoration of the 2-cent duty on copper would not materially increase United States production. Chilean copper, he pointed out, is as integral a part of the United States industry as domestic copper. The Chilean industry is, moreover, largely owned by American companies. Of course, there are other American copper companies that want the protection and it is the legislators from mining States, or those who are willing to help them, who are now trying to restore the 2-cent duty. It is not as if the domestic producers have to have this protection to keep going; they cannot produce nearly enough for present American consumption, let alone the strategic stock piling that is now more necessary than ever.

From both the economic and diplomatic viewpoints it is wrong to reimpose the copper tariff. Our good-neighbor policy cannot be measured in dollars and cents but its value is nevertheless enormous. There is no adequate reason today to harm one of the most important Latin-American countries simply to provide some unnecessary help to a United States industry. The decision of the Finance Committee is not final and there is time to reverse it on the floor of the Senate. It would be the part of statesmanship and common sense to do so.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Charles S. Zimmerman, chairman, Trade Union Council of the Liberal Party of New York, embodying a statement adopted by the council to show that the labor movement is actively supporting the American struggle against totalitarian ideology and aggression, but expects to have a full voice in the conduct of the long campaign and to be protected against ruthless exploitation. The letter follows:

TRADE UNION COUNCIL OF THE LIBERAL PARTY OF NEW YORK STATE,
New York, N. Y., August 11, 1950.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We wish to call your attention to the following statement embodied in a resolution passed yesterday by the executive committee of the Trade Union Council of the Liberal Party, embracing more than 250 local unions AFL, CIO, and independent.

This resolution expresses clearly where labor stands on important questions involved in the present emergency and we hope it will help to guide you in your deliberations upon legislation affecting the welfare of the country at this time.

The resolution reads as follows:

"The present fighting in Korea is a matter of the deepest concern to the American workers.

"Korea is the Spain of Asia. To surrender Korea to Communist dictatorship can only be an invitation to world war, just as the surrender of Spain to Fascist dictatorship was the prelude to the last war.

"Korea is also a test for the concept of world peace, enforced through the United Nations. If the Soviet Union, directly and through its satellites, is permitted to defy the UN, then the only instrument in the world for the maintenance of international peace will be destroyed.

"To win the fighting in Korea, therefore, is to advance the peace and to defend democracy.

"To cover the savage aggression of the Soviet Union upon Korea and upon the peace and freedom of the civilized world, the international Communist movement has launched a hypocritical peace petition.

"This petition, timed to reach its height simultaneously with the height of the Korean offensive, is the organized effort of the world Communist movement to exploit the normal peace-loving instincts of all civilized people to clear the way for the Soviet offensive against peace and democracy everywhere.

"If the Communists wished peace, they could have it tomorrow with just one word from the Kremlin. Instead, the Kremlin acts through its satellites in Korea and prepares to act similarly in other parts of the world, while calling upon its Communist Party fifth column in the democratic world to undermine our will to resist aggression by a phony petition of peace.

"Unfortunately for the Soviet Union, their timetable is off schedule. By now, they hoped to have full control of the Korean peninsula. They then hoped to coordinate their peace petition with their chairmanship in the Security Council of the UN to call for a "cease-fire" in Korea.

"The Communist timetable was upset by the prompt and decisive action of President Truman and by the remarkable courage and skill of the American troops in Korea.

"As in the last war against totalitarianism, the trade-unions are prepared to make every possible sacrifice to speed our victory, for only in a democracy can free trade-unionism exist.

"Our democratic ideals, however, demand that sacrifices be shared equally and that no one section of the population shall be made to carry an undue burden.

"Up to the present, labor—along with all others who have fixed incomes—has been made to carry the major cost of the fighting. June 25, the day of our declared stand to resist aggression in Korea, was the date when many businessmen and industrialists jacked up their prices. Overnight the cost of living rose and then rose again, automatically cutting into the living standards of labor. This came at a time when labor's real wage had already been reduced by the increased cost of living during May and early June.

"To check this profiteering at the expense of labor and the consumer, the Trade Union Council of the Liberal Party calls upon Congress and the President of the United States to roll back the price level to May and then to set a ceiling on prices to protect the Nation against inflation.

"Because of the unbalance created by the continuous rise in prices since the first of the year and the special jump in prices since June 25 without any similar rise in wages, we are opposed to a wage freeze at this time. Whatever controls may ultimately be established over wages, there must be readjustments that will bring current wages in line with price increases and that will allow improvement in those trades operating under substandard labor conditions.

"Rents must not be omitted from a system of over-all controls. In view of the present materials shortage that will slow down the already slow-moving building program, it becomes doubly important to reimpose stringent rent controls of a wartime character.

"The Trade Union Council of the Liberal Party is also aware of the fact that the fighting in Korea will involve great costs and new taxes. At this time, the first source of revenue for such fighting must be the war profits which corporations are reaping as a result of the conflict. We resent the talk of taxing incomes, especially lower income brackets now, while postponing action on excess profits until later. A new tax schedule must not be aimed at hitting those whose standard of living has already been hit by price increases, but must be aimed at deriving maximum revenue from those corporations who are profiteering in this struggle.

"The issue in Korea is clear: it is democracy versus dictatorship; it is world peace based on a strong UN versus world war based on Communist aggression.

"In this struggle, we are confident that peace and democracy will conquer. To ensure the maximum coordination of all energies, labor must be given a voice in policy-making and administrative posts bearing upon the national defense.

"As trade-unionists, as liberals, as Americans, we pledge ourselves to guarantee this victory by supporting the fighting forces of peace in Korea and maintaining the fighting morale of democracy at home."

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES S. ZIMMERMAN,
Chairman.

A Farmer Veteran, With Legion Help, Makes Good

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, from the July 1950 issue of the American Legion magazine comes the following story:

HOW THE LEGION FIGHTS FOR THE FARM VETERAN—YOU CAN'T KEEP A GOOD MAN DOWN, THEY SAY, BUT SOMETIMES YOU GO TO BAT FOR HIM

(By Robert B. Pitkin)

If you were a banker what would you do in the following case?

Into your office one morning comes a rangy, young blind man guided by his petite, bespectacled, blonde wife.

"Mr. Banker," the blind man says to you, "my name is John Hayhurst and this is my wife, Ethel. We've just spent all our money to buy a dairy farm, but we don't have any livestock. Will you lend us a couple of thousand dollars so we can get 10 good milk cows and a bull?"

You look at his sightless eyes and ask: "Who's going to run the farm?"

"Ethel and I will run it," Hayhurst tells you.

"I suppose you've had some experience operating a dairy herd?"

"No, sir," says Hayhurst. "I was a factory mechanic before the war. Then I went into the Pacific with the First Cavalry and 2 days before the firing stopped in Manila I lost my eyesight in enemy action. Now I can't stand life in town, so Ethel and I decided we'd make our living in the country."

Your heart sinks at the idea of an inexperienced blind man going into debt to run a dairy farm. Finally you say hopefully, "Ah! Then your wife knows dairy farming."

"Oh no, sir," says Ethel Hayhurst. "It's going to be something new to both of us. I've always lived in town."

"Well," you say, "if your farm is good security, we might put a mortgage on it. But I'd hate to. You're bound to fail and then we'd have to foreclose. So if I lend you the money it would be like taking your farm away from you. Do you want to take that chance?"

"I wouldn't mind at all," says Hayhurst. "However, the farm is already mortgaged. But I get a pension, so Ethel and I and the two kids can keep alive and meet the mortgage with that. Yet if we're going to do better than that we need those cows. We hope the cattle we buy with your loan will help secure our note."

All right. You're the banker. What do you do?

Answer. The Hayhursts are a bad banking risk on the face of things. And live animals are, too, especially when managed by inexperienced people, one of whom is blind. Good, average banking practice requires that you refuse the loan.

However, you might send the Hayhursts to your county supervisor of the Farmers Home Administration, a bureau of the Department of Agriculture.

John and Ethel Hayhurst are real people. In 1948, when no bank would lend them money to buy cattle, they took their problem to J. B. Warner, Van Buren County supervisor of the Farmers Home Administration in Paw Paw, Mich. This FHA has Federal money to lend farmers.

Warner was startled by the Hayhursts' proposition. But he talked it over with a voluntary committee of three county residents. Without approval of such local committees no FHA farm loan can be made.

The committees was startled and said "No."

Then Warner got to thinking the case over and noted a number of favorable things about John and Ethel. They were:

1. John Hayhurst seemed eager to learn, so he would probably make the most of veterans' farm-training courses under the GI bill or Public Law 16.

2. If a loan were made, one of Warner's duties as FHA supervisor would be to help the Hayhursts plan a successful dairy operation.

3. John Hayhurst aimed to make good. Blind, and having spent 18 months in a VA hospital, he was still ready for life.

4. Ethel Hayhurst was a wonderful gamble as a human being. She was the girl back home who waited for John. She married him after he lost his eyesight and had since borne him two children.

5. Hayhurst drew veterans' disability compensation, but refused to be satisfied with it. He wanted to work and produce.

6. John and Ethel had already bought the farm on their own initiative, and it was a good farm.

Warner called on the Hayhursts and together they worked out a sound plan for the management of the dairy herd. And a plan for a budgeting and bookkeeping system. And a plan for the education of John and Ethel as dairy farmers.

Then he went back to the committee, and they finally certified the Hayhursts for $2,500 at 5 percent interest on a 5-year Farmers Home Administration note.

With the money John and Ethel bought 10 milk cows and a bull and began their milk business. They followed the supervisor's farm plan. John and Ethel learned all they could from Department of Agriculture agencies and John took GI bill farm training.

One year later the Hayhursts paid back almost half the 5-year note. They paid $1,100 out of income earned by themselves on their 209-acre farm 9 miles north of Paw Paw, Mich. Today they operate a successful family farm and blind John Hayhurst is carrying a man's share of the work.

You can say the Farmers Home Administration played a long shot when it lent Federal money to the Hayhursts. John and Ethel proved that it only looked like a long shot. And FHA, in 15 years of unusual lending experience, had reason to believe in its method of lending.

You might better say that your Uncle Sam played a long shot with your money when he set up the Farmers Home Administration. This FHA is entrusted with millions of dollars to lend to family farmers whose credit is not good enough to make private loans against their farming needs.

While FHA does not lend to every farmer who cannot borrow from his bank, it may not lend to anyone who can get the credit he needs elsewhere.

But, like John and Ethel Hayhurst, FHA Administrator Dillard B. Lasseter and his staff have proved that their proposition only looks like a long shot. In fact the agency's record of lending your money to farmers who have no credit is so successful, and fills such an important need in America, it has been the official position of the American Legion for several years that the Farmers Home Administration should have more millions than it does to lend in the same way.

The story of the Hayhursts is a fine example of what this FHA does and how it differs from private lending agencies. The Hayhursts are also an extreme example of why FHA exists. People like John and Ethel are the salt of the earth, and they can feed America. But to get started they need credit.

Back in 1935 the Federal Government recognized the unjust credit position of thousands of farmers of good character but little property. It was too often easier to get a private farm loan if you had property but little character.

From a national welfare point of view it is important that our land be in the hands of people who will farm sensibly and take good care of the soil. So there was set up in the Department of Agriculture a bureau called the Farm Security Administration which later became the Farmers Home Administration. It is a bureau which has had a bad time with its initials. As FSA it was the alphabetical twin of the Federal Security Agency, and now as FHA it shares its abbreviation with the Federal Housing Administration. It was and is a lending and teaching agency. Under the Bankhead-Jones Act it gave credit equality to farmers who wanted to be good farmers, and it advised them on good farming practices.

There was an emergency in those early days. The agency worked on a bad farm credit situation that had existed for generations and had become worse as a result of the depression.

But 1944 saw the beginning of a different emergency. Veterans of War II began to return, many of them to seek a livelihood on the farm. Far too many veterans were looked upon as bad banking risks, and it began to appear that America might lose the better part of a generation of farmers.

The American Legion had foreseen this, and it had written, into the GI bill, loan guaranties for farm purchases, and farm operation, as well as farm training courses under VA. The GI bill also stipulated that veterans were to get definite Federal loan priorities under the existing Farmers Home Administration.

Two years later John Stelle, who had been chairman of the Legion's special GI bill committee, was national commander. Fearful for the veteran farmer, he created within the Legion a permanent agriculture committee to keep watch on what actually happened to veterans on the farm. And the new committee saw that the farm provisions of the GI bill were not firing on all cylinders.

In far too many cases banks would not make GI farm loans even under the 50 percent Government guaranty. Good farms and good farm equipment had skyrocketed in price so that where GI credit could be had it was only a beginning. Often, to get a GI loan, the veteran had to make a down payment out-of-pocket larger than he could raise. And as a farmer, the veteran had almost no credit. Private lenders often felt that the veteran had never learned farming or had just spent several years forgetting it.

This was a double-barreled blow to the GI and to the intent of the GI bill. It meant, in many cases, that the veteran who took VA farm training couldn't use it afterward. He had no farm. Or he had a farm without proper equipment.

The Legion and Congress intended that the farm credit and the farm training of the GI bill go hand in hand, and it wasn't working that way entirely. While many veterans were in a position to get full worth from the combined GI loans and training, thousands of others were left with a piece of paper in their hands called the GI bill of rights. These included both the just and unjust, because the root of the evil was not the veteran's worth as a man. It was credit based more on property than on character.

The Legion's agriculture committee watched and saw that one of the soundest and most realistic parts of the GI bill farm program was the little-heralded item that gave veterans a priority for loans under the old Farm Security Administration. That is the agency we met at the beginning of this account. It had just changed its name to the FHA or Farmers Home Administration.

Dillard B. Lasseter had just become Administrator of the FHA. Years earlier Lasseter, a veteran of World War I, had been injured in action and returned home in 1919 to find that in his absence he had been demoted to the bottom of the heap in his State Department job. He thus had personal knowledge of the economic disability that years in service can inflict on a veteran. A member of Atlanta Post, No. 1, of the Legion, Lasseter had never lost his interest in veterans' problems.

In 1946, as head of Farmers Home Administration, Lasseter was busy applying all the veterans' priorities the law demanded in FHA loans. Beyond that he was applying all the veterans' priorities the law and his budget allowed.

His agency was making three loans to GI farmers for every one granted by private lenders under GI bill guaranties. And Lasseter's three were to veterans who could not get GI loans.

Right down to this day that figure still holds. As of last Christmas, GI bill farm loans totaled 53,789. During the same time the FHA had made 155,978 farm loans to veterans.

In 1946, Lasseter's supervisors were out in the field talking to thousands of veteran farmers who couldn't get GI or any other farm loans from banks or loan associations. The procedure was about the same as it was later with the Hayhursts.

Was the veteran intelligent? Was he earnest? Was he serious about good farming? Was he a good farmer? If not, could he learn good farming? Would he learn good farming?

If he wanted to buy or equip a farm, what farm? Was the farm a good producer? If not, was the veteran apt to make it a good producer? If he wanted an operating loan, how did he propose to spend the money?

What was the veteran's plan for operating the farm? Was it a sound plan? If not, would he agree to a plan worked out with him by the supervisor and other Agriculture Department agents? Would he keep financial records properly?

The FHA supervisors looked for the chance of that man making that farm pay.

If satisfied, the supervisor called on the FHA's voluntary county committee. Every agricultural county in the United States has an FHA county committee, and that is nearly every county in the country.

The committee is made up of three reputable county residents, at least two of whom must be successful farmers. The third is often a banker.

They are local people and are never paid anything except per diem expenses while meeting. Presumably they know the farm in question and they know the borrower or his family, or they investigate him. Unless the committee certifies the loan, it cannot be made.

If the loan is certified and made (often it is certified and not made for lack of FHA funds) the supervisor continues to check on the farm operation for the duration of the loan to help the borrower solve his farming problems. FHA makes 100-percent loans with ceilings that vary according to type of loan and locality. The certified farmer need not put up any money himself to borrow the full amount.

How did this system work?

Woodrow Holliman was the first World War II veteran to get an FHA farm-purchase loan in Arkansas. Terms allowed him 40 years to pay. Holliman repaid in 4 years.

Jack Strickland, disabled Navy veteran of Altha, Fla., was a share cropper until he borrowed $9,500 from FHA in March 1947 and bought his own farm. Under terms of his 40-year note he should have repaid $840 by the end of 2 years. By then he had paid back $4,232.91 and increased his net worth from $2,385 to $8,960.

Charles Llewellyn, of Allegany County, Md., and his wife—a city girl—"had only a little household goods, an old car, a few chickens, and some odds and ends of equipment in 1946," says a supervisor's report. "Naturally their assets wouldn't rate them a bank loan, neither would a GI loan meet their needs * * *." But Llewellyn and his wife got an FHA loan to equip the farm they rented and in 3 years they increased their net worth 12 times over.

Charles F. Cline, a single disabled veteran of Ontario, Oreg., made two loans from FHA in 1945. One of them was a $12,000 loan on a 40-year mortgage to buy his farm. In 1946 he paid the installment then due on both loans and also paid the ownership loan for 2 years in advance.

Here's the whole story. Since 1945, FHA borrowers have met 98 percent of payments and interest when or before due. Since 1945, about 28 percent of all farm-purchase borrowers have paid their 40-year loans in full in advance. The rest average 2 years ahead in their payments. And none of them could get the credit they needed locally.

In the combined history of FSA and FHA dating back to the depression years of 1935, the record is not quite so good. It includes the years when the agency was feeling its way, and it includes loans it made when times were much harder on farmers generally. But look at the record.

More than $1,500,000,000 have been lent in 15 years ($1,575,000,000).

Of each dollar lent, 71 3 cents have been repaid, 22 8 cents are not yet due, 5.9 cents are in arrears. Meanwhile, 10.3 cents interest have been paid. Put another way, for every dollar lent "Uncle" can show you a little over $1.04 in the black and a little over a nickel to be collected the hard way. And that's for all borrowers since 1935. The record of the veterans is better.

Most of the old FHA borrowers are now such good credit risks they won't be able to borrow from FHA again. Their banks are doing business with them now.

Watching all this, the American Legion's agriculture committee saw plainly that FHA was doing more good for veteran farmers than GI loans were. It was specifically helping those veterans who were worthy but could not get GI loans. And it had hit on the very best way to use Government millions to reestablish veterans on the farm.

Here was the Government in the lending business without competing with private lenders. Here were millions of dollars of Government money being used to help people—veterans and nonveterans alike—without 1 cent of handout. In fact, "Uncle" was earning interest from the people he helped. And they were feeding the Nation and increasing the national wealth at the same time.

Here was a program which could not be wrecked by boondogglers and which should not be wrecked by the taxpayers' fear of boondogglers. The FHA county committees had proved themselves the best of all safeguards against fly-by-nights and poor farm investments.

The Legion was for this program, and it went to bat for it. The Legion said FHA should have money to lend any man it could certify under its proved system.

But FHA has never had that amount of money. Each year it has had to turn down certified veterans and nonveterans because its money wouldn't stretch far enough.

In 1946 the Legion made enough noise to arouse Congress' interest in the amount of money available for the wave of veteran farmers. The veterans already had a priority but there wasn't enough money even for them, thus their priority was not enough and it was shutting all other farmers out of the program.

As a result $15,000,000 was appropriated to FHA exclusively for loans to veterans. That was not enough, but it was better. The appropriation has never been big enough, although for 4 years now farmers who have borrowed have been putting the money back into the Treasury faster than it has been coming out.

But since 1946 the appropriation has been smaller. In one of those queer "economy" gestures Congress in 1947 slashed FHA's 1948 loan appropriation.

There was no economy, there was even waste. The fixed costs of FHA remained about the same, while the amount of good it could do was reduced. Although the number of veterans FHA could certify in 1948 increased considerably, the number of loans it could make fell off from a third to a half in the major categories of operating loans and ownership loans. The demand for FHA farm loans has risen steadily since the war as more and more veterans completed GI farm training and were ready to go to work.

When the 1948 cut was proposed in Congress in the spring of 1947 the Legion's agriculture committee howled bloody murder. And rightly so.

Charles L. (Farmer) Brown, of Springfield, Mo., was then chairman of the committee. He sent a strongly worded telegram to key Members of the Senate and the House.

It said, in substance: The Legion condemns the cut in FHA lending funds. FHA loans are economic, not political. They do not boost farm inflation, for they are based on production values, not land prices. They are doing the job Congress and the Legion want done on the farm.

Brown also sent the Congressmen a copy of official Legion policy stating that even more, rather than less, such loans should be available to render the best service to worthy veteran farmers, other worthy farmers, and the Nation.

But the cut went through. So, acting for his committee, Brown attacked the job of eliminating the cut the following year. In the winter of 1948 he wrote long and detailed letters to Senators and Representatives in important committee spots.

One old friend in the Senate wrote him and said, "I heartily share in your opinion. * * * You may know that I and other sponsors of this program have had a difficult time every year securing any funds at all for this purpose."

But another Senator said he was afraid of overprotecting the veteran into too heavy a debt load during times of inflation. His motives sounded good, but as Brown had pointed out the year before, FHA had never lent money on farms inflated beyond their productive worth.

However, the Legion and other supporters of FHA were effective, and the foolish cuts were eliminated in 1948 for the 1949 lending program.

Yet the Legion still holds to its original position that even more money should be available. The biggest need for FHA loans is now and in the future, as more and more veterans complete their farm training. There are too many John and Ethel Hayhursts, too many Woodrow Hollimans, too many Jack Stricklands, Charles Llewellyns, and Charles F. Clines still left to whom FHA has to say, "Sorry, no funds." The Legion still asks, "To what better use can we put our millions than to lend them to those who need the money to help themselves, and who will use it to feed us and give us our money back at interest?"

Farmers Home Administration is a Government adventure in capitalism, and the way they work it—it works.

House Joint Resolution 516

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, Under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some information in regard to House Joint Resolution 516:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D. C., August 14, 1950.
Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: Reference is made to conversations between you and the office of the Secretary with respect to supplying certain information in connection with House Joint Resolution 516, which authorizes the President to conclude and give effect to agreements for the settlement of intercustodial conflicts involving enemy property.

Representatives of the Department of State have been in consultation with representatives of the Office of Alien Property and it is understood that the Office of Alien Property is transmitting a memorandum to you which contains the information available to it. The State Department, for its part, desires to submit the following additional information:

Under part IV of the Brussels agreement protection is accorded to American and other nonenemy interests in property outside of Germany owned by German corporations. This is based on the principle which has been urged by this Government throughout the world that nonenemy interests in so-called enemy property are not properly subject to seizure as reparations. The State Department expects that there will be considerable amounts of property in other jurisdictions beneficially owned by United States citizens which would be released upon the adoption of the principles of part IV of the Brussels agreement. The Department of State has never taken a census of United States cases falling in this category: the uncertainties as to the countries involved, as to the exact terms of protection to be accorded, and to the form of the legislation have heretofore militated against such a procedure.

Consequently, the information of the Department of State as to the amounts of property to be released in other jurisdictions is fragmentary and scattered. The Department of State is accordingly most reluctant to make any estimate of this amount, but if you deem it helpful to have some idea of the magnitude of the amount, the Department ventures that a sum in excess of $25,000,000 belonging to American beneficial interests may be involved.

Sincerely yours,
JACK K. MCFALL,
Assistant Secretary
(For the Secretary of State).

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington.
Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: Reference is made to your telephone conversation on August 11, 1950, with a representative of this Department concerning the amounts of property subject to the Brussels agreement relating to the resolution of conflicting claims to German enemy assets.

We are not in a position to answer your inquiry since the administration of enemy assets within this Government is not a function of this Department. It is suggested that any further inquiries with regard to this subject be directed to the Office of Alien Property in the Department of Justice.

Very truly yours,
WM. MCC. MARTIN, JR.,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

WAR CLAIMS COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., August 14, 1950.
Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: Pursuant to your informal request, the War Claims Commission submits the following comment with reference to House Joint Resolution 516, Eighty-first Congress, "Authorizing the President, or such officer or agency as he may designate, to conclude and give effect to agreements for the settlement of intercustodial conflicts involving enemy property."

House Joint Resolution 516, Eighty-first Congress, is a clean bill reported by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, August 1, 1950, and substituted for House Joint Resolution 475, Eighty-first Congress, similarly entitled and with a similar purpose.

The War Claims Commission was requested to comment upon House Joint Resolution 475 and in its report the Commission pointed out that the language in paragraph (3) of the resolution, to wit: "Reimbursement to the United States by other governments pursuant to such agreements shall be administered as vested property, but shall not be subject to any claim under laws applicable to such property" might be construed to prevent the administration of claims authorized by the War Claims Act of 1948 (Public, 896, 80th Cong., July 3, 1948), as amended, against the funds resulting from such reimbursement.

It is noted that paragraph (4) of House Joint Resolution 516, which corresponds to paragraph (3) of House Joint Resolution 475, provides simply that "Reimbursement to the United States by other governments pursuant to such agreements shall be administered as vested property," and omits the objectionable language in paragraph (3) of House Joint Resolution 475.

However, the Commission is not fully satisfied that claims authorized by the War Claims Act of 1948, as amended, are fully protected by the terms of House Joint Resolution 516, and in a communication addressed to the Honorable MIKE MANSFIELD, as of this date, a copy of which is enclosed, recommended certain clarifying language which if incorporated into House Joint Resolution 516 would, it is believed, fully protect the claimants under the War Claims Act of 1948.

The Commission bases its belief that adoption of House Joint Resolution 516 and the conclusion of the proposed intercustodial agreements would accelerate the vesting rate of property under the Trading With the Enemy Act, as amended, and eventually render more funds available to the War Claims Fund, upon testimony given by representatives of the Department of State and the Office of the Alien Property Custodian, Department of Justice, before the Subcommittee on Settlement of Intercustodial Conflicts Involving Enemy Property on July 12, 1950, in the course of hearings on House Joint Resolution 475, Eighty-first Congress. At this hearing it was testified that $60,000,000 to $100,000,000 might be vested under the terms of the proposed agreement.

Sincerely yours,
DANIEL F. CLEARY,
Chairman, War Claims Commission.

Admiral Denfeld

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, several months ago Admiral Louis E. Denfeld was summarily replaced as Chief of Naval Operations. Admiral Denfeld found himself in trouble because he talked very bluntly to a committee of the Congress regarding certain deficiencies in our national defense, which under the Constitution and the law he had a right to do. In this connection I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix to the RECORD an excellent editorial from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of August 2, 1950, entitled "I Told You So."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I TOLD YOU SO

Remember Admiral Louis E. Denfeld? He was the Chief of Naval Operations, who was humiliated and all but kicked out of the service 8 months ago because he dared to talk back to Secretary of Defense Johnson about the Nation's military weakness. He, as the top brass in the Navy, went to the front for the Navy when others were scurrying for cover or saying "Yes" to Johnson or the pliant, supine Mr. Matthews, who still presides over that branch of the service.

Because he believed Congress and the rest of the Nation should be informed as to the deterioration of our national defense, he spoke the truth—and was sacked. He is now in retirement.

Today, as he views what goes on in Korea, he may well say, "I told you so." He isn't doing just that, but as he campaigns for the governorship of Massachusetts on the Republican ticket, he is saying a few things about the way our defense has been handled. And, of course, he doesn't like it.

Talking the other day with Blair Moody, of the Detroit News, he disclosed that in no year since World War II has the advice of the Joint Chiefs of Staff been dominant in deciding what was needed to defend the United States. He told him:

"The first ceiling on the military budget was set by Jimmy Webb (former Budget Director, now Under Secretary of State) and the Budget Bureau, on the basis of what they thought the country would accept. The amount was approved by the President. James Forrestal, as Secretary of Defense, fought it but was overruled. Louis Johnson accepted it and cut it further. Except for the atomic bombing job, it was never enough for any of the three services to do their immediate job in case of trouble.

"Two years ago Forrestal asked each Joint Chiefs member to report what would be needed by his service in case of an emergency. The total was more than $30,000,000,000—which does not seem as high today as it did a month ago. We were told to cut it and got it down to around $23,000,000,000. The lowest budget the Joint Chiefs ever said would be adequate in the last 4 years was $20,000,000,000. This was cut to $18,000,000,000 as a compromise. (The 1950 budget called for $13,000,000,000.)"

Admiral Denfeld emphasizes that the basis of all the defense cuts as applied to the armed services was ill-conceived economy. He says a "passion for economy" denuded Ame-ican forces in the Far East, and it was this "policy of weakness" that prompted Russia to make its move in Korea.

Secretary Johnson, in order to make a showing, cut the "fat" too deep. He reduced the Navy to one combat carrier in the Orient; scrapped the new supercarrier (which we could use today) already under construction; reduced active combat carriers from 8 to 6; reduced active marine combat teams from 11 to 6 (at one time the very life of the Marine Corps was threatened); stood fast against even an approach to the 70-group Air Corps, which the then Air Secretary Symington championed. And he went all out for the B–36 bombers, which haven't dropped a bomb in Korea—and won't.

In justification of Secretary Johnson, it must be remembered that economy was a Washington must. Pressure on Congress was exerted by some of its Members, by the public. The President talked it, urged it for defense, even though he simultaneously refused to preach economy in areas where it could be practiced without weakening the Nation. Johnson at that time had Presidential ambitions; perhaps he still has. If he could make a showing in defense, where billions of waste were suspected, he had a campaign-talking point. The trouble was he cut off too much fat, played favorites—the Air Force at the expense of the Navy. Now the Nation pays in security for his ill-advised and intemperate reductions.

Admiral Denfeld, whom the ordinarily even-tempered General Bradley once referred to as a "fancy Dan," may be excused if he reminisces in some bitterness on what happened when he told us the truth.

Mail Delivery Curtailment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to go on record in support of H. R. 8195, a bill to rescind the Postmaster General's order of last spring which reduced mail deliveries all over the Nation by 50 percent. I urge the House to pass H. R. 8195 without further delay. The mail delivery curtailment was an ill-advised and irresponsible action on the part of the Postmaster General—it has caused much inconvenience to the public, and represents a body blow to the entire postal service. It is the responsibility of Congress to correct this injustice, and the way to do this is to pass H. R. 8195.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an editorial which appeared recently in the Fayetteville Observer at Fayetteville, N. C., which relates to the curtailment of mail deliveries, and which reflects the public's desire for the restoration of previous mail service:

NEW POSTAL BUS: BUT HOW ABOUT TWO CITY DELIVERIES A DAY?

The new postal bus to Florence is going to mean quicker mail service between Fayetteville and South Carolina points just as the postal bus to Greensboro and Warsaw has brought Fayetteville into quicker communication with eastern and central North Carolina.

Employment of the busses represents a shift in mail tastes from railroads to highway and air.

The railroads remain able to render splendid long-distance service, especially with heavier mail, but the trend of the railroads themselves has been to eliminate trains where possible on local runs, such as, for instance, the Fayetteville-Wilmington route.

We look for quicker intercity service from the new busses.

We wish we could look for better intracity service by the restoration of twice-a-day residential deliveries.

It really doesn't do too much good to get the mail quickly from town to town if you hamstring the service between post office and residence.

Proposed Legislation Dealing With Spying, Subversion, and Sabotage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, August 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Truman Discovers Mundt-Nixon Bill," published in the Los Angeles Times.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRUMAN DISCOVERS THE MUNDT-NIXON BILL

In his special message of Tuesday, dealing with spying, subversion and sabotage, President Truman appears to have discovered virtues in the Mundt-Nixon bill, which he has not hitherto been able to see with a telescope. The failure of the administration effort to appease the Communists seems to have enlightened him—and it is high time.

Mr. Truman proposes, in addition to extending the possible period of prosecution for espionage (now 3 years), and protection of military bases, to require registration of "persons who have received instruction from a foreign government or political party in espionage or subversive tactics."

The difference between that plan and the Mundt-Nixon bill, which would require the registration of all Communists and Communist-front organizations, will seem to most people to be in favor of the latter. Mr. Truman's plan would be designed to catch only those Communists trained in sabotage; but what we learn from our agents in the party is that practically everybody in the party is so trained—or at least trained to obey orders without hesitation or question. If there is any advantage in requiring Communists to register, why not register all of them?

In his message, the President gives Congress a long list of laws dealing with espionage, sabotage and conspiracy, already on the statute books; and mentions, in addition to the criminal statutes, the laws governing immigration, naturalization and travel between our country and others. Then there is a set of laws dealing with Government employees, he says, intended to prevent the employment of the disloyal or potentially disloyal. Why these laws are cited, unless their citation is intended as an argument against more stringent legislation, is hard to see. But in urging that there is no need for further stiff legislation against subversives, Mr. Truman places himself and his administration in an embarrassing situation.

If these laws are sufficient, why are we not better protected?

Is it because the statutes are not being properly enforced? And whose fault is that? Mr. Truman and his predecessor have been in charge of enforcement for more than 17 years.

It seems from the message that President Truman would like to see the Mundt-Nixon bill passed, but only if neither MUNDT nor NIXON got any credit for originating it.

Kremlin-Inspired Peace Petition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I am including an excellent editorial and a thoughtful and analytical article by Neal Stanford which appeared in the August 10 edition of the Christian Science Monitor. They follow:

[From the Christian Science Monitor of August 10, 1950]

IS THIS FOR PEACE?

Communist publications all round the world have put great gusto into talking up their so-called Stockholm peace petition, which calls for "banning of the atom weapon."

The signers overlook the fact that the U. S. S. R., by refusal to permit effective inspection, has prevented international control of atomic weapons.

But as interpreted by Leonid Sobelev in Pravda, the resolution has little to do with atomic warfare once it has been signed. He says it means:

"I shall do my utmost to prevent war. I shall stop the trains; I shall refuse to unload the ships carrying war materials; I shall not supply fuel for the planes; I shall seize the arms of mercenaries; I shall not allow my son or my husband to go to war; I shall deprive the ministers of food, drink, telephones, transport and coal."

This pledge plainly is not intended to be observed inside Russia.

Just how peaceful is this avowed "peace" move? Three recent incidents in the British Empire throw a flame-lighted meaning on Sobelev's words.

One was the explosion of nine ammunition barges in the harbor of Portsmouth, England, which Prime Minister Attlee says was the result of sabotage. Another was the setting afire of a string of oil tankers on a river in Burma by incendiary bullets. A third, the starting, assertedly by Communists, of a fire which burned $1,400,000 worth of rubber in Singapore, Malaya.

Are these acts of peace? They are apparently part of the same pattern with a "peace" petition which seeks to prevent the democracies from successfully defending themselves.

[From the Christian Science Monitor of August 10, 1950]

WHO WANTS REAL ATOMIC CONTROL?—AN INTIMATE MESSAGE FROM WASHINGTON

(By Neal Stanford)

WASHINGTON.—Moscow's present "peace offensive" is directed to selling the world the Stockholm resolution.

That resolution, the handiwork of a Communist-organized rally held in the Swedish capital last spring, would:

Condemn atomic aggression—ignoring completely the other forms of aggression

now being practiced by Communists in Korea;

Call for acceptance of the Soviet proposals for atomic energy control—which all the United Nations members, except Moscow and its Communist satellites, have agreed are unenforceable and therefore unacceptable.

In light of the Moscow peace offensive and Stockholm proposal which center so largely on the atomic bomb and atomic controls, the following review of the UN atomic impasse, that shows clearly it is of Russia's, not the west's making, may be in order;

There is a UN majority plan approved by all the non-Communist nations that calls for an international cooperative agency to run all atomic activities on behalf of signatory nations. It would: Own all uranium and thorium from the moment they are mined, through their intermediate processed forms and the refined products until they are finally consumed; own, manage, and operate all facilities using or producing dangerous quantities of nuclear fuel to prevent diversion of nuclear fuels from peacetime to military use; license all nondangerous facilities and activities which are operated nationally; carry on research in all phases of atomic energy; exercise thoroughgoing rights of inspection and survey, subject only to appropriate procedural requirements and judicial review, in order to locate new ore sources, and to prevent or detect clandestine activities. Military reservations would not be exempted from inspection.

This agency would be the servant of the signatories. The principles governing the agency's policies in the production and stockpiling of production facilities would be spelled out in the agency's charter. The treaty would also provide for the prohibition of the manufacture, possession, and use of atomic weapons by all nations party to the treaty and by all persons under their jurisdiction. The treaty would provide for the disposal of existing stocks, would prescribe the stages whereby controls would go into effect, define violations, and provide effective enforcement measures.

This plan rests on two fundamental technical facts that have nothing to do with political ideologies: the first is that atomic energy at present can be derived in significant quantities from only two metals, uranium and thorium; the second is that the production processes of nuclear fuels for warlike or peaceful purposes are identical and inseparable up to a very advanced stage of manufacture.

If these two metals are fully controlled, atomic energy itself is controlled. The release of atomic energy from any other substance depends in the first instance on energy derived from these two metals. Therefore the UN plan—which effectively controls atomic weapons—would apply equally well to a hydrogen bomb.

The Soviet's plan shies away from strong international authority and argues for continuance of atomic operations mainly on a national basis: Atomic weapons would be "prohibited" by a simple agreement based only upon the promises of the signatories; there would be established within the framework of the Security Council, an "international control commission" with powers limited to making recommendations to governments and to the Security Council (any action by the Council could be blocked by a Soviet veto); nations would continue to own, operate, and manage dangerous atomic energy facilities and would continue to own source materials and fissionable materials; atomic plants would be subject to "periodic" inspection, and "normally, inspectors will visit only declared plants." There could be "special investigations," but only when "suspicion of violation arises."

"Periodic" inspections no matter how often could not assure against diversion of nuclear fuel from peacetime to military use. Therefore the UN majority rejects the idea that a force of detectives can prevent diversion, and would require that agency personnel themselves operate atomic plants.

The difference between the UN plan and the Soviet proposals reflects a fundamental cleavage between the aims of the majority and the minority. The free nations put world security first, and are prepared to merge their individual sovereignties in the common interest. The Soviet Union puts its own sovereignty foremost, and rejects measures which might impinge upon Soviet sovereignty or interfere with its rigid exercise.

If the Soviet Union honestly wants to get atomic weapons outlawed and atomic energy controlled internationally it has only to accept the UN majority plan which Moscow and its puppets have blackballed. For the treaty that would put this plan in force would prohibit "the manufacture, possession and use of atomic weapons by all nations," and there would be no loophole in its control plan—as there is in the Soviet scheme.

Last week I reported upon alleged organization in western Massachusetts called the Springfield-Chicopee Minute Women for Peace and I also included timely and constructive editorials from the Springfield Union and the Springfield Daily News. At that time I called attention to a report by one Sidney Lipshires, who describes himself as the secretary of the Communist Party of western Massachusetts. I expressed very substantial doubts that he and the handful of Communists in western Massachusetts could have any real influence over the women of western Massachusetts. He sought to give the impression that some 300 ladies had joined this group. On August 10 the Springfield Union reported upon its efforts to locate the meeting place and report the facts. It is quite consistent with the devious attitude and the consistently false statements made by the Communists to learn that a street address was given where the meeting was to be held but there is no such address in Springfield. It is also a commentary upon the characteristically false statements made by these Communist agents to learn that, apparently, not a single lady attended the meeting if, in fact, there was one. The article is as follows:

[From the Springfield (Mass.) Union of August 10, 1950]

"MINUTE WOMEN" SEEM TO HAVE GONE UNDERGROUND—NO ONE APPEARS TO KNOW WHETHER MEETING HELD LAST NIGHT; MANY LEAVE GROUP

Reduced to a core of three or four members, reportedly without a chairman, the executive committee of the Springfield-Chicopee Minute Women for Peace was to have met last night to take action on the resignation of its president, but even former strong supporters of the league didn't know where the meeting was held or if it was even held at all.

Four of the original eight members of the committee were known to have dropped out of the alleged Communist-party-line organization by last night.

This number includes Mrs. Ann Dorr, president, whose husband, Clyde Dorr, said yesterday he did not think she would be at last night's meeting. He said he thought she was through with the organization and "fed up with the whole thing."

Mrs. Dorr was at her summer home in Holland, and could not be reached.

There was much secrecy among members as to where the meeting was. Most said they did not know. Others said they knew no one else on the committee.

Those who said they have quit the league seemed to be frightened, and afraid their names would again be linked with the organization.

The purported publicity chairman of the committee said the meeting would be at 46 Prince Street, but there is no such address.

The meeting was also to have taken action on Communist Sidney Lipshire's identification of the group's aims with his party's interests. The Minute Women earlier released a statement alleging that critics were trying to accuse them of guilt by association.

A Chicopee Falls woman who was publicity chairman said, "Naturally, I'm glad to be out of it."

Another Chicopee Falls woman said simply: 'I haven't been to any more meetings." She said she just wasn't interested in what the Minute Women had to say.

A Bowdoin Street member said she'd stopped attending the meetings and hoped she was "no longer on the committee."

Still another one-time member said she hadn't attended the last two meetings and was positive she couldn't identify any of the other members, except one.

That one, whom all the women knew, is listed neither in the 1950 city directory nor telephone book. None of the members knew her address. One thought she was "new in town."

One reported she was called by a woman, who served as treasurer of the original committee, and told of last night's meeting. When she said she was no longer interested, there was no mention of the location of the meeting.

It was a question whether the Minute Women for Peace had gone underground or just couldn't function with their members dropping away.

Five of their number were supposed to have been in Washington yesterday to tell President Truman what they thought of United States action in the Korean war and United States silence on the Kremlin-sponsored peace petition. Nobody knew whether they went or returned, and nobody seemed to care much.

In talking to the Springfield Daily News, Mr. Lipshires engaged in another typically Communist swerve. He sought to disassociate the Minute Women for Peace from the Communist Party and denied that he had said the members of that organization were on the Communist side in circulating peace petitions. I think no one except a Communist would take his word for it rather than the report of a reputable reporter. The article is quite right in describing all of this as "much devious reasoning." The article appeared on August 11 and is as follows:

RED CHIEF DENIES ANY LINKS TO MINUTE WOMEN PEACE PLEA—IF FAIR SEX STAND PARALLELS COMMIE PARTY LINE, IT'S JUST COINCIDENCE, LIPSHIRES SAYS

The main thing that the Minute Women and the Communists have in common is that they think alike on outlawing the atom bomb and working for peace, Sidney Lipshires, Communist leader, said today.

Mr. Lipshires was moved to exonerate the Minute Women for Peace of Communist association in connection with the peace petitions they are pushing at the present time. The Minute Women have received considerable publicity, indicating that if they are not alined with the Communists, their ideologies on peace and the atom bomb are at least parallel.

Previously, Mr. Lipshires was quoted as saying the Minute Women were on the Communist side in circulating peace petitions. Mr. Lipshires now denies that he said anything like that in talking with a reporter.

The Communists, he said, support outlawing the A-bomb with strict international control, which is the principle of the Stockholm peace pledge.

The Minute Women want peace and no atom bombs. But their stand, it is said, is purely coincidental, in relation to that of the Communists.

Mr. Lipshires pointed out that everyone, who thinks like a Communist, is not necessarily a Communist. However, Mr. Lipshires in his capacity as a party organizer makes no secret of that fact that he would like to make as many people Communists as possible.

There is a lot more to all this, but much devious reasoning is involved. It suffices to say that even if there had been no Russian revolution, Mr. Lipshires says he would still believe firmly in the principles laid down by Karl Marx.

However, Mr. Lipshires wants to clear the atmosphere about the Minute Women. They are only fellow travelers on peace and the atom by accident, not design.

On the same page of this paper is a report that another veterans' group in western Massachusetts has characterized this as a "phony" peace resolution and warned against signing it. That article is as follows:

STOCKHOLM PEACE PETITION DUPES INNOCENT, AVC WARNS—VETERANS SAY COMMUNIST-FRONT GROUPS PUSHING RED SCHEME TO HOODWINK THE GULLIBLE

Another veterans' group today added its voice to the condemnation being heaped upon the Stockholm peace petition.

The executive board of the local Americans Veterans' Committee issued a statement in which it said: "This phony peace resolution was adopted by the Communist-controlled World Congress of Partisans for Peace on March 19 in Stockholm. It is now being circulated as a petition throughout the world, particularly in the iron curtain countries. The goal is 500,000,000 signatures with 5,000,000 from the United States.

"The Communist Party and front groups are now circulating it in the United States, aided also by many innocent people who seriously desire peace. So far the Communist Party claims 500,000 signatures in the United States, and on June 11 the party directed an all-out effort."

Finally, I want to include another article by Allan Taylor appearing in the New York Times of Sunday, August 13, as follows:

STORY OF THE STOCKHOLM PETITION—A COMMUNIST DEVICE TO TURN OPINION AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

(By Allan Taylor)

For 2 weeks last March a meeting of the permanent committee of the World Peace Congress of Peace Partisans was held in Stockholm. Chairman of the committee was Frederic Joliet-Curie, the French Communist, who was removed as French High Commissioner for Atomic Energy.

The meeting was the culmination of a series of international conferences. The first was a "World Congress of Intellectuals" held at Wroclaw, Poland, in 1948. In 1949 there were a "Cultural and Scientific Conference for World Peace," held at the Waldorf-Astoria, New York, and a "Congress of Partisans of Peace," held in Paris. At all these gatherings the theme was "peace." The participants were Communists or extreme left-wingers.

Stockholm was the grand finale. At the meeting a "peace petition" was adopted. Preparations were made to obtain signatures to the petition throughout the world.

TEXT OF THE APPEAL

This document is headed: Your hand can stop atomic war; sign for peace.

This is the text:

"WORLD PEACE APPEAL

"We demand the outlawing of atomic weapons as instruments of intimidation and mass murder of peoples. We demand strict international control to enforce this measure.

"We believe that any government which first uses atomic weapons against any other country whatsoever will be committing a crime against humanity and should be dealt with as a war criminal.

"We call on all men and women of good will throughout the world to sign this appeal."

Accompanying the text of this petition—now being distributed in the United States—is a statement to the effect that millions of people of all faiths, creeds, and races are signing and that "if we the people say no to war there will be peace." Quotations from a number of prominent persons in support of peace are appended.

The world peace appeal of the peace partisans has become a major weapon of Russian propaganda against the west. In Moscow the official party journal, Pravda, laid down the dictum that anyone in any country who refused to sign the petition automatically exposed himself as "an accomplice and henchman of the warmongers."

The Communist parties on all the continents have made extraordinary efforts to obtain signatures to the petition. Left-wing labor groups, idealists, and people whose hatred of war exceeds their knowledge of Soviet tactics have been marshaled to roll up the peace vote.

Last week the first comprehensive results of this immense effort were disclosed. In Paris M. Joliot-Curie, the committee chairman, announced that the Stockholm peace petition had been signed by 273,470,566 persons. This is one-eighth of the human race.

TABULATION BY COUNTRIES

Analysis of where the bulk of the claimed vote comes from reveals some interesting facts. One is that the vast majority of the signers live in countries behind the iron curtain. The ratio between populations and signers of the peace petition in some of the principal countries is shown in these figures:

	Population	Signers
U. S. S. R.	193,000,000	115,275,000
Poland	24,500,000	18,000,000
Czechoslovakia	12,500,000	9,500,000
Hungary	9,300,000	7,500,000
Bulgaria	7,200,000	5,801,346
Korea (North)	9,000,000	5,680,000
China	463,000,000	44,000,000
East Germany	18,500,000	17,046,000
West Germany	49,700,000	2,000,000
France	41,200,000	12,000,000
Italy	46,000,000	14,631,523
Great Britain	50,500,000	780,277
India	347,000,000	127,389
Japan	83,000,000	1,345,000
United States	150,000,000	1,350,000

The complete list of national totals is an indication of how and where most of the signatures were obtained. These are some sidelights:

1. Of the world total, 235,000,000—or 86 percent—came from Communist-dominated countries—Russia, China, eastern Germany, and the various Soviet satellites. The Soviet Union alone is said to have rolled up 100,000,000 signatures in a 2-week period. This was after the supreme Soviet had made it plain that signing was the thing to do by giving the petition its own unanimous endorsement.

2. Some of the Soviet satellites did even better at signing up than the U. S. S. R. In east Germany, for example, the announced total of signatures equals over 92 percent of the whole population, infants included.

3. Western Europe contributed 32,000,000 signatures. Italy and France—which together contain only a third of western Europe's people but have strong Communist Parties—supplied 80 percent of the west European total. No signatures were reported from Spain or Portugal. Yugoslavia didn't furnish any, either.

4. The non-Communist countries of Asia provided 2,868,000 signatures, most of them from Japan and Burma. Only 1 person out of every 2,700 in India signed. The African total (reported only from Algeria, Morocco, and Egypt) was about 300,000.

5. The Western Hemisphere contributed 3,850,000 signatures from 11 reporting countries. The largest totals came from the United States, Argentina (1,000,000), Brazil (600,000), Cuba (400,000), and Canada (300,000). Claimed signatures from the United States indicated that an average of 1 person out of every 111 Americans signed.

EXPLOITED IN COMMUNIST PRESS

The peace appeal is still being trumpeted in the Communist press everywhere. The Daily Worker in New York has been giving considerable space and big headlines to the petition and to peace meetings throughout the country.

The August 4 issue of the weekly organ of the Cominform, published in Bucharest, gave the leading position on its front page to a series of items about the petition. These told of huge rallies in France, Italy, and Brazil, and of mounting success in obtaining signatures in Finland, Australia, and the United States. The names of several prominent American signers, including a Nobel Prize winner and a justice of the Utah Supreme Court, were listed.

Famous names have been thoroughly exploited. Among the signers claimed by the sponsors are Dr. Oswaldo Aranha of Brazil, former President of the United Nations General assembly; Lazaro Cardenas, former President of Mexico; Vittorio Orlando, former Premier of Italy; Thomas Mann; George Bernard Shaw; Henri Matisse, and Pablo Picasso. Some of the well knowns have denied signing and some have withdrawn their names. But many remain.

The ultimate destination of the signed petitions is something to be determined by committee members in the various countries. Members of the committee in the United States are O. John Rogge and W. E. B. DuBois. The latter is head of the Peace Information Center in New York which is distributing the petition. They are delivering the signatures to the United Nations Secretariat. In most other nations the signatures are sent to the central government as votes for peace.

Why so many millions of people have been persuaded to sign their names to the Stockholm appeal calls for examination. Some light is thrown on the question by the size of the poll in the various world areas.

Persons who make it their business to sample public opinion note that the United States total of 1,350,000 signatures far exceeds the estimated number of Communists and fellow travelers in this country. They believe that many of the signers are idealistic people who are horrified by the thought of atomic war—but who haven't thought much beyond that. In addition, there are a certain number of people in any community who will sign virtually anything they are asked to sign, without close examination.

Abroad, there are other factors at work as well as these. In Europe and Asia millions of confused, war-weary people dread the prospect of an atomic conflict in which their own lands would be battlefields. There is suspicion, exploited by the Communists, that the United States and the Soviet Union are engaged in a struggle to the death for world domination. Many of the signers of the petition want, above all things, to be neutral in the war they foresee. Communists are doing all they can to further this idea.

These general interpretations of west European reactions are borne out by on-the-spot observations by correspondents of the New York Times.

WHAT IS RUSSIA'S MOTIVE?

Why has the Soviet Union gone to such lengths to circulate its peace appeal and publicize the claimed results? Why has so much effort been expended to befuddle world opinion?

Two suppositions are advanced to answer the questions. One is that the Kremlin, realizing the depth of the fears and uncertainties aroused throughout the free world by the present international situation and awful threat of atomic conflict, is seeking to weaken the resolution of its adversaries by the same "upside down" arguments it has advanced in the Security Council debate over the Korean war. Millions of people hate war and want peace; if the United States can be pictured as a warmonger eager to use the A-bomb, potential allies will be alienated and discord will be sown in the United States itself.

The other supposition is that the Russians greatly fear the American lead in the atomic field. Winston Churchill has said that the United States stockpile of A-bombs is the only thing that has prevented a full-scale Soviet invasion of Europe. If the Russians could somehow muster sufficient world opinion to weaken America's determination to use its chief present defense against Soviet aggression, the Kremlin's ambitions might be more easily realized. And Russia itself would escape the dire penalty of its actions.

Statements About Black-Eyed Peas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some letters concerning black-eyed peas:

LOS ANGELES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
January 6, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your recent letter in regard to black-eyed beans produced in California.

The California acreage of black-eyed beans are grown as dry beans. Practically all the production is shipped to the Southern States. The main California producing areas are the Ojai Valley, Camarillo in Ventura County, San Fernando Valley and similar valleys in Los Angeles County, the hilly areas of Orange County, and Riverside and San Bernardino Counties.

If we can be of further assistance, please feel free to call on us again.

Very truly yours,

LA ROY DUVALL,
Agricultural Consultant.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your several letters regarding black-eyed peas.

The information on production is not fully comparable as California production is on the basis of dry weight whereas Texas production is on green measure. The latest information available is for 1948 when California produced 1,087,000 hundredweight and Texas 720,000 bushels.

We enclose a press release which explains the various names under which this commodity is known. There is no price support for cowpeas under any name.

Sincerely,

A. J. LOVELAND,
Under Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., December 15, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I am in receipt of your letter of November 30 regarding the production of black-eye peas. Production estimates of black-eye peas are made only for the State of California. In that State they are classed as beans and are commonly called California black-eyes. They are, however, the same type as the black-eye peas grown in Texas and other Southern States. In all producing States, except California, black-eyes are included in the estimates of dry cowpeas. No estimates are made of the quantities used fresh or canned as green peas.

It is our understanding that a large part of the canned black-eyes are produced in Texas, although there are small quantities used fresh and for canning in the other Southern States. The extent to which black-eyes are harvested for canning in Texas is largely dependent upon the moisture conditions during the summer months and, of course, the market price of the peas. Even in years of heavy production the quantity of black-eyes harvested dry in Texas and the other Southern States is much below that of California.

The 1947 production of black-eyes in California was estimated at 638,000 bags (100 pounds) of cleaned dry "beans." In 1948, the production was 1,087,000 bags of cleaned "beans." An estimate of the 1949 production of California black-eyes will be issued on December 19.

Sincerely yours,

K. T. HUTCHINSON,
Assistant Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your several letters regarding black-eyed peas.

The information on production is not fully comparable as California production is on the basis of dry weight whereas Texas production is on green measure. The latest information available is for 1948 when California produced 1,087,000 hundredweight and Texas 720,000 bushels.

We enclose a press release which explains the various names under which this commodity is known. There is no price support for cowpeas under any name.

Sincerely,

A. J. LOVELAND,
Under Secretary.

FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY,
FOOD AND DRUG ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., August 25, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: We have your letter of August 17 asking that a comparison of the food value of green peas and black-eyed peas be made based upon the data furnished you by the Department of Agriculture.

As we are sure you will appreciate, the nutritive value of a food is dependent upon a wide variety of factors. The tables which you obtained from the Department of Agriculture list the principal factors, but there are of course other important ones for which no data are given. A careful study of the available information reveals that there is no nutritionally significant difference in the food value of these two products. When consideration is given to the manner in which these foods are consumed and the normal variations which might be expected in their nutritional content each food would serve essentially the same purpose in the diet. The quantity of protein, fat, and carbohydrate in each food is essentially the same. Both products are regarded as a significant source of protein and carbohydrate. The fat content is insignificant. The quantities of calcium, phosphorus, and iron which are important minerals for man are likewise present in both products in essentially the same quantities. This is also true of the vitamins for which data are furnished.

Sincerely yours,

L. D. ELLIOTT,
Associate Commissioner of Food and Drugs.

STOKELY FOODS, INC.,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I am returning the statistics on black-eyed peas. I appreciate your sending me this information.

As you know, we recently installed a packing operation in Dallas, Tex. We intend to pack black-eyed peas at that plant if we are able to obtain favorably raw produce in an area not too distant from the plant.

For your information, we have already started packing Van Camp pork and beans at this plant, and will pack in the near future other Van Camp products for distribution in the State of Texas. We look forward to a very successful operation in Texas.

Kindest regards.

Very truly yours,

ALFRED STOKELY,
Assistant to the President.

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
Washington, D. C., August 14, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in response to the request from your constituent, Publisher A. C. Pat Mayse, Paris, Tex. Mr. Mayse requested information concerning the number of canning plants in Texas which can black-eye peas and also the number of such canning plants in the Third Congressional District. He also requested statistical data concerning the planted acreage of black-eye peas and the average value of the crop in Texas.

According to information supplied by the National Canners Association, 33 firms in Texas reported that they intended to can peas (black-eye, cream, crowder, and purple hull varieties) during 1949. However, the total number of individual canning establishments may have exceeded this number since each firm may have operated more than one canning plant. Published data indicating the number of plants operating in each county are not available.

Harvested and planted acreage and production data are not available for black-eye peas. The Department of Agriculture does not report acreage and production data separately for each variety of peas.

The National Canners Association reports that during 1949 canners packed a total of 1,234,178 cases of peas (black-eye, cream, crowder, and purple hull varieties) in the United States. During that same year canners in Texas canned 976,267 cases of peas, including black-eye, cream, crowder, and purple hull varieties.

For information relative to the United States Standards for Grades of canned field peas and canned black-eye peas we are attaching pages 1539-40 of the March 18, 1950, Federal Register.

We trust that the information given above will be satisfactory.

Sincerely yours,

ERNEST S. GRIFFITH,
Director, Legislative Reference Service.

TITLE 7. AGRICULTURE—CHAPTER I. PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION (STANDARDS, INSPECTIONS, MARKETING PRACTICES), DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

PART 52—PROCESSED FRUITS AND VEGETABLES, PROCESSED PRODUCTS THEREOF, AND CERTAIN OTHER PROCESSED FOOD PRODUCTS

Subpart B—United States standards for grades of processed fruits, vegetables, and other products

United States Standards for Grades of Canned Field Peas and Canned Black-eye Peas

On September 23, 1948, a notice of rule making was published in the Federal Register (13 F. R. 5530) regarding proposed United States Standards for Grades of Canned Field Peas and Canned Black-eye Peas (7 CFR 52.538). After consideration of all relevant matters, including the proposals set forth in the aforesaid notice, the following United States Standards for Grades of Canned Field Peas and Canned-Black-eye Peas are hereby promulgated under the authority contained in the Agricultural Marketing Act of 1946 (60 Stat. 1087; 7 U. S. C. 1621 et seq.) and the Department of Agriculture Appropriation Act, 1950 (Public Law 146, 81st Cong., approved June 29, 1949):

SEC. 52.538. Canned field peas and canned black-eye peas—(a) Identity: (1) "Canned field peas" means canned field peas as defined in the definitions and standards of identity for canned vegetables (21 CFR, Cum. Supp. 52.990) issued pursuant to the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act.

(2) "Canned black-eye peas" means canned black-eye peas as defined in the definitions and standards of identity for canned vegetables (21 CFR, Cum. Supp., 52,990), issued pursuant to the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act.

(3) "Canned peas" means canned field peas or canned black-eye peas.

(4) "Snap" or "snaps" means a piece or pieces of immature unshelled pods.

(5) "Canned peas without snaps" means canned peas which do not contain immature unshelled pods or pieces thereof.

(6) "Canned peas with snaps" means canned peas which contain pieces of immature unshelled pods.

(7) "Unit" means an individual field pea or black-eye pea or a piece of immature unshelled pod of either.

(b) Grades of canned peas: (1) "U. S. Grade A" or "U. S. Fancy" is the quality of canned peas that possess similar varietal characteristics; that possess a normal flavor and odor; that are fairly young; that are practically free from defects; that possess at least a fairly good color; and that score not less than 85 points when scored in accordance with the scoring system outlined in this section.

(2) "U. S. Grade C" or "U. S. Standard" is the quality of canned peas that possess similar varietal characteristics; that possess a normal flavor and odor; that possess a fairly good color; that are nearly mature; that are fairly free from defects; and that score not less than 70 points when scored in accordance with the scoring system outlined in this section.

(3) "U. S. Grade D" or "Substandard" is the quality of canned peas that fail to meet the requirements of "U. S. Grade C" or "U. S. Standard."

(c) Recommended fill of container: The recommended fill of container is not incorporated in the grades of the finished product since fill of container, as such, is not a factor of quality for the purpose of these grades. It is recommended that each container of canned peas be filled with field peas or black-eye peas as full as practicable without impairment of quality and that the product and packing medium occupy not less than 90 percent of the total capacity of the container.

(d) Recommended drained weight: The drained weight recommendations in table No. 1 of this paragraph are not incorporated in the grades of the finished product since drained weight, as such, is not a factor of quality for the purpose of these grades. The drained weight of canned peas is determined by emptying the contents of the contained upon a No. 8 sieve of proper diameter and allowing to drain for 2 minutes. A sieve 8 inches in diameter is used for the No. 2½ size can (401 x 411) and smaller sizes; and a sieve 12 inches in diameter is used for containers larger than the No. 2½ size can.

[Recommended minimum drained weight, in ounces, of field peas, or black-eye peas, including snaps when canned with snaps]

Container size or designation:	Ounces
No. 1 (Picnic)	7
No. 1 Tall	10½
No. 300	9¼
No. 303	11
No. 2	13¼
No. 10	72

(e) Ascertaining the grade: (1) The grade of canned peas may be ascertained by considering, in conjunction with the requirements of the respective grade, the respective ratings of the factors of color, absence of defects, and character. The relative importance of each factor is expressed numerically on the scale of 100. The maximum number of points that may be given each factor is:

Factors:	Points
(i) Color	20
(ii) Absence of defects	40
(iii) Character	40
Total score	100

(2) "Normal flavor and odor" means that the canned peas are free from objectionable flavors and objectionable odors of any kind.

(f) Ascertaining the rating of each factor: The essential variations within each factor are so described that the value may be ascertained for each factor and expressed numerically. The numerical range within each factor is inclusive (for example, "15 to 20 points" means 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, or 20 points).

(1) Color: (i) Canned peas that possess a good color may be given a score of 15 to 20 points. "Good color" means that the canned peas possess a fairly uniform color and are typical of fairly young field peas or black-eye peas of similar varietal characteristics.

(ii) Canned peas that possess a fairly good color may be given a score of 10 to 14 points. "Fairly good color" means that the canned peas possess a color that may be variable and typical of nearly mature field peas or black-eye peas of similar varietal characteristics.

(iii) Canned peas that are definitely off color for any reason or fail to meet the requirements of subdivision (ii) of this subparagraph may be given a score of 0 to 9 points and shall not be graded above U. S. Grade D or Substandard, regardless of the total score for the product (this is a limiting rule).

(2) Absence of defects: (i) The factor of absence of defects refers to the degree of freedom from extraneous vegetable matter, from loose skins and pieces of skins, loose cotyledons and pieces of cotyledons, mashed or broken units, and units blemished by pathological injury, insect injury, or other means.

(a) "Extraneous vegetable matter" means hulls or pieces of hulls, unshelled pods or pieces of unshelled pods (except in peas canned with snaps), leaves, stems, and other similar vegetable matter.

(b) "Mashed or broken" means seriously crushed so that the unit has lost its original conformation or is broken to the extent that a cotyledon or portion thereof has become separated from the unit.

(c) "Blemished" means discolored or spotted by pathological injury, insect injury, or other means to such an extent that the appearance or eating quality of the unit is materially affected.

(ii) Canned peas that are practically free from defects may be given a score of 35 to 40 points. "Practically free from defects" means that for each 12 ounces drained weight of units there may be present not more than 2 pieces of extraneous vegetable matter, and the combined weight of all loose skins and pieces of skins, loose cotyledons and pieces of cotyledons, and mashed or broken units does not exceed 5 percent, and the weight of blemished units does not exceed 2 percent of the drained weight of the canned peas.

(iii) If the canned peas are fairly free from defects, a score of 30 to 34 points may be given. Canned peas that fall into this classification shall not be graded above U. S. Grade C or U. S. Standard, regardless of the total score for the product (this is a limiting rule). "Fairly free from defects" means that for each 12 ounces drained weight of units there may be present not more than 4 pieces of extraneous vegetable matter, and the combined weight of all loose skins and pieces of skins, loose cotyledons and pieces of cotyledons, and mashed or broken units does not exceed 10 percent, and the weight of blemished units does not exceed 6 percent of the drained weight of the canned peas.

(iv) Canned peas that fail to meet the requirements of subdivision (iii) of this subparagraph may be given a score of 0 to 29 points and shall not be graded above U. S. Grade D or Substandard, regardless of the total score for the product (this is a limiting rule).

(3) Character. (i) This factor refers to the tenderness and maturity of the canned peas.

(ii) Canned peas that are fairly young may be given a score of 35 to 40 points. "Fairly young" means that the units are tender and in a fairly early stage of maturity.

(iii) If the field peas or black-eye peas are nearly mature, a score of 30 to 34 points may be given. Canned peas that fall into this classification shall not be graded above U. S. Grade C or U. S. Standard, regardless of the total score for the product (this is a limiting rule). "Nearly mature" means that the units are fairly tender and may be mealy but not hard.

(iv) Canned peas that fail to meet the requirements of subdivision (iii) of this subparagraph may be given a score of 0 to 29 points, and shall not be graded above U. S. Grade D or Substandard, regardless of the total score for the product (this is a limiting rule).

(g) Tolerances for certification of officially drawn sample: (1) When certifying samples that have been officially drawn and which represent a specific lot of canned peas without snaps or canned peas with snaps, the grade for such lot will be determined by averaging the total scores of all containers if:

(i) Not more than one-sixth of the containers comprising the sample fails to meet all the requirements of the grade indicated by the average of such total score, and with respect to such containers which fail to meet the requirements of the indicated grade by reason of a limiting rule, the average score of all containers in the sample for the factor, subject to such limiting rule, must be within the range for the grade indicated;

(ii) None of the containers comprising the sample falls more than 4 points below the minimum score for the grade indicated by the average of the total scores; and

(iii) All containers comprising the sample meet all applicable standards of quality promulgated under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act and in effect at the time of the aforesaid certification.

(h) Score sheet for canned field peas and canned black-eye peas:

If's Won't Win the War, but—

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. JENISON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. JENISON. Mr. Speaker, only a complete understanding of the requirements for victory can weld the military might necessary for victory over the forces of aggression now arrayed against us. Dwelling on the mistakes of the past will not do it. Yet we must be mindful of those costly errors in shaping present and future policy.

Two writers of distinguished reputation have voiced a similar theme within as many days. What they have to say seems of such obvious importance as to merit the thoughtful attention of every Member of Congress. For that reason, under permission granted by the House, I am including for the RECORD current articles by David Lawrence and Robert C. Ruark. They follow:

FEW IF'S, WRITER SAYS, COULD HAVE CHANGED SITUATION IN KOREA—SIX ADDITIONAL AIRCRAFT CARRIERS AND FOUR BATTLESHIPS WOULD REVERSE PICTURE

(By David Lawrence)

This is the story of what just a few "if's" could have meant to the fathers and mothers of those boys who are fighting against great odds in Korea and to the fathers and mothers of those boys soon to fight—they all should know more about why the battles have been going against us.

1. If, in addition to the 3 big aircraft carriers in the Pacific, 6 more were in operation off the coast of Korea—and we have available 17 large-sized and 60 smaller-sized carriers still in mothballs—there would conceivably be no loss of the port of Pohang today and no loss of the valuable airstrip behind it, thus leaving us only one field behind our lines in South Korea.

2. If, along with the light cruisers and destroyers, there was in Korean waters a division of four battleships—we have several in mothballs—there would not be a railroad operating within 12 miles inland on either coast and no substantial amount of supplies would be able to move down from North Korea, Russia, or Communist China. The big 16-inch shells of the battleships, firing from short distances off shore with unerring aim in all kinds of weather, can do more damage by steady bombardment than can be done by similar weight projectiles dropped indiscriminately from high altitudes by the large bombers at infrequent intervals. If the battleship Missouri had only been stationed in the Far East, the news would be different today.

3. If there were 9 big aircraft carriers off the Korean coasts with a total of approximately 900 planes aboard, there could be 24-hour bombing and strafing and air artillery support given to our ground troop movement. As it is, the enemy moves men and supplies at night and we do not have enough planes there with those flares giving a huge candlepower of illumination to carry on strafing and bombing around the clock.

AIRCRAFT CARRIERS NEEDED

4. If enough of the big aircraft carriers of the Navy were in Korean waters, the ground troops would not have to worry about protecting the only two airstrips they have had behind their lines. For planes dependent on ground bases alone must remain there for servicing part of the time and this leaves them open to attack by enemy artillery or planes. The aircraft carrier, on the other hand, moves its floating base offshore at will and is ready 24 hours a day to attack or defend itself because it gets a vast amount of antiaircraft protection from the cruisers and destroyers that surround it in what is known as carrier task force.

5. If the American people had been properly informed, they would never have consented to the sabotage of naval aviation carried on during the last 3 years by the generals in the Pentagon and their civilian Secretary supporters who placed all the emphasis on intercontinental bombing over the Atlantic and forgot the 8,000-mile distances in the Pacific and its trouble areas.

Some of the same misconceptions which resulted in mistaken policies before the Korean war are being perpetuated today in the news dispatches and official communiqués. The work of all airmen is lumped together and the same stories are widely printed as heretofore about the weight of the total number of bombs dropped—as if this has anything to do with the effectiveness of the fire if targets are missed as they were repeatedly by high-flying bombers in the last war and as official reports and surveys testified.

The recent news dispatches and official releases do not clearly differentiate, for example, between the frequent and numerous sorties flown by naval air force fliers from the decks of carriers just a few miles offshore and the fewer sorties necessarily flown from distant bases in Japan at less frequent intervals and with less time over the targets by Air Force fliers.

NOT GETTING PROPER CREDIT

The Air Force isn't getting proper credit for these hazardous missions. In the announcements, the total of the sorties is combined and the public doesn't know what each service is doing—and Congress is not learning what to provide to strengthen our air power in all its phases.

There is needed a definite designation for the Navy flyers. They have a right to be given a separate name, such as the United States Naval Air Force. The news dispatches and official communiqués should enable the reader to identify these three different air operations:

1. Flying from Japanese land bases, the high-flying strategic bombers of the Air Force when engaged in strategic bombing or medium bombers when engaged so bravely in strafing for which they are not fitted. Such hazardous and extraordinary missions deserve great praise.

2. Air support for ground troops furnished by Marine Corps aviators flying from the decks of naval carriers, and the naval flyers also from these carriers.

3. Low-level dive bombing of a strategic nature by the aviators of the Naval Air Force flying from the broad decks of aircraft carriers. These flyers stay over the targets for hours at a time because they do not have to fly back long distances and they fly low enough to see what they are aiming at. They do not, moreover, kill noncombatants unless the latter happen to be right at the targets, and this is something of growing importance if the Korean population isn't to be turned against us because of indiscriminate bombing from high altitudes.

These three differentiations are necessary also to build up the morale and fighting spirit of each of the three services engaged in air operations to stimulate the Reserves in training, and to help recruiting.

OUT OF THE LABS BY TOMORROW AFTERNOON

(By Robert C. Ruark)

NEW YORK.—We see now in big black headlines the first semicheerfulness from Korea, and also that the Marines have called up their entire volunteer Reserve. We seem to be fairly glad to have the boys aboard again, to demonstrate, as ever, the value of know-how when you need it.

In light of our present appreciation of the gyrenes it is wryly amusing to reflect that a few short months ago the decimation of their force, as fighters, was contemplated in Washington. The idea was to whittle them down to a color-guard status, because in the new pushbutton warfare we were not apt to need them.

This was at a time when we were also deciding the Navy had about outlived itself, except as a transport organization, the carrier was obsolete, and that the dogface had seen his day. As I recall the words of the Air Force laddybucks, the atom bomb and the B–36 could handle anything we had to handle.

Push-pull. Click-clack. The new world war will be over in a day or so. Push the button and pull that cord, and we'll have the boys out of the laboratories by tomorrow afternoon. The Korean war began on June 25, and it has taken a late-blooming consignment of outmoded leatherheads to spark the first real counterattack.

There is a frightening repetition to the presence of the Marines on Korea. These babies are the same bunch that straggled ashore on Guadalcanal 8 years ago to fight the knife-and-carbine war with the Japs, who also knew how to infiltrate and decoy. Those were good Japs, elite troops, on Canal. They were imperial marines who had their dress blues with them, to wear on Geary Street when they took San Francisco. Our leathernecks were useful then, and will be extra useful now. The 50,000 men who have been immediately called up, and the 30,000 tough boys behind them, are the hard-bitten old-stagers of the Pacific war. They are the seasoned men who can fight you a delaying action while the unwieldy draft gains impetus, and the children are taught the rudiments of staying alive in combat.

If it tells you nothing else, the reversion to foot soldier, bayonet, foxhole-and-tail-back war, greatly disputes the wisdom of our military wiseheads who got so enmeshed in intramural strife they were willing to sacrifice practicality for political expediency.

We were the big production kids, the A-bomb and H-bomb boys, the round-the-globe-airplane, all-purpose Buck Rogers, but I hear tell it will take us 2 years to get that good tank into practical usage—and that only a half dozen of the effective big bazookas were immediately available on Korea.

This foul-up ought to have preached a bitter lesson, which we may do well to remember, amidst the mouthings of the scientists and the political appointees and new-fledged experts and high military officials with both eyes pinned beadily on appropriations.

So long as wars are fought, we will need an even balance in force. So long as wars are fought we will need sailors and soldiers and marines and airmen. The bayonet is still an important weapon, and no one segment of the whole is bigger than any other branch. And no self-seeking politico, be he civilian or military, is any wiser about the future's needs than the last batch of guys who struggled through the mud and the blood.

Reactions in Europe to Events in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 14 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, late last week Mr. Howard K. Smith, the noted author, war correspondent, and radio broadcaster, reported from London over the Columbia Broadcasting System on the reactions in Europe to the recent events in Korea. He described the tremendous wave of support which American policy had attracted, the support which led the United Nations to assume sponsorship of the resistance to Communist aggression. Mr. Smith also reported on some of the less favorable aspects of the picture, most notably the adverse European reaction to the recent vote for a loan to the Franco regime in Spain.

Mr. Smith's report provides food for thought. I commend this broadcast to the attention of the Congress. I ask unanimous consent that the transcript of Mr. Smith's remarks be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Seven weeks ago, when the Korean war began, a lot of heartfelt praise flowed over the Atlantic from Europe to the United States for America's prompt virile response to an act of aggression. This week, by rights, a good deal of that praise should be making the return journey from America to Europe. The United States has called on governments over on this side of the Atlantic to cooperate in creating a strong defense force for the west and Europe has responded with more speed and resolution than democracies have ever yet reacted with to an emergency not directly on their own frontiers.

Here in London, night before last, the first meeting of the 12 North Atlantic Treaty deputies came to an end with a far reaching unanimous agreement. The talks lasted only 10 days. There was no quibbling from any quarter. According to a well-informed source—it was agreed to put 40 first-rate divisions, on foot, on the European continent within the very near future. It will be a painful and costly effort for the 9 barely convalescent European partners in the pact, but if it is done, it can make war profitless for an aggressor in western Europe.

Earlier this week, France and Great Britain answered a direct appeal from President Truman with detailed facts and figures of the sacrifice that they are willing to make for the common defense. The French document is still secret. But the British answer to President Truman has been made public.

According to it, Britain is prepared to spend close to $10,000,000,000 on arms for herself and her European partners in the next 3 years. On condition that America provide essential machine tools and raw materials that Britain does not have the dollar resources to import.

To realize the full scope of this British offer, it is necessary to quote a few relevant figures. Where the United States has up until now been spending 6 percent of our national income on defense Britain has been spending 8 percent of her national income on defense, and that is the highest figure in the western world. With this new offer now Britain proposes raising the proportion of her national annual wealth going into arms to 10 percent.

Where President Truman has, in effect, requested equal sacrifices with America for our European allies, Britain is now offering to make a greater sacrifice than we are. At present, the American people give up 25 percent of its annual income in taxes. At present, the British people give up 40 percent of their national income in taxes. The new British program will require the overtaxed people of Great Britain to pay out still more in taxation. The British program will, finally, derange British economy more than our arms program will affect our economy. America has had 5 and 6 percent of our working population unemployed; they can now be absorbed into arms production and defense without gravely affecting the amount of manpower in other civilian industries. Britain, however, has next to no unemployed, which means that every man called into the new army or into arms production must be taken out of civilian production. With the new program then a standard of life, which is not very high now, is going to have to fall.

As heartening as this bold program itself has been the public's reaction to it, though the country is deathly weary of war, it has not yet materially recovered from the last one, all major political parties in this country are nearly unanimous in support of that program. The only criticism which the bulk of the British press makes is: "Can't we do still more for the common defense?"

However, one point deserves to be made with special emphasis—only a clear-cut case of principle and of justice—like America's action against aggression in Korea, could have brought forth so ready and selfless a response from a war-tired people. Any watering down of the principle for which the sacrifice is being made is likely to damage badly Europe's willingness to make the sacrifice at all.

This week, unfortunately, there have been two incidents that have indicated a readiness on the part of some people to water down our principles and to (one word indistinct) the clear-cut issue of Korea. The first was the vote in the Senate in Washington to include Franco Spain in the Marshall plan and the second was General MacArthur's amicable visit to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek in Formosa. Both incidents have made deep and disappointed impressions over here and it's the duty of an American reporter on the spot to sound a warning.

In regard to the first event—it should be made clear that Europe regards the Marshall plan as a cooperative effort by equal nations to preserve democracy where it's been weakened by the war. In the European view, it's a mere coincidence that America came out of the common war unharmed and is therefore able to contribute aid, and that Europe came out badly damaged and has to receive that aid. It is only in Communist propaganda that the Marshall plan is conceived of not as a cooperative effort among equals but as a project imposed by rich America on poor western Europe. Unfortunately, the Senate vote this week supports the Communist theory—"by including Franco in the plan without the consent of and against the repeated and loudly stated wishes of the other and European participants in the plan."

Aside from the raw impression of dictation which the Senate vote has created, it has also given rise to one serious material fear—the fear, namely, that America has secretly written off western Europe as indefensible and is preparing main defenses on the Spanish Pyrenees. This is a dangerous suspicion to let loose in western Europe. For if it ever takes hold of the people of France, Germany, Holland, and Belgium, and Scandinavia, they will certainly stop trying to defend themselves and try to come to terms with the Communists, to whom they imagine they are being abandoned.

It is my own private opinion that if world tension continues, the west European democracies will eventually come around to accepting Spain—however, reluctantly—as a unit in western defense; but that time is certainly not yet. And any more moves like that in the Senate this week can bring to pass calamitous consequences.

Fortunately, Secretary of State Acheson did a good deal to reassure democratic Europe by his disavowal of the Senate's action in a press conference in Washington this week. Unfortunately, there has been no similar disavowal of the second incident, the visit of General MacArthur to Formosa. And it has evoked over here some acrid and very disillusioned comments. The influential British left-wing magazine, the New Statesman, wrote day before yesterday: "We must hope that there is enough sane opinion in America to put a stop to the Formosan activities of General MacArthur."

Yesterday, on the right-hand side of the political field, the London Economist had this comment: "The Russians are on strong ground when they claim that the Chinese Nationalists represent nothing and when they accuse America of supporting forces which for their very weakness and corruption have been driven out of their own land."

The conservative London Observer this morning says that General MacArthur's action has, and I quote, "Gravely endangered our highest common interest in Asia. As friends and partners in a common cause, it is our duty to talk frankly to America at this grave juncture. We should do all in our power." Britain's leading Sunday paper says, "to induce America to see and to redress a mistake which, if persisted in, means tragedy for her no less than for us." Add to these remarks a comment made to me privately by a very eminent European this week, who asked that his name not be used. "This only proves to me," he said, "that Clemenceau was right—'War is far too serious a thing to be left to generals.'"

The attitude of Europe toward Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek deserves some clarification. The dominant opinion here is that General Chiang is not a support for the west but a pitfall. The main effort of the Russians in Asia today, it is thought here, is to maneuver the western powers into the pit with Chiang. If the western cause can be identified with him then the issue of the cold war changes; we can be depicted as fighting not for principle but for the reinstatement of corruption and reaction which all Asia has decisively rejected. And that leaves Russia with a monopoly on the wave of nationalism now irrepressibly sweeping Asia.

The Russian game is possibly more apparent to Europeans than it is in America because they've seen more of it. They have seen Russia angrily and repeatedly demand that the western nations recognize Mao Tse-tung and then they have systematically sabotaged every effort of the western powers to do so. When France was preparing to recognize the Chinese Reds some time ago, Russia induced Mao to forestall it by recognizing the Communist rebels fighting against France in Indochina. Which made it impossible for France to carry out her intention of recognizing the Chinese Communists. Britain got in under the wire and did recognize the Chinese Communists and she has been subjected to every possible humiliation by Peiking as an example for the rest of us of what might happen to a nation who does it.

Some weeks ago the rumor was current over here that the American State Department was preparing to recognize the Chinese Communists too. Moscow prevented that with the Korean war.

Nonetheless, President Truman, though unable to recognize the Chinese Communist Government, did avoid the obvious trap that Moscow had laid for us. He did not accept Chiang Kai-shek as an ally and he required Chiang to cease using Formosa as a war base against the Chinese mainland.

Now, this week, after all that delicate and intelligent effort of sidestepping the snake pit, General MacArthur has flown right into it. Chiang has virtually been declared an ally of the United States. American fighter planes have been sent to his support. Against President Truman's specific orders, Chiang has resumed bombing the Chinese mainland from bases on America-protected Formosa.

Unless Mr. Averell Harriman, the President's adviser who has just arrived in Tokyo, can redress this situation—America shall in fact have been committed to war against the wave of nationalism in Asia, which means we have very little chance of winning.

If General MacArthur's policy is allowed to develop, moreover, it is bound to have repercussions here in Europe no less great than those in Asia. This week, over the luncheon table, I talked with a junior British Minister of the Government about the present situation and I pass on his interpretation to you for what it is worth.

"Europe," he said to me, "is nauseously sick of war. No matter what we in the Government decide our peoples are going to find every basis for equivocation to keep out of another conflict and it's only human that they do so. Therefore, no room for equivocation must be left; every issue must be clean cut; we must be indubitably on the side of justice and principle. The only reason that we in Britain have been able to muster the people—nearly unanimously—for a rearmament program as painful as that we published this week, has been because the Korean war has been just such a clean-cut issue. But now," he went on, "with this week's events, a shadow of a doubt, no bigger than a man's hand, hangs over the issue. Please," he said, "don't let the shadow grow. I predict," he went on, "that if another war comes morale will be the decisive factor as it has never before been in any war in history, and the quality of Europe's morale is going to depend almost entirely on the quality of leadership circumventing the pitfalls that America gives to us."

California Retailers Association Promptly Sends Cooperative Analysis on Important Subject of Inventory Controls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I have just received from the California Retailers Association through the offices of Vincent D. Kennedy, managaging director of that important group of merchants in my native State of California, the following very timely statement relating to controls of inventory. I am sure that this statement will be immediately and constructively recognized as valuable to the congressional committees concerned, and to all Members of Congress, and to the administrative and executive branches of Government charged with the responsibility of legislation and its administration. The statement follows:

During the last world war and after the formation of the Wholesale and Retail Inventory Policy Committee of the Office of Civilian Supply, War Production Board, the committee recognized the peculiar problems of Pacific coast retailers arising out of the fact that we were so far away from our sources of supply. The committee also recognized that uncertainty of transportation would require increased stocks when it said, "As the burden upon our transportation facilities becomes heavier, and deliveries become slower and less certain, it will be necessary for many merchants to carry larger inventories in relation to sales than they carried in the base period." That condition came to pass for these reasons:

1. Most of our supplies are purchased east of the Mississippi River. Our shipments are, therefore, subject to the uncertainties of all phases of transportation; namely:

(a) Short haul by truck to original point of shipment;

(b) Consolidation of shipments in order to comply with less than carload lot regulations;

(c) Transportation from point of consolidation to Chicago, St. Louis, or New Orleans through the congested transportation system of the East;

(d) Transportation of goods 2,000 miles to the Pacific coast with a choice of only three transcontinental lines to any one point on the west coast.

These uncertainties increased our transit time, on the average, for express from 5 to 7 days, and for freight from 9 to 17 days. The increase in time would not be so important if it were regular and certain. We were not able to plan on the receipt of goods at any definite time, even after it was in the hands of common carriers.

2. Just as important as uncertainties of delivery, were the uncertainties of manufacturing schedules. This factor, added to the uncertainties of deliveries, increased the time between the placement of the order and the receipt of eastern goods from an average of 24 days to as much as 70 days. On the average, the time doubled between the placement of the order and the receipt of eastern goods. This uncertainty made it impossible for us to plan as we did in the base period.

The Pacific coast area performed a stupendous task of converting civilian production facilities to war production, in addition to increasing its production capacity manyfold. We are again to face this condition. If civilian morale, war workers' morale, is to be maintained, the workers and their families must be supplied with essential consumer goods. As Pacific coast retailers, we feel our responsibility in the war program to keep a steady and adequate supply of goods available to workers, including the tens of thousands of new ones pouring on to the Pacific coast.

Faced with the uncertainties of the market on the one hand, and our duty to our customers on the other, we will have to carry inventories that are larger in relation to sales than they will be in the base period. We respectfully say that inventories must continue to be larger in relation to sales than in the base period, if we are to fulfill our responsibilities to our immediate communities, and through them our responsibility to the National War Production program.

The committee referred to above, after thorough study, did recognize and grant Pacific coast retailers an allowance of 15 percent over the normal inventory before the imposition of penalties.

We respectfully submit that we are entitled to and should be granted a 15-percent allowance. Such an allowance will cause us to reduce stocks through a retarded buying program, but will allow a margin which we feel is not excessive in the face of the uncertainties of war conditions.

VINCENT D KENNEDY,
Managing Director, California Retailers Association; Chairman, National Conference of State Retail Associations; President, Western Retailers Council.

The Communist Peace Petition—Poison in Sugar Coating

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, those of you who heard the news broadcast by Earl Godwin Thursday night over WRC will recall, I am sure, the very forthright and accurate comment he made with reference to the circulation of the so-called Stockholm peace petition in this country. However, for the RECORD I do want to include it now. He said:

The Russians are manufacturing an international line of bunk, trying to fool people into signing a peace petition which is poison in sugar coating, because it is peace on Russia's terms which means slavery and a collapse of American principle. If Russia wanted peace it would stop the Korean invasion.

Last week I received from a friend a copy of a petition in a somewhat similar form to that of the so-called Stockholm petition phrased in equally deceptive and devious language. This, however, is entitled "Petition To Ban H-Bomb and A-Bomb." It was purported to be under the sponsorship of the National Labor Conference for Peace, of Chicago. I asked our Legislative Reference Service to obtain any material they could with reference to this group. I have been given four extracts from four issues of the New York Daily Worker. Upon reading the statement that the signatures were to be delivered to President Truman on April 12, I asked the White House for advice as to whether any such group had presented any such petition. I have been advised that no such petition had been presented by anyone.

This petition is as follows:

"The idea of achieving security through national armament is, at the present state of military technique, a disastrous illusion."—Dr. Albert Einstein.

PETITION TO BAN H-BOMB AND A-BOMB

President Harry S. Truman and the Congress of the United States:

We believe that the manufacture of the hydrogen bomb will not advance the cause of peace. It will only hasten the outbreak of a new horrible war which will destroy untold millions.

Only genuine negotiations between the leaders of our country and the Soviet Union to outlaw the hydrogen and atom bombs and to find a basis for peace rather than cold war will dispel the nightmare of hydrogen- and atom-bomb warfare.

We, of labor, join with leaders of church and civic organizations in calling upon you to halt the manufacture of hydrogen and atom bombs and to work for peace by direct negotiation with the leaders of the Soviet Union.

We further believe that the end of the cold war will make possible a vast expansion of trade with the countries of eastern Europe and China and will help fight back the threat to American men and women of war and growing unemployment.

We working men and women petition you, Mr. President and Congressmen, to stop the drive toward world destruction—before it is too late.

Return this petition to National Labor Conference for Peace, Suite 905, 179 West Washington Street, Chicago 2, Ill.

The extracts from the Daily Worker follow:

A petition campaign calling for UN action to outlaw atomic weapons, was begun here yesterday by the National Labor Conference for Peace.

Samuel Curry, chairman of the conference, said a million signatures will be sought by April 12.

"Dean Acheson's statement abandons any pretense that the administration is seeking honest understanding for world peace," officers of the conference declared. "It is a confession that the role of the United States State Department is not that of speaking peace through diplomacy but war through propaganda and the ominous threat of the H-bomb."

"Mr. Acheson can state that power must be the key to United States policy, but the working people will show that they want peace through negotiations and not through annihilation," the statement of the NCLP continued.

The NCLP petition calls for UN atomic control through international inspection and the destruction of existing stockpiles. It urges a conference between the United States of America and the Soviet Union to settle outstanding differences, for lifting the trade embargo to provide jobs, and defense of democratic liberties and the rights of minorities. (February 15, 1950, p. 3.)

A million signatures for peace and jobs will be collected during the next few weeks among the working people in this country as an answer to Secretary of State Dean Acheson's statement that the H-bomb diplomacy will continue.

The drive for these signatures is being launched by the officers of the National Labor Conference for Peace.

They will be presented to President Truman April 12, the anniversary of President Roosevelt's death.

The petition calls for immediate action through the United Nations to outlaw atomic weapons, control through international inspection and destroying existing stockpiles.

It further calls for an immediate conference between the United States of America and the U. S. S. R. to settle outstanding differences.

Officers of the National Labor Conference for Peace are Samuel Curry, chairman: James Wishhart, secretary, and Frieda Schwenkmeyer, administrative secretary. (February 23, 1950, p. 4.)

A call to all labor in Chicago went out this week for an all-day conference to discuss jobs and peace on Sunday, March 12 at Ashland Auditorium.

Its sponsors were some 75 leading trade unionists who are members of the Chicago Labor Conference for Peace.

CIO, AFL, railroad and independent unionists were listed among the sponsors of the parley which is being organized from offices at 179 West Washington Street.

James Wishhart, one of the conference leaders announced that the parley was open to all labor, "regardless of union affiliation." (March 1, 1950, p. 5.)

Labor groups across the country were reported here as actively pushing the campaign to obtain 1,000,000 signatures on petitions calling for the outlawing of atomic weapons and negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union to end the cold war.

The petition drive is sponsored by the National Labor Conference for Peace founded here last October at a grass roots parley attended by over 1,300 delegates from AFL, CIO and independent unions.

The signature campaign for peace will be climaxed on April 12, anniversary of the death of Franklin D. Roosevelt, when a delegation from the labor peace group will present the petitions to President Truman.

Chicago's labor's slogan for the peace petition campaign is: Let's stick together to prevent being blown apart. (March 19, 1950, p. 1.)

Then I received an editorial appearing in the Chicago Sun-Times on July 25, commenting on the action taken by the Chicago Industrial Union Council:

SPOTLIGHT ON A PEACE FAKE

The Chicago Industrial Union Council, the central body of the CIO's 250,000 members in this city and vicinity, is so far from being hoodwinked by the notorious Communist peace petition that it has issued a vigorous warning against it.

Trade-unionism had a good reason to react against the petition scheme here. Petitions have been circulated by a something calling itself the Chicago Labor Conference for Peace. The name lends itself readily to an appeal to union members.

The CIO council warns:

"The prime objective in securing signatures on this phony peace petition is an attempt to confuse the American people and weaken the morale of the workers in the trade-union movement in order that Communist agents may better be able to perform their task of sabotage against our soldiers and our country when so instructed by the Soviet Union."

In a Resolution on Home-Grown Traitors adopted the other day, the council called on all CIO members to be on guard against the petitions. It condemned the big-lie technique of the petition-pushers and asserted that "we resent and reject the use of the good name of the labor movement by this core of Communists and Communist-minded agents."

These petitions, which unfortunately had been signed in good faith by many Americans before the North Korean aggression reminded the world of Communist double-dealing, don't mention aggression.

They demand strict international control to outlaw atomic weapons. Coming from Communist sources, this demand sounds more than strange. It's the United States that offered a genuine control program to the United Nations. Only the Communists blocked it.

The petitions urge that any nation which first uses atomic bombs against another be declared a war criminal. American leaders are not now planning to atom-bomb Korea. But in the uncertain future, with the possibility of all-out war, the atom bomb could come into use—and let's all realize that it would be used not by us for aggression but to help turn back aggression.

If that happened then Russia, using the peace petitions as evidence, could tell the world that the United States is a war criminal by the definition of many of its own citizens.

Signers of such petitions are helping communism in its drive for world conquest. The CIO has performed a valuable, patriotic public service in putting the spotlight on a fraud.

How much peace some nations may expect from such petitions may be seen in the case of North Korea. Not many days before North Korean Red soldiers and tanks crashed southward across the thirty-eighth parallel their government—a Soviet satellite—boasted that 5,500,000 North Koreans had signed Soviet-sponsored peace petitions, and that 17,000 local peace committees had been formed. Undoubtedly the petitions resembled those being circulated in America.

Peace, huh?

I also have two articles from the Daily Worker of July 2, and July 7, purporting to report upon this group:

[From the Daily Worker of July 2, 1950]

FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND AMERICANS SIGN PEACE APPEAL

The peril of world atomic warfare created by Truman's decree of intervention in Korea has spurred the peace crusaders to unprecedented efforts as they passed the half-million mark this week en route to 5,000,000 signatures to ban the A-bomb.

The men, women, and teenagers on the Nation's streets and in the factories circulating the world peace appeal report a leap in the fear of atomic war. "I can see the atom bombers over the city right now," a New Yorker told a peace crusader as she signed the petition.

The National Labor Conference for Peace called upon the American people to veto Truman's call for intervention in order to prevent America and the world from being dragged to catastrophe by way of Korea.

In spirit of the hysterical rantings of the war-minded press and the cold-war promoters, the peace can and will be saved, the conference declared. It called on all affiliated groups and individuals throughout America to double and redouble the work for peace.

Thousands of peace collectors had immediately recognized the stepped-up atom danger, even before the call, and were out on the streets before work and after to get additional names.

Ethel Davidson, of the Garment Peace Committee, in New York, is a good example. This veteran needle trades worker leads the peace procession in New York, and nationally—so far as is known—with 1,690 names. She began hitting on all cylinders June 19 and reports that the Korean episode has awakened many to the immediate threat of atomic war.

Peace crusaders report that many they approached the first few days since the Korean episode began reflected the confusions spread by the press, but signed when their questions were answered.

Characteristic was the response of the Brooklyn mother who told a Labor Conference peace worker that she would sign today though she had refused to sign a week before. "Then it seemed to me a far away question," she said. "But now." She said she has two sons of draft age, and that though she doesn't understand all that happened in Korea, she knows she wants no world war to rise from it.

"When I read that Truman sent bombers to Korea, my hands began to tremble." Her hand was still trembling when she signed.

Others relate similar experiences. A New York newspaperman hostile to this paper told one of our reporters. "When I first read the Korean reports, I got ready to get into uniform again. Suddenly I remembered my son is of draft age. And I said to myself, 'Whoa, there, fellow. This means him, too.' And I decided that come what may this Korean business can't be allowed to degenerate into world war III."

This week saw a new crop of famous American signatures to the world peace appeal. Protestant leaders are included, men like Bishop Sherman L. Greene, African Methodist Episcopal Church, Birmingham; the Right Reverend G. Ashton Oldham, Protestant Episcopal bishop (retired), of Albany, N. Y.; the Reverend J. Burt Bouwman, executive secretary of the Michigan Council of Churches; the Reverend J. Clyde Keegan, district superintendent of the Methodist Church of Wyoming; and Aubrey Williams, former Government official and publisher of the Southern Farmer.

The war hysteria of the press cannot stifle the American people's will to banish the A-bomb and to win peace. As the New Yorker said, "I can hear the atom bombers over the city."

[From the Daily Worker of July 7, 1950]

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIVE THOUSAND IN CHICAGO SIGN WORLD PEACE APPEAL

(By Ruby Cooper)

CHICAGO, July 6.—This city has hit the 125,000-mark in signatures for the Stockholm world peace appeal, it was reported today by the Chicago Labor Conference for Peace. Hundreds of peace workers out in full force over the July 4 week end carried the petition campaign far beyond the original objective of 100,000 signatures by Independence Day.

The intensive effort over the holiday week end alone resulted in more than 50,000 signatures for the petitions urging outlawing of atom war and declaring the first government to use the atom bomb shall be branded a war criminal.

Announcement of the 125,000 signatures emphasized that this was the amount already on hand in offices of the labor-peace group. It was reported that additional thousands of signatures were known to have been obtained but not yet turned over.

Singled out for special commendation by the labor peace group were the youth workers and signature collectors in the great Negro community on the south side.

YOUTH GETS 28,000

The youth, spearheaded by the Labor Youth League, garnered and turned over 28,000 signatures.

Prior to President Truman's order to invade Korea on June 28, they had gotten 5,000 names. Since then their total is 28,000.

Twelve young workers and students have from 500 to 1,000 to their credit.

One 21-year-old steel worker, for example, has 450 names; 375 of them are Irish-Americans, mainly Catholic.

He signed up two entire Catholic soccer teams. In one Chicago community, 13 captains of neighborhood baseball teams signed.

FIFTEEN THOUSAND IN NEGRO AREA

The south side Negro community came through with 15,000 signatures, over 50 percent more than its objective for July 4.

The holiday week-end saw hundreds of peace workers reporting to assembly points designated by labor unions and other organizations throughout the city and then fanning out into the city's beaches, parks, streets, shops, and picnic grounds.

Peace workers universally reported that response to the petitions has been much greater since the Korea fighting because of the people's determination to stop any development toward a world atomic war.

It was learned that Chicago police had issued instructions to balk the petition campaign by intimidation and harassment of signature collectors.

Despite numerous instances of police apprehension, peace workers refused to be intimidated and continued their signature collections unabated and at an even more determined tempo.

Simultaneously, the labor peace group announced that more than 1,000 Chicagoans were already eligible for the peace awards for obtaining 100 or more signatures each.

It announced that top honors went to a young Negro mother of three children, Mrs. Molly Lucas, who has so far secured over 1,300 signers to the peace petition.

Industrial areas showing the way in the peace drive were announced as steel district in South Chicago and the garment district.

Nearly 5,000 signatures were reported from steel workers in the vicinity of the big Carnegie-Illinois steel mill.

Garment workers, members of the A. F. of L. International Ladies Garment Workers Union, to date reported 3,000 signatures obtained during lunch periods in the garment district.

The next objective set by the labor peace group is a total of 300,000 signatures by August 6. The full goal here is 500,000, of which one-fourth is already achieved.

It was indicated that preparation for continuation of the peace campaign at an even stronger pace would be mapped at a city-wide rally of trade-union stewards to be held July 19. Nearly 1,000 stewards are expected at the rally, which will plan to intensify the peace campaign in and around the city's largest shops and mills.

It was also announced that as part of the week-end's petition push, more than 150,000 leaflets issued by the labor peace group calling for the withdrawal of American troops from Korea had been distributed.

The Illinois Communist Party said that large quantities of the party's national committee statement on the intervention in Korea had also gone out to Chicagoans over the holiday week end.

DETROIT, July 6.—One thousand General Motors workers and members of their families signed the Stockholm peace appeal in a few hours last Sunday, it was reported by the peace committee of Flint.

The youth peace committee in Detroit collected more than 1,000 signatures last Sunday in the parks, beaches, neighborhoods.

In Ecorse, Mich., three petition-getters collected 215 signatures in 2 hours among steel and Ford workers around the neighborhood close to the Great Lakes steel mill.

It is estimated that within 1 week some 10,000 people have signed the Stockholm peace appeal in lower Michigan.

Finally, I have a column from the Daily Worker by one George Morris attacking the national CIO, President Truman, Philip Murray, William Green, and referring to this peace petition:

WORLD OF LABOR—THE CIO TAKES NOTICE OF THE PEACE PETITIONS

(By George Morris)

The national CIO has for some weeks tried to ignore the world peace appeal and the movement to get millions of signatures for it. But with the signatures drive within the United States progressing on the second half of the first million, a sizable chunk of it from CIO members, something had to be said. So Editor Allan L. Swim, of the CIO News thought up an editorial and it begins:

"Nuts!"

That just about reflects the level of the entire editorial in which Swim goes into the usual hackneyed and stupid description of the Soviet Union as the cause of every disturbance in this world, including Korea.

Swim either did not read the World Peace Appeal for which signatures are sought, or, not knowing how to meet it to suit his crowd of saber rattlers in the labor movement, chose to dismiss it with "nuts."

The pledge which tens of thousands of CIO members are signing, simply says:

"We demand the unconditional prohibition of the atomic weapon as a weapon of intimidation and mass extermination of human beings. We demand the institution of strict international control to enforce this. We shall consider as war criminal that government which first employs the atomic weapon against any country. We call upon all people of good will throughout the world to sign this appeal."

Can Swim point to one word or thought in that statement that is objectionable to him or to anyone else in the CIO's leadership? If they do object, they apparently don't dare say so openly. Even the most hard-bitten supporters of the CIO's right-wing don't want war, especially an atomic war.

Swim simply makes the claim that the peace movement favors the Soviet Union. He doesn't try to explain how. He relies on the current war hysteria to do the convincing for him. Some people are convinced that way, but the CIO has a high percentage of people who think for themselves.

The fact is that the number of signers throughout the world is well over the 100,000,000 mark. The Soviet Union is now beginning its drive for signatures. The leaders from Stalin to officials of unions or other organizations have already initiated the petitions with their own names. In China a similar drive is under way.

The bulk of the populations of the new democracies of eastern Europe signed. But especially significant are the many millions of signatures from Italy, France and other western countries.

If Stalin and the other leaders of the Socialist world are not afraid of tying themselves to the pledge along with tens of millions of their peoples, why are Truman, Philip Murray, William Green, and others of their mind afraid to sign? There isn't the slightest partisanship in the pledge. Any country that first uses the atomic bomb would be branded the war criminal.

From a reading of the American press one gathers that Americans are even more fearful of atomic warfare than the people of the U. S. S. R. Only people who think there is a chance to win by using it first want that advantage left open.

Inferentially, however, those who so stubbornly fight the peace petition campaign, admit the power in those signatures. That's why their papers editorialize against signing. That's why they got Walter Winchell to broadcast the threat the FBI will photograph the petitions.

The CIO's leaders are simply helping to drown out the cry for peace. They are delivering on the bargain they struck with the warmakers long ago. But the members struck no such bargain. They are signing and they will also demand that their organizations become a force for peace.

Incidentally, the CIO's official cartoonist "Coak" is doing his part. His cartoon in the July 3 issue lifts Hearst's traditional "Yellow Peril" character and puts a hammer and sickle on his arm. He is the image of the beastlike cartoon character that served to represent Japan during World War II. He is now shown with a machine gun mowing down South Koreans. Not shown are United States bombers that are really scattering death. "Coak" apparently doesn't know that South Koreans look no different than the North Koreans. "Coak" is the same cartoonist who revived Hitler's well-known anti-Semitic portrayal of a Jew and labeled him "expelled unions."

All of this evidence is a case study into the devious and unprincipled manner by which these Soviet propaganda efforts are being conducted in this country. The vicious and unprincipled attacks upon those who see the true nature of this Communist effort are transparent. It does seem to me we should be given, as Members of Congress, an early opportunity to support any action recommended by our Committee on Foreign Affairs to unmask this sham and identify those authors to the American people.

Why Penalize a Reserve for Being a Reserve?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. WILSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. WILSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, recently I read in the July 1950 issue of the Reserve Officer Magazine an article by Col. Melvin J. Maas, USMCR, as chairman of the legislative committee of the Reserve Officer Association, calling attention that there are procedures still "ununified" for establishing precedence of Reserve officers among themselves and with Regulars when the civilian components are mobilized. That article reads as follows:

There is a wide divergence between the services in the matter of adjusting the position of their Reserve officers when called to active duty. The Army and Air Force credit only active duty performed in grade toward arriving at the relative precedence of Reserve officers among themselves and with Regulars when the Reserves are mobilized or otherwise report for active duty. The Navy and the Marine Corps in general, place their Reserve officers on the precedence list according to the dates of their commissions.

What this means is that a Reserve officer of the Army or Air Force, with only the usual 2 weeks' annual active duty, will be ordered to active duty very low on the list of officers of the same grade and date of commission in the Regular services, and, as to Reserve officers of like service in the Navy and Marine Corps.

As an example: Officer A, a captain in the Army Reserve, whose commission is date July 1, 1949, has had 15 days' active training duty in 1946, 1947, and 1949. He has, therefore, performed a total of 45 days' active duty. Officer B, a captain in the Air Force Reserve, also commissioned a captain on July 1, 1946, performed 2 years' active duty, and on July 1, 1948, went on inactive duty. Officer C, a captain in the Marine Corps Reserve, with the same date of commission as his brother Reserve officers A and B, performed 15 days' active duty during each of three intervening years, so he, like A, has a total of 45 days' active duty.

On July 1, 1950, all three are mobilized. Let's see what happens to their relative precedence.

A takes his place in the Army behind the captain in the Regular Service who was promoted to captain 6 weeks before: That is the middle of May 1950. B takes his place in the Air Force behind the Regular who was made captain July 1, 1948. C on the other hand ranks with a Regular marine captain commissioned July 1, 1946.

A has lost all but 6 weeks of 4 years on the initial list. B has lost 2 years. C has lost nothing and has kept up with his running mate in the Regular Marine Corps. (The Naval Reserve officer of comparable rank has held his regular Navy running mate like the Marine reservist.)

A more extreme example but a typical one would be—

An Air Force Reserve captain who reached that rank on July 1, 1946, has had 2 weeks active duty each subsequent year or a total of 2 months. An Army Reserve captain was promoted to the grade on April 1, 1950, and immediately reported for 90 days active duty. They are both mobilized on July 1, 1950. The Army Reserve captain immediately takes precedence over the Air Force Reserve captain who was promoted to captain nearly 4 years after the Air Force Reserve officer.

Apparently the theory of the Army and the Air Force is that only active duty contributes to the value of a Reserve officer for his wartime assignment.

The Navy and Marine Corps on the other hand believe that a Reserve officer is growing and expanding in his general knowledge, abilities, and capacity for leadership. They believe that a successful civilian career contributes to a Reserve officer's ability to quickly adjust himself to the new problems of the military which always develop in time of war. These problems are also new to the Regulars.

Those officers of the Regular Establishment who insist on denying parity to Reserve officers in time of war, use as their main argument that a Reservist, training only part time cannot possibly be as competent as a Regular who puts in full time in the military. This is not necessarily true at all. The Reservist certainly is not as well trained as the Regular, but this is not necessarily a gage of either's competence, once in a war. None of us contend that the Reserve officer is as well trained as the Regulars, grade for grade, but that is not the issue. The test should be rather—is the Reserve officer competent to perform the duties of his rank? If he is not, he should not be continued in the Reserve at all.

It is up to the Regular Establishment to institute and conduct training programs that will qualify the Reservist for his duties and which will also result in a constant weeding out of those who are found unwilling to or incapable of becoming competent.

This is exactly the attitude and program of the Navy and Marine Corps for their Reserves. In this policy the Naval and Marine Reserves concur wholeheartedly. The Navy does expect a Reservist to be the equal of his Regular running mate upon mobilization. They do expect the Reservist to be capable of performing the duties to which he will be assigned.

They expect to eliminate the incompetence among us through the selection-for-promotion system. This will produce a Reserve capable of immediate and complete integration with the Regular Establishment upon mobilization. So thoroughly does the Navy believe in this that they propose that there be no distinction whatever upon general mobilization, and then the Reserve become in every sense part of the Regular Navy and Marine Corps during the war service. To have such a Reserve requires that the date of commission of the reservist determine his position on the combined lineal list in peace and in war.

Any other system results in a Reserve being from two to five or more years older than his contemporary of the Regular Service. From the highest authorities in the Navy came testimony after World War II that Reserve officers, 3 months after mobilization, were indistinguishable from Regulars in the duties for which they were assigned. Thereafter, both Regular and Reserve learned their war duties from the war itself.

No less an authority than Admiral Nimitz made this statement repeatedly. If this is true, then there is no justification for permanently penalizing the Reserve officer from 2 to 5 years of age in grade compared to the Regular. The result is that a Reserve officer of the Army or Air Force upon reporting for active duty is penalized thousands of numbers on the precedence list which is far, far more drastic than a stiff court marshal would award as disciplinary punishment. Once lost, these numbers cannot be made up.

This penalizes a Reserve officer for being in the Reserve in peacetime. A civilian commissioned during a war suffers no such penalty. The day he is commissioned and reports for active duty determines his place on the lineal list. The Reserve officer who has contributed liberally of his time and effort during peace to prepare himself for war, may be placed with a Regular who is years his junior.

Such a system as is in force in the Army and Air Force does not assure getting the most competent officers into the right spot. A lieutenant colonel in the Air Force Reserve who has commanded an Air National Guard squadron, for instance, for 6 years with the usual 15 days' annual field training would immediately become junior and lose his command to a Regular major who had only reached the rank of lieutenant colonel 3 months before and had never had command of a squadron. Who will say that the Regular under such circumstances, 6 years younger and with little if any squadron command experience, is better qualified to command the squadron than the Reserve who has had 6 years experience and training in actual command. Yet that is what the Air Force says. The Army likewise contends that a Regular lieutenant colonel who had just made colonel a few months before is more competent than a Reserve or National Guard colonel who has been commanding a regiment for 7 or 8 years. I don't believe it; and furthermore the record doesn't warrant the conclusion reached by the Army and the Air Force.

The "only active service" theory of the Army and Air Force as applied to reserves is narrow and unrealistic for at least two apparent reasons. First, a comparatively small amount of a Regular's service is spent in strictly field military duties or with troops. Actually taken all in all much of an officer's career in peacetime is spent in administrative and similar duties. Secondly, there is so much that is fundamentally the same in civilian experience and the military service in time of peace that both the Regular and Reserve come out at any given time with pretty much the same basic mental equipment. Accordingly there is no justification for the vast gap created between the two as results from the present Army and Air Force system.

Of course, the regular service provides more valuable training for war than that provided in the reserve, but we don't maintain the military for the prestige or personal aggrandizement of the individual, whether he is a Regular or a Reserve. The Regular's compensation is a paid career. The Reserve, on the other hand, contributes his time from his career and family life in order to prepare himself for war. The drill pay that a portion of the Reserves receive don't constitute even a semicareer compensation. It seldom covers the actual expenses of a Reserve for participating in the program.

These factors should not enter into the question of an officer's place on the lineal list. The governing factor should be the officer's value to the over-all war effort. We think that this being true, there should be no penalty imposed upon a Reserve officer by reason of his being a Reserve officer and that the precedence of all officers should be determined by the date shown on the commission.

Mr. Speaker, to bring this subject to the attention of the Members and in an effort to bring about uniform treatment in these procedures and to attempt to close the vast gap created by the system of the Army and Air Force on the one hand of crediting only active duty performed in grade toward arriving at the relative precedence of Reserve officers among themselves and with Regulars when the Reserves are mobilized or enter active duty, and of the system of the Navy and the Marine Corps on the other hand of placing their Reserve officers on the precedence list according to the dates of their commission, I did on August 8, 1950, introduce H. R. 9371, a bill to amend the National Defense Act to achieve relative rank of officers of the United States Army and United States Air Force when in active service, by amending paragraph 8 of section 127 (a) of the National Defense Act of 1916, as amended.

Amazing Sophistry of Certain Cost Per Acre Arguments Opposing Central Arizona Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, many are the arguments put forth by the opponents of the central Arizona project, some of which are fantastically illogical and amazingly fallacious. These arguments may sound impressive, but they will not bear analysis or close inspection. One of the worst of them I wish to comment upon here, such as their cost-per-acre figures.

In trying to thwart the legislation and kill the project, opponents have tried to bolster their claim that the project is "fantastically infeasible" by declaring that the cost per acre is outlandish and unreasonable. While it is not uncommon for good reclamation projects to average from two to four hundred dollars per acre construction costs, certain opponents of this project in central Arizona declare with a straight face that the cost will range upward of $1,600 per acre, some say $1,800 per acre, and a few place it between two and three thousand dollars per acre. One of these California lobbying mathematicians, influenced in part perhaps by the change in climate from California to Washington, has solemnly stated that the cost of this project will average more than $14,000 per acre.

Any one of these costs per acre figures would be amazing enough even if the California lobbyists left off the other half of this story, which is that the Arizona farmers would not repay any of this cost but that it would be a raid on the United States Treasury to benefit a handful of Arizona farmers at the expense of the taxpayers of the Nation. So California opponents say. Whenever they have time and space, they put in the whole ridiculous story. I am not joking, all of these arguments have been put forth with the evident expectation—or hope at least—that such will be believed by Congress and the American people in opposition to the legislation which is embodied in S. 75 now before Congress.

Before I forget it I must say that it takes a rather high-priced lobbyist to make these calculations. Such a one must have several varieties of arithmetic besides the brand taught in schools to arrive at such astronomical figures but even so, the opponents, not content with doing their own calculations, a few weeks ago asked the Secretary of the Interior to figure the cost per acre on the Central Arizona project. This was the second of a certain list of 17 questions which was put to the Secretary of the Interior with a view of obtaining information about the bill.

It is interesting to note that when that question was touched upon the Secretary of the Interior replied:

> The central Arizona project has been designed to meet this threat of devastating drought to the area's economy through the provision of a supplemental water supply. * * * It is clear that the values which will accrue to such beneficiaries as these and, beyond them, to still others far outside of the confines of the State of Arizona cannot properly be reduced to a cost-per-acre figure and that it would, therefore, be inappropriate for us to attempt to relate the irrigation allocation of the project to an acreage figure.

This was merely a polite way of saying that cost-per-acre was not the proper way of computing this cost. I want to add that cost-per-acre in this case is a phony method of calculation, and I will also give a few illustrations of the absurdity of it. If the public can be fooled by the opponents of any good work on a cost-per-acre basis perhaps this method is as good as any to fool them. But does it fool anybody?

Let us suppose that there were individuals in Washington who objected to spending any money to erect a monument to George Washington, such as the 555-foot obelisk which stands near the Potomac. Let us assume that the Washington Monument cost a half million dollars, and that the promoters who planned it estimated the cost to be a half million dollars. The drawings of the foundation indicate that it is square and of such dimensions that 14 such squares will exactly cover 1 acre of ground. Now everybody knows that the ground down near the Potomac was not worth very much per acre in that early day. Could not the opponents say, with some show of superficial logic, How silly to build something on one-fourteenth of an acre that will cost $500,000, making the cost per acre the fantastic price of $7,000,000 per acre. What would any reasonable person think of that sort of argument against building the Washington Monument?

Let us try another illustration: Up on the New England coast at the mouth of Boston Harbor on a rocky piece of land stands a lighthouse, circular in form at the base, and it cost $300,000. The interesting thing is that that circular foundation covers only one-sixtieth of an acre. In that case the opponents of such a project could use California methods of bookkeeping to figure that the per acre cost for this lighthouse was $18,000,000 for an acre on that rocky area on a "stern and rock-bound coast." The method of computing cost in relation to benefits just illustrated are disgusting and insulting to intelligence, but no more so than some of the per acre cost attributed by Californians to the central Arizona project.

Someone may say, "You have been talking about a different class of projects of needed public works where the benefit is a public benefit and not a private benefit." Yes; I do recognize that, but I can give other illustrations. In the days of the great depression the Government furnished money to certain railroad companies and to certain banks and business concerns owned by private enterprise. Take any one of the railroads receiving financial aid. It has so many miles of right-of-way, perhaps running through several States. It would be an easy matter to compute the number of acres actually covered by the tracks, but would any opponent think of condemning the financial aid to such a railroad company by figuring it on a per acre cost basis by dividing the millions of dollars furnished by the number of acres covered by the tracks? That would be ridiculous.

Again, suppose the Government furnished money to a great banking institution to save it from closing its doors, say $50,000,000. Shall we divide the $50,000,000 furnished the bank by the half-acre plot on which the bank building stands and thus condemn Government aid to private banking business on a cost-per-acre basis because it figured out to be a $100,000,000 per acre? Such would be getting pretty close to the extreme of absurdity. However, that is no more absurd than the figuring of a $50,000-a-year lobbyist from California who figured out that the Central Arizona Project would cost more than $14,000 per acre.

Well, if this is not the correct way of figuring costs on the central Arizona project, what is the correct way? I would say one correct way is the same in principle as used by the Government when $50,000,000 was advanced to the banking institution above mentioned. Why did the Government lend $50,000,000 to this bank, which by the way is a private institution operated for profit? Unquestionably, the Government felt that the bank must not fail, for it had a public duty to perform and the public generally, as well as the owners, would be hurt through its destruction. Undoubtedly, the Government felt that the money advanced would save the institution; and would be repaid probably with interest; and the whole community would be financially better off because of the transaction. If an economic institution was saved in that manner and continued to create wealth and serve the community and furnish tax revenues for the public treasury it would not be a foolish thing for the Government to advance $50,000,000 in such a case. The only foolish thing would be to oppose the project on the basis that the cost seemed to be a $100,000,000 cost-per-acre.

Having shown the absurdity of the tricky and deceptive cost-per-acre propaganda of the Californians, it may logically be asked how should the cost and repayment of the central Arizona project as now represented in S. 75 amended, be properly and appropriately computed? Competent authorities have done so and declare that it will repay its reimbursable costs, that is 98½ percent of its total construction cost, under existing reclamation law, within a period of 73 years. It is a Federal investment and those responsible for Federal property ought to ask, What will be the cost of this project and how will the reimbursable costs be repaid? To answer those questions we must ask, What are the probable benefits and the computed revenue to be derived from the project annually when in operation?

The project will have two main sources of income: First, revenue from the sale of commercial power, and second, revenue from the sale of water for irrigation purposes and municipal uses. So long as this remarkable land is occupied by Americans there will be an unquestionable demand both for power and water and there are any number of reliable contractors willing to bid, and more than willing to enter into long-term contracts to purchase both at or above the computed prices. Reliable engineers have computed that the sale of power and water on reasonable terms will bring in enough revenue to operate the project, maintain it, keep it in functioning order and repay the reimbursable costs to the Government in 73 years. It is as significant an investment in the middle of the twentieth century as Jefferson made in Louisiana in the beginning of the nineteenth century. That is the thing about which statesmen need to be informed.

To those who are honestly concerned that this project would enhance the value of some land now held in large private ownership, I will repeat that no ownership in excess of 160 acres can participate in the benefits under Reclamation law and this development would be under Reclamation law. Most of the area is in private ownership of small holdings. It would certainly please me to have many, many more home units—family sized farms—of small acreage even not to exceed 40 acres each. I have always favored such small irrigated farms for veterans. These are details, however, which Congress will direct the Bureau of Reclamation to work out to the greatest good and maximum benefit in the public interest.

Address of Hon. Paul H. Griffith, Assistant Secretary of Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following remarks by Paul H. Griffith, Assistant Secretary of Defense, before the American Legion Convention, Department of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, Pa., Wednesday, August 9, 1950:

Fellow Legionnaires, it always has been a great pleasure to me to come back home, particularly at the time of the Department Convention of the American Legion. For the past month no one in the Department of Defense has been making any speeches. This is my first talk since the Korean invasion. In fact, it is the first talk which has been made by any high official of the Department. I am glad to have the opportunity of breaking this silence in my own State before you who have done so much for me in giving me prominence in the Legion.

I have a natural pride in your achievements. I have the comfortable feeling of genuine comradeship in your company. I have great faith in the soundness of your thinking—the kind of thinking which leads to sane and decisive action.

Today, more than ever before, I am grateful for the privilege of addressing this convention of my comrades of two World Wars. It provides me with an opportunity to discuss fast-moving world events with men whose understanding of such events has been enlarged and quickened by personal experience in uniform.

These events, particularly those relating to our military operations in Korea, must be calmly and sanely appraised by all of us. Only then will we respond with the sane and decisive action demanded of us by the trend of these events. The grave nature of these events make it appropriate that they be discussed at this memorial ceremony.

Right now these events add up to a situation confronting our country which above all else demands unity—unity of thought, unity of action, unity which will multiply our strength.

I am certain, indeed, that unity and faith in our Government, so greatly needed in time of stress, will be forthcoming from the vast bulk of men and women who have served their country under arms. I feel certain that you who once wore the uniform, will rally to the support of the President's program for ending the present, and preventing future acts of armed aggression. I am sure that you can be counted upon to inspire the support and confidence of the thousands with whom you associate in your normal walks of life. Unfortunately, in times like this, it is too often true that fast-moving events of far-reaching importance leave a wake of confused thinking—a faulty understanding of the situation. This leads often to actions which are unwise, if not actually detrimental.

In such an atmosphere, many are prone to forget that strength lies in unity; that calm judgment must not be overthrown by hysteria; and that tried policies must not be junked for fantastic schemes born of panic. They forget that faith must be maintained and all-out support given to constituted leadership.

Disunity, hysterical action, lack of confidence in our Government, panic, are among the conditions and states of mind Communist propagandists have fruitlessly attempted to establish in this country for the past quarter of a century. I want to warn with all the emphasis at my command that we should guard against creating, ourselves, the very conditions and states of mind the Communists so long have vainly tried to produce by subversive propaganda.

I would like to give you a detailed consideration of recent events, weigh their significance, appraise what we have done about them, and take a look ahead at what we are preparing to do.

We all know that Communist forces, without warning, launched an unprovoked attack June 24, our time—it was June 25 in Korea—on South Korean Government forces, armed only to prevent border raids and preserve internal security. On June 25 the Security Council of the United Nations met in an emergency session. The Council held that this attack was a brazen breach of the peace. It called upon the North Korean forces to withdraw to the thirty-eighth parallel. Now, to borrow the words of our Commander in Chief—I quote from his statement of June 27—"This they have not done, but on the contrary have pressed the attack. The Security Council called upon all members of the United Nations to render every assistance to the United Nations in the execution of this resolution. In those circumstances, I have ordered United States air and sea forces to give the Korean Government troops cover and support."

The United States subsequently decided to employ ground forces as well as naval and air forces, in assisting the United Nations in the execution of its resolution. All actions taken by the United States in Korea have conformed with the recommendations or requests of the United Nations.

All of which makes it plain that our military operations in Korea are, as the President frequently has pointed out, police action undertaken to fulfill our obligation as a member of the United Nations.

I want to enter into a more detailed discussion of this military operation in Korea a little later. First, however, I want to talk about the broader aspects of our effort to repel the invaders of a free nation.

One aspect of great importance is the fact that our action in Korea has clearly demonstrated the absolute soundness of virtually all the major concepts upon which our military policy has been based since the establishment of the Department of Defense. This is true despite a great amount of foggy thinking and loose talking in evidence since South Korea was attacked.

These concepts, briefly stated, are:

That we must maintain an armed force in a high state of readiness, prepared to heap dreadful retaliation on any enemy which might attack us

That we must maintain an armed force capable of quick expansion in time of emergency.

That we must get the greatest amount of defense for every dollar spent.

That unification is a necessary means for achieving these ends.

It is of utmost importance that the public be given a full understanding that these major concepts have been proved sound by the affair in Korea. Such an understanding must be the basis of confidence in what we have done to defend this country and in the further steps we propose to take. And it is this calm, studied confidence that will give us the unity we must have.

As to the state of readiness of our forces, let me offer the testimony of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, commander of the United Nations forces in Korea. I quote from his message of July 20 to our Commander in Chief:

"I do not believe that history records a comparable operation which excelled the speed and precision with which the Eighth Army, the Far East Air Force, and the Seventh Fleet have been deployed to a distant land for immediate commitment to major operations. It merits the highest commendation for the commanders, staffs, and units concerned and attests to their superior training and high state of readiness to meet any eventuality. This finds added emphasis in the fact that the Far East command, until the President's great pronouncement to support the epochal action of the United Nations, had no slightest responsibility for the defense of the free Republic of Korea. With the President's decision it assumed a completely new and added mission."

If any further evidence of our state of readiness is needed, we have it from Gen. J. Lawton Collins, Chief of Staff of the United States Army. I quote from his report to the President after visiting the front:

"Our far eastern forces were organized and equipped primarily to perform peaceful occupation duties in Japan. However, under General MacArthur's magnificent leadership, they have quickly adapted themselves to meet the deliberately planned attack of the North Korean Communist forces, which are well-equipped, well-led, and battle-trained, and which have at times outnumbered our troops by as much as 20 to 1."

It is true, of course, that nothing about the Korean incident has made it necessary for us to demonstrate our state of readiness to deliver a paralyzing retaliatory blow at any who attack this country. It should be strongly emphasized, however, that there is nothing about the Korean affair that suggests we cannot deliver such a blow.

There seems to be a tendency on the part of the public to overlook one of the essentials of the Korean situation. It is simply this: We have not been attacked by anyone. Technically we are not at war with anyone. Regardless of what may happen in the future, we still are engaged in a police action undertaken by troops without prior responsibility for the defense of the Korean Republic, at the urgent call of the United Nations.

Under such circumstances, it was readily apparent to military leaders that our first troops available to answer this call would be confronted with one of the most difficult of military operations—fighting a delaying action.

It is my information from military experts that the manner in which we have fought this delaying action was superb. In his report to the President, General Collins described this action of our troops in Korea as "a splendid tribute to the ability of our Armed Forces to convert quickly from the peaceful duties of occupation to the grim duties of war."

The highly skillful fashion in which our garrison troops, with no prior responsibility for the defense of the Republic of Korea, were able to fight this delaying action, must be regarded as further tribute to their high state of readiness. It is fortunate that we had troops at not too great a distance from the Korean outbreak. But it must be remembered that whether we had maintained 10 or a hundred trained divisions in the United States, our first units would have faced the same necessity of fighting a delaying action until reinforcements could arrive. We are without assurance, too, that maintenance of 100 divisions in continental United States would have deterred the invasion of Korea.

It might be well to observe at this point that stretching diagonally across Asia and Europe for thousands on thousands of miles is a Communist borderland. Along it inspired acts of armed aggression already have transpired or might be expected at any time the Communists choose. These never can be crushed quickly by any nation. No nation could maintain a military establishment strong enough and widely enough dispersed.

Now let us turn to another significant aspect of the Korean situation. It was described by the President in his statement of June 27. He said, and now I quote, "The attack upon Korea made it plain beyond all doubt that communism has passed beyond the use of subversion to conquer independent nations and will now use armed invasion and war."

In making it plain beyond a doubt that they are prepared to use armed force to subject free nations, the Communists have resolved a perplexing dilemma; it is a dilemma which has confronted the Department of Defense since its creation; it has confronted the Congress which is constitutionally responsible for the defense of the country, the Commander in Chief, and all the people of the United States.

That dilemma has been, to state it briefly, how much weight should be given to purely military considerations in defense preparedness and how much should be given to economic considerations; or as it was expressed by Chairman GEORGE MAHON is supporting the House Appropriation Committee's recommended military budget for 1950—and I quote: "If war comes soon we are appropriating too little. If we have miscalculated the dangers, if the threat of war is just a deceptive mirage on the horizon, we are appropriating too much. * * *"

By armed aggression, the Communists have resolved the dilemma in favor of military considerations. In view of the actual fighting taking place in Korea, economic considerations have been largely outweighed. As a result, the President has asked for a supplemental appropriation of $10,487,000,000 for the immediate expansion of our Military Establishment.

This expansion is intended not only to insure a favorable outcome of the Korean operation but as preparation for possible further attacks which the invasion of the Korean Republic indicates may be expected. The President's intention to increase our military strength with considerable rapidity must be regarded as the speeding up of a military policy of strength building which has long been in process.

In fiscal 1947, only 6 cents out of every military budget dollar could be spent for tanks, ships, aircraft, weapons, ammunition, and other heavy items. This was due to the burden of liquidation costs of World War II and to heavy overhead. It is worth noting that we were able to use 19.5 cents on the dollar for hardware in the fiscal year that ended on June of this year, in part at least because of a reduction in overhead. About 59 cents out of every dollar asked by the President in the supplemental appropriation will go for this vital hardware.

The appropriation also will provide for a total of 2,100,000 in our Army, Navy, and Air Force. In this expansion, the Marines will be increased 90 percent. This money will provide for the calling up of a number of Reservists and the mobilization of needed National Guard units. Incidentally, I know you share my pride in the fact that our own Twenty-eighth Division is among the first called.

As I said a while ago, one of the major concepts about which our military policy has been integrated was the need for developing an armed force which would be readily and quickly expandable in time of emergency. The proof of our success in this part of our preparedness efforts may be found in the ease with which we have been—for many days now—absorbing new men, individually, and civilian components as units into our forces, and the advanced state of preparedness for procuring additional tanks, aircraft, and other "hardware" needed for our expansion.

It is safe to say that few Americans, if any, doubt the necessity of military expansion at an accelerated rate, regardless of cost. However, it should be a source of pleasure to the taxpayer that the cost in dollars will not be so great as would be the case if we had not, in months past, learned to get the greatest amount of defense for every dollar spent. Indeed, if this emergency had arisen not too long ago, many of the dollars which now can be spent for planes and tanks and guns and ships would have gone into useless overhead. This situation is not accidental. It was brought about by the earnest work of Secretary of Defense Johnson.

Incidentally, I am proud to be associated at this critical time with our great Secretary of Defense. My first real association with him was in the American Legion, when he was national commander and I was commander of this great department. I have been associated with him in many capacities since that time and I want you to know that he is the most sincere, honest, and capable executive that can be found any place in the world. His plan from the very beginning of his administration has been to assure peace through strength and he has endeavored to build that strength within the capability of the American economy. He still believes that even in this time of crisis we should not tolerate waste and extravagance. Recently in his appearance before the Congress he expressed this idea—and I quote—"this determination to get the maximum return on the defense dollar will continue to govern our activities."

It is probable that every delegate here has heard me one time or another advocate the virtues of unification of the Armed Forces. That advocacy no longer is necessary. Unification beyond any previous experience flowered in the Armed Forces with the invasion of Korea.

The action of our land, naval, and air forces under General MacArthur is one example of it. The President's recommendations to the Congress had the complete support and concurrence of all civilian and military leaders in the Defense Department. The benefit of unification in an emergency has been further exemplified by the quick decisions which have been possible in recent weeks to coordinate the combat efforts of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force.

I'm sure it is apparent that our military policy has been developed around sound concepts; that our Military Establishment has been organized to provide a sound mobilization base in case of war.

Those who recognize these facts should be free from any apprehension that we are stepping off into a new world, along uncharted paths. They will receive more readily a suggestion that I want to make. That suggestion is that the citizens of the United States become, like the Armed Forces, unified in their determination to support the President's latest program for defense. It actually is our greatest bid to maintain the peace.

We Can't Buy Friendship With Dollars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, since the end of the last war in 1945, the American taxpayer has watched his hard earned dollars roll around the world in a global spending program which he was told would endear the American Nation to the peoples of the world, and would result in an understanding by citizens of recipient nations of the benefits of our democratic form of government and their lasting friendship for our people.

Today Americans are wondering just what has been achieved through this program. Do the people of foreign countries receiving American aid know that American dollars are buying construction projects and other improvements for their benefit?

The following article by Gault MacGowan would indicate that ERP is falling short of the mark in demonstrating the advantages of American democracy to the citizens of European countries receiving our financial aid for reconstruction and this is a situation which should receive attention now:

AUSTRIAN TYROL, August 8.—We're nuts. We are pouring millions of dollars of United States aid into Europe without impressing the natives.

A big road sign here announces one Alpine road project being carried out through the ERP—but none of the locals could even guess what the letters stood for.

"ERP?" said an old man, shaking his head. "It must be the name of the contractors."

I gave a bright-looking boy a bar of candy. He accepted it gratefully.

"We haven't seen much candy since the United States Army went through," he explained. "It's too expensive. The last piece I had was for my first communion. You are from America?"

"How do you know?"

"I know the number plates of all the automobiles that come through the Austrian Alps."

"Then perhaps you can tell me what ERP means on that sign?"

"I'm not sure—I think it's the name of a patent road-making process. I watch them working sometimes. They are making 15 kilometers (9 miles) of new road. It will straighten out a big loop in the road to Innsbruck and the Brenner Pass."

I decided to enlighten him, and a knot of other children who had cast themselves in the role of sidewalk superintendents. But when I had finished, they still seemed more impressed by the candy bars.

"If it means what you say," a bespectacled girl remarked, "it should be EWP—Europaische wiederaufbau program. Reconstruction is not an Austrian word."

The childish wisdom left me silent. These are the boys and girls of the next generation among whom we are supposed to be peddling democracy.

All the top brass speaks about educating the children—GYA projects, exchange-student programs, more millions of dollars for it—and they don't know what ERP means.

European politicians who get the spending of the money know what ERP means, all right. It's easy money to keep them in office. They have the spending of it, and they get the credit for it. Why should they pass the word along that it's United States taxpayers money?

The Leave-To-Print and Franking Privileges: Their Use and Abuse

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. DEANE
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, various acts of Congress allow Representatives and Senators to send free through the mails under their individual franks the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or any part thereof, or speeches or reports contained therein, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe. They may also send and receive free through the mail all public documents printed by order of Congress, until the 30th day of June following the expiration of their terms of office. They may also send postage free any mail matter to any Government official, and to any person correspondence not exceeding four ounces in weight, upon official or departmental business—House Rules and Manual, section 984.

Any speech made in Congress appears as a matter of course in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Under the leave-to-print privilege, customarily granted by the House, Members receive unanimous consent to extend their own remarks in the RECORD. Matter inserted in the RECORD under leave to print, if in continuation of remarks actually delivered on the floor, appears in connection with the speech in the body of the RECORD. It is also customary, on account of its large membership and limited time, for the House at times to grant unanimous consent to Members to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD speeches not actually delivered on the floor. Extension of remarks under the 1-minute rule, if within 300 words, are printed in the body of the RECORD; if in excess of 300 words, in the Appendix. It is also customary to grant leave to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD newspaper or magazine articles, editorials, letters, or other matter not germane to the proceedings on the floor. No extraneous matter covering more than two pages of the RECORD can be inserted under leave to print unless accompanied by an estimate in writing from the Public Printer of the cost of printing which was obtained by the Member at the time leave was secured.

The right to extend remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is a valuable privilege. In a large legislative body where time is necessarily at a premium, it affords Members an opportunity to explain their attitude on pending questions and so give constituents a basis on which to approve or disapprove their actions. At the same time it apprizes colleagues and the country at large as to local sentiment the Member is elected to represent.

The extent to which the "leave to print" practice has grown is seen in the expanding size of the Appendix of the RECORD. Matter inserted in the Appendix during the first session of the Eighty-first Congress occupies five huge volumes and consumes 6,800 pages. At the current printing cost of $82 a page, the extensions and insertions of a single session thus cost the taxpayers $557,600.

The quality of the material that appears in the Appendix of the RECORD is very mixed. Some of it has educational value and general interest. Much of it consists of local editorial opinion, letters from constituents and campaign documents of no lasting value or general interest. But whatever its worth, the Public Printer is required upon order of any Member to print and deliver to him extracts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in such quantities as the Member may desire, at his expense, in franked envelopes ready for mailing.

During the fiscal year 1949 Members of Congress mailed free under the franking privilege 19,299,608 pieces weighing 2,243 tons in all, which cost the Post Office Department $1,031,823 to handle and distribute and which, at the usual postage rates, would have yielded to the Government a revenue of $1,027,692. However, the cost of handling franked congressional mail is less than 1 percent of total postal expenditures and of the postal deficit.

Each Senator may have 100 copies of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and each Representative may have 68 copies, which they may send postage free to constituents or others.

A survey of past practice indicates that the saving of postage permitted by the franking privilege has been a great temptation to Members of both Houses to advance their own personal interests at public expense. Both the "leave to print" privilege and the franking privilege have at times been abused. Many instances of such abuses have been chronicled in the annals of Congress during the past century. For examples of abuse of the "leave to print" privilege, see V Hind's Precedents, 6990–7017.

USE FOR CAMPAIGN PURPOSES

Perhaps the most frequent and familiar use of the "leave to print" privilege is found in the insertion of personal campaign material in the Appendix of of the RECORD.

Nomination by direct primary elections has converted the franking privilege into a vehicle of purely political service—

Writes Haynes in his history of the United States Senate.

For a Senator or Representative who has qualms as to the propriety or doubts as to the legality of sending directly under his frank a purely electioneering appeal to his constituents under guise of "official business," this remains as the most available and least personally expensive form of electioneering. All that is necessary is to go through the perfunctory performance of requesting permission to "extend his remarks." Then into the Appendix of the RECORD, with no limitation upon its length or its purely personal and private advantage, goes his bid for votes. When once it has found a place in that "catch-all," no question is raised as to its frankability (pp. 901–902).

Use of the Appendix of the RECORD for personal political campaign purposes and to save personal expense has become commonplace in recent years. Hundreds of thousands of "extension of remarks" are sometimes printed at the Member's expense and franked free throughout his district or State.

Such use of the franking privilege is defended by some Congressmen as "primarily for the benefit of our citizens," as a proper means of reporting to the folks back home concerning "happenings in Washington" and the Member's activities and voting record, and as a legitimate way of informing the people about the conduct of public affairs. Other Congressmen regard the insertion of "an enormous amount of useless stuff and personal political advertising" in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at a cost of $82 a page, as a costly and serious abuse of the "leave to print" privilege, and its distribution under the franking privilege as a substantial burden on the Post Office Department.

There is also involved a moral cost—

Observes Haynes—

in the Government's allowing itself to be made a party to the shabby evasion by which thousands of pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are filled with grotesquely inappropriate matter masquerading as "remarks" of its legislators (p. 904).

USE BY PRIVATE LOBBIES

The frank may be used to the advantage of private interests as well as in aid of personal political ambitions. Haynes recounts an instance of a prominent Senator being embarrassed when an investigating committee disclosed that thousands of copies of an expensive pamphlet filled with effective propaganda in favor of a high tariff on sugar had been distributed under his frank at an alleged cost to the United States Treasury of $28,000. The most recent evidence of wholesale use of the franking privilege by private lobbies was disclosed at hearings held in June 1950 by the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities. Dr. Edward A. Rumely, secretary of the Committee for Constitutional Government, which has registered as a lobby, told the Buchanan committee that his organization has distributed eight to ten million pieces of literature under congressional franks in less than 4 years. The CCG paid for the printing of the literature, but saved $240,000 to $300,000 in postage by obtaining franked envelopes from cooperative Members of Congress.

Benedict F. Fitzgerald, Jr., Buchanan committee counsel, put into the record a breakdown showing 692,000 mailings in 1947, 1,216,000 in 1948, 2,853,000 in 1949, and 475,000 in the first 4 months of 1950.

Mr. Fitzgerald read into the record several letters from Members of Congress to the committee for constitutional government declining to have literature sent out under their franks. One Member said that it was an inappropriate use of the frank. Another said that it was an imposition. In an editorial on franking unlimited the Christian Science Monitor—June 30, 1950—questioned whether some Congressmen have carried their franking privilege much beyond the purpose for which it was intended; that number of communications mailed free by a lobbying organization by courtesy of Members of the very body the organization exists to influence certainly stretches the proprieties to the breaking point.

PROPOSED REMEDIES

Various remedies have been proposed from time to time for these alleged abuses of the congressional franking privilege. Certain bills that have been introduced would prohibit Members of both branches of Congress from permitting their franking privileges to be used gratuitously or for pay by any person, firm, or corporation engaged directly or indirectly in any kind of lobbying activities or other propaganda efforts. Violation of this act would be punishable by a fine of $10,000, 10 years' imprisonment, and loss of office.

It has also been suggested, first, that the distribution of franked matter be limited to a Member's district or State; second, that the quantity of franked matter distributed be limited in some proportion to the population of the congressional district or State; and third, that persons and organizations which have registered under the lobby law be forbidden to distribute their literature under congressional franks.

Mr. Speaker, by judicious use of the leave to print, the Member of the Congress can make a real contribution toward economy.

Defense Production Act of 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SID SIMPSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 10, 1950

Mr. SIMPSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to address the House on the controls bill—actually called the Defense Production Act of 1950. Because the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, Mr. SPENCE, was given unanimous consent for all Members to have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks, I decided to make known and explain my position and views.

Mr. Speaker, as one of the 435 Representatives in Congress I do not believe the people of the Twentieth Illinois District expect me to vote for legislation giving the executive department blank check authority. I think they have this view regardless of which party is in power. I am of the same belief.

Constitutionally, the Chief Executive, as Commander in Chief, can and has sent the Army and the Navy to Korea. They are, according to the announcement, doing police duty at the request of the United Nations Security Council. As of today a few other nations in the group have offered or sent token help.

Historically, this is the eighty-sixth time the Nation's Army and Navy have moved by such orders. This is not the first but the fourth time the United States Army and Navy have been ordered into Korea:

In 1871 to capture Korean forts after a surveying party which had been granted permission to make certain surveys and soundings in the interest of science and commerce had been treacherously attacked.

In 1888 to protect American residents.

In 1894 to protect the American legation.

Of course, the other 85 times troops have been alerted and ordered into action, there was never a world conflict involved. It was only to protect American rights and property.

May God in his wisdom be on our side in the eighty-sixth order.

By agreement internationally, and with our executive department, Korea was divided at the thirty-eighth parallel. The legislative branches of our Government had nothing to do with it.

Like any citizen, I have a right to an opinion. A nation can no more be divided at an imaginary line than you can divide the United States at the Mississippi River or Illinois at route No. 36.

Neither should those in authority be condemned for not having enough military equipment in Korea to stop and hold the North Koreans at the thirty-eighth parallel. The reason I think this is because Korea is only one of many places over a wire area—thousands of miles—where a satellite nation could be pushed into war.

We could not move equipment fast enough should the same push have been in Iran, Indochina, India, Yugoslavia, Greece, Turkey, Arabia, the Balkans, France, western Germany, and other areas.

By a roll-call vote, I voted for the United Nations in the hope something could be done toward a permanent peace. Congress had no vote as to whether Russia should be given such veto powers in the United Nations Councils.

The member nations having similar views to ours so far have only been able to give little help. We practically stand alone in Korea, but, as we all know, we are there. As Stephen Decatur, a hero of the War of 1812, said, "My country, in her intercourse with foreign nations, may she always be right, but my country, right or wrong."

Mr. Speaker, because of this now comes another of our three branches of Government—the legislative, which had before it the economic-control bill. The Constitution defines the legislative branch as the one to make the laws with the veto power in the executive branch. Because of this I do not believe the Congress should give up that function of Government. For my part, I do not propose to do it. That is why the lower House is elected every 2 years.

Why should blank-check authority be given on the economy of this Nation? Congress is in session to pass any needed and emergency legislation. There is no reason why they should not be prepared to do that under present conditions, regardless of this being an election year. To be frank and blunt, Congress should stay right here.

In asking for no territory increase, in fighting communism, dictatorships, and tyranny, let us not create the conditions for a dictatorship for ourselves. Then why should we walk out on or be afraid of our own responsibility. I voted against the legislation on this basis, although if world war III becomes a world-wide reality, I believe in controls on everything and everybody.

This legislation in the main does five things:

Section 1: Permits the President, at his discretion, to put ceilings, separately or all at once, on wages and prices and to institute rationing. Prices would not be rolled back automatically, but they could be as far as May 24–June 24, 1950, levels. Wages would be frozen at that level, though some higher wages would be possible under various exceptions.

Section 2: Permits the President to allocate scarce materials.

Section 3: Permits the President to set priorities that would give preference to defense contracts.

Section 4: Permits the President to requisition materials or equipment for defense and to make defense production loans up to $2,000,000,000 in all.

Section 5: Permits the President to reinstate wartime consumer credit controls—meaning higher down payments—and to establish new credit controls on new building—meaning higher down payments for homes and business buildings.

As far as section 5 is concerned, I believe the Federal Reserve Board has ample power to control credits merely by raising the rediscount rate.

Section 1 lets the executive department make the law by Executive order. Should this be done it appears to me it would create an unfair situation. Prices could be rolled back as of May 24–June 24, 1950, levels. This would be fair in some instances and unfair in others.

It would be unfair where agricultural prices in the Midwest are concerned. Practically every commodity is down 25 percent today as far as the prices the farmer receives.

Hogs reached a top after World War II of $32 per hundred. Last fall, 1949, they were around $15 to $16. This week around $24, or 25 percent under the high.

Cattle top grade reached $42.50. Remember only one feeder obtains top price. On August 10, 1950, at Chicago, good and choice steers brought $29.50 to $30.75. Choice vealers, $27 to $33. At least 20 percent down according to grade.

The highest corn sold for was $2.25 to $2.50 per bushel. Last year's 1949 crop, $1.10 to $1.25 at the elevators, the Government loan being $1.35. This fall it might bring $1.40 or $1.50. At least $1 per bushel under top price.

Soybeans were about $3.25 to $3.50 per bushel last fall. This year's November quotation on August 10 average is $2.40. Again $1 below the maximum.

The dairy farmer is receiving at least 25 percent less for milk than he did at the top level.

You can easily see that even though farm prices have advanced some from the extreme low, that to freeze these prices as of June 24 would be unfair. This is certainly true, because there is little, if any, reduction in prices of anything the farmer must buy.

As to new additional control over commodity exchanges, every rural elevator, when buying grain, uses the commodity exchanges to hedge these purchases immediately. They would not have, nor could they borrow enough funds to handle a farmer's grain if they could not do this. Neither could they afford to handle crops in any other manner. Gambling in grain is one thing, and rural elevator hedging is another. The exchanges are regulated at present.

As evidence of the fact that there is no shortage in agricultural products, Secretary Brannan appeared 2 weeks ago before the House Committee on Agriculture in support of a $40,000,000 authorization to repackage bulk perishable agricultural commodities now owned by the Government, namely, by the Commodity Credit Corporation. If passed, these commodities stored in bulk could be shipped to States for their institutions and seaboard ports for needy foreign countries under certain conditions.

Mr. Speaker, I see no reason in Congress setting up a possible dictatorship in this country. We have been at war since December 7, 1941, supposedly to stop just that.

Free enterprise and high production stopped black markets in 1948 in farm implements and automobiles from selling above the regular retail prices. I do not believe the citizens of the Twentieth Illinois District want any more of it. They know what I mean when I say they do not want another Knetzer affair.

Tidelands Encroachment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 22, 1950

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New Orleans Times-Picayune:

TIDELANDS ENCROACHMENT

That the Interior Department already has moved to take over jurisdiction of offshore drilling, etc., without a law to back it up, is not surprising. That the United States engineers have been influenced to base approval of plans, etc., for oil-well structures outside Texas-Louisiana inland waters, on Interior Department O. K.'s, is regrettable. These encroachments have been rightfully protested by the Louisiana Mineral Board; and they provide another reason for congressional action on this matter.

The haziness of the situation is emphasized by lack of a dividing line, or clean-cut distinction between inland and offshore waters, which can only be drawn by law, but which the Interior Department apparently is making on its own hook—interfering, to that extent, with State operations. The same right of arbitrary distinction is given the Secretary of the Interior under the proposed O'Mahoney interim escrow bill.

The great objection to the O'Mahoney bill, however, is that it violates the principle of possession and prior jurisdiction, by seeking to give interim administration of the tidelands to the Government. Why wasn't this bill drawn to maintain such administration in the States, under the same conditions, pending final disposition of the issue? Senator O'MAHONEY knows that, as the record stands, a majority of Congress supports quitclaiming title to the States. It may require a two-thirds majority to effect this; but meanwhile the premature recognition and endorsement of Federal jurisdiction is contrary to sentiment.

Since Senator O'MAHONEY did not see fit to draft his legislation in accord with the status quo, it behooves tidelands-rights advocates to submit their own interim escrow bill, with provisional and unprejudicial demarcation lines, retaining State jurisdiction pending final settlement.

American Legion Resolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAURIE C. BATTLE
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, the American Legion, Department of Alabama, sent me a copy of its resolution adopting a seven-point program for the protection and welfare of our country. Under leave to extend my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include this patriotic resolution, as I think the seven-point program is meritorious, commendable, and helpful in this crisis:

Whereas the American Legion has, since its inception, advocated and supported a strong national defense; and has through its manifold programs attempted to instill into the minds and hearts of the American people a true sense of patriotism; and does now reiterate and reaffirm its continued dedication to these purposes;

Whereas the armed invasion of South Korea by the forces of communistic North Korea on June 25, 1950, has created an ever-increasing danger to the peace and security of the world; and

Whereas the entry of the United States into the conflict, to combat this overt act of aggression on the part of communism has caused our Government and its people grave concern over the possible outbreak of another world conflict; and

Whereas the foregoing requires of the American people a firm and definite plan of action to meet this crisis: Therefore be it

Resolved by the executive committee of the American Legion, Department of Alabama, That we do hereby state this positive seven-point program and do hereby pledge the manpower and resources at the disposal of the American Legion to the fulfillment of this plan for the protection and security of the Government of the United States and its people.

1. We endorse the action taken by the leaders of our Government and the United Nations organization in this crucial hour and again advocate an adequate defense of the United States. We do now reiterate and renew our demand for passage of Federal legislation which will secure a permanent program of universal military training, placing the obligation of military service on all citizens of proper age equally to the end that our Nation will always in the future be better prepared to defend itself and our institutions.

2. We demand that the Congress of the United States now perfect all plans for instant application when necessary to draft all manpower, military and civilian, industry and capital for successfully combating acts of aggression against this Nation and the free peoples of the world.

3. We pledge our unqualified support, full cooperation, and active participation to the State and Federal Governments toward the setting up of an adequate civilian-defense program for the protection of our people.

4. We do now condemn, as selfish and unpatriotic, the practice of hoarding and will exert our efforts to discourage it wherever encountered.

5. We advocate that the Congress now empower the President of the United States to institute price controls and rationing of foodstuffs, commodities and all necessities when necessary to assure an equitable division of the available supply.

6. We reiterate and renew our demand for the immediate passage by the Congress of the Mundt-Ferguson-Johnson bill, providing for the control of subversive activities and the registration of all subversive individuals and groups. We express our contempt for Communists and all those who abuse the freedoms, rights, and privileges afforded by our constitutional Government in their efforts to undermine those same freedoms, rights, and privileges. We feel that the penalties for such action are totally inadequate.

7. We assure the fighting men of this country and their dependents that the American Legion will in the future, as in the past, advocate and prosecute all just claims arising from their service and sacrifice: Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent the President of the United States, the Governor of Alabama, and to each member of the Alabama delegation in the Congress.

Adopted July 30, 1950.

Miracle on the Vistula

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS S. GORDON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, just 30 years ago, the forces of the Republic of Poland stopped the wave of Bolshevik aggression on the banks of the Vistula River. Times have changed for the Polish people since that historic occasion. While events have taken a turn for the worse, it will not be long, in my opinion, before the now Poland's Defense Minister, Soviet Marshal Rokossowski's plan for Poland, will be thrown out and the Polish people will once again stage a "miracle on the Vistula."

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD, with my remarks, a speech I made, both in English and Polish, to the people of Poland, over the Voice of America, on the thirtieth anniversary of this memorable occasion:

HON. THOMAS GORDON, OF ILLINOIS, ON THE "MIRACLE ON THE VISTULA"

Thirty years ago Poland was waging her first war for independence, a war climaxed by the battle of Warsaw, which history knows as the Miracle on the Vistula. Thirty years have passed since that memorable August of 1920 when the wave of Bolshevik aggression was repulsed from the walls of the Polish capital. History has apprnised the battle of Warsaw in 1920 as one of the decisive battles in the history of the world.

The imperialistic aims of the Bolshevik offensive of that time extended far beyond Poland. Soviet Russia was carrying on a policy which differed from the Czarist government's rapaciousness, only in its theoretical and ideological motivation. To cover up their aggressive intentions, the Soviet authorities juggled with the slogans of the self-determination of nations and created allegedly independent satellite governments composed of people blindly carrying out Russian orders. This creation of fictitious states and governments as a propaganda smokescreen for imperialistic intentions was a natural consequence of the long-range aims of Soviet policy—aims which had been formulated already before the revolution and which are still systematically being implemented.

As early as 1920 it was becoming clear that Soviet Russia was aiming at the seizure of all Poland to use Poland as a springboard for a criminal attack upon the world. The Communist vision of world domination was eloquently revealed in the order issued to the Soviet armies marching westward in 1920. The order read as follows: "The fate of world revolution hangs in the balance in the West. Over the dead body of Poland leads the road to world conflagration."

Thus did Soviet Russia intend to deprive Poland of her newly born independence, won not only on the battlefield but also at the conference table by the then President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson. Wilson's thirteenth point had given tangible expression to the deepest understanding by the United States of Poland's independence aims. Hence, this free and independent Poland, which had become a thorny obstacle to Soviet expansion, was dear to the American heart.
